which they apply. That section provides "that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." In order to maintain the argument, it is essential, therefore, to hold that the word "laws," in this section, includes within the scope of its meaning the decisions of the local tribunals. In the ordinary use of language, it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed and qualified by the courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective, or ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases which have hitherto come before us for decision, this court have uniformly supposed that the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws strictly local, that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It never has been supposed by us that the section did apply, or was designed to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain, upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. And we have not now the slightest difficulty in holding that this section, upon its true intendment and construction, is strictly limited to local statutes and local usages of the character before stated, and does not extend to contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, the true interpretation and effect whereof are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence. Undoubtedly the decisions of the local tribunals upon such subjects are entitled to, and will receive, the most deliberate attention and respect of this court; but they cannot furnish positive rules or conclusive authority by which our own judgments are to be bound up and governed. The law respecting negotiable instruments may be truly declared, in the language of Cicero, adopted by Lord Mansfield in Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr., 882, 887, to be in a great measure not the law of a single country only, but of the commercial world. "Non erit alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac, sed et apud omnes gentes, et omni tempore, una, eademque lex obtinebit."

§ 385. Pre-existing debt a good consideration for indorsing a note.

It becomes necessary for us, therefore, upon the present occasion, to express our own opinion of the true result of the commercial law upon the question now before us. And we have no hesitation in saying that a pre-existing debt does constitute a valuable consideration in the sense of the general rule already stated, as applicable to negotiable instruments. Assuming it to be true (which, however, may well admit of some doubt from the generality of the language) that the holder of a negotiable instrument is unaffected with the equities between the antecedent parties of which he has no notice only where he receives it in the usual course of trade and business for a valuable consideration, before it becomes due, we are prepared to say that receiving it in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt is according to the known usual course of trade and business. And why, upon principle, should not a pre-existing debt be deemed such a valuable consideration? It is for the benefit and convenience of the commercial world to give as wide an extent as practicable to the credit and circulation of negotiable paper, that it may pass not only as security for new purchases and advances, made upon the transfer thereof, but also in payment of and as security for pre-existing debts. The creditor is thereby enabled to realize or to secure his debt, and thus may safely give a prolonged credit, or forbear from taking any legal steps to enforce his rights. The debtor also has the advantage of making his negotiable securities of equivalent value to cash. But establish the opposite conclusion, that negotiable paper cannot be applied in payment of or as security for pre-existing debts, without letting in all the equities between the original and antecedent parties, and the value and circulation of such securities must be essentially diminished, and the debtor driven to the embarrassment of making a sale thereof, often at a ruinous discount, to some third person, and then by circuitry to apply the proceeds to the payment of his debts. What, indeed, upon such a doctrine, would become of that large class of cases where new notes are given by the same or by other parties by way of renewal or security to banks, in lieu of old securities discounted by them which have arrived at maturity? Probably more than one-half of all bank transactions in our country, as well as those of other countries, are of this nature. The doctrine would strike a fatal blow at all discounts of negotiable securities for pre-existing debts. This question has been several times before this court, and it has been uniformly held that it makes no difference whatsoever as to the rights of the holder, whether the debt for which the negotiable instrument is transferred to him is a pre-existing debt, or is contracted at the time of the transfer. In each case he equally gives credit to the instrument. The cases of Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat., 66, 70, 73 (§§ 139-141, supra), and Townslay v. Sumrall, 2 Pet., 170, 182 (§§ 142-150, supra), are directly in point.

In England the same doctrine has been uniformly acted upon. As long ago as the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr., 1664, the very point was made and the objection was overruled. That, indeed, was a case of far more stringency than the one now before us; for the bill of exchange, there drawn in discharge of a pre-existing debt, was held to bind the party as acceptor upon a mere promise made by him to accept before the bill was actually drawn. Upon that occasion Lord Mansfield, likening the case to that of a letter of credit, said that a letter of credit may be given for money already advanced, as well as for money to be advanced in future; and the whole court held the plaintiff entitled to recover. From that period downward there is not a single case to be found in England in which it has ever been held by the court that a pre-existing debt was not a valuable consideration, sufficient to protect the holder, within the meaning of the general rule, although incidental dicta have been sometimes relied on to establish the contrary, such as the dictum of Lord Chief Justice Abbott in Smith v. De Witts, 6 Dowl. & Ry., 120, and De la Chaumette v. Bank of England, 9 Barn. & Cress., 208, where, however, the decision turned upon very different considerations. Mr. Justice Bayley, in his valuable work on bills of exchange and promissory notes, lays down the rule in the most general terms. "The want of consideration," says he, "in toto or in part, cannot be insisted on, if the plaintiff, or any intermediate party between him and the defendant, took the bill or note bona fide and upon a valid consideration." Bayley on Bills, pp. 499, 500, 5th London ed., 1830. It is observable that he here uses the words "valid consideration," obviously intending to make the distinction that it is not intended to apply solely to cases where a present consideration for advances of money on goods or otherwise takes place at the time of the transfer and upon the credit thereof. And in this he is fully borne out by the authorities. They go further, and establish that a transfer as security for past and even for future responsibilities, will, for this purpose, be a sufficient, valid and valuable consideration. Thus, in the case of Bosanquet v. Dudman, 1 Starkie, 1, it was held by Lord Ellenborough, that, if a banker be under acceptances to an amount beyond the cash balance in his hands, every bill he holds of that customer's, bona fide, he is to be considered as holding for value; and it makes no difference, though he hold other collateral securities, more than sufficient to cover the excess of his acceptances. The same doctrine was affirmed by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Bloxham, 8 Ves. Jr., 531, as equally applicable to past and to future acceptances. The subsequent cases of Heywood v. Watson, 4 Bing., 496, and Bramah v. Roberts, 1 Bing. New Ca., 469, and Percival v. Frampton, 2 Crompt., M. & R., 180, are to the same effect. They directly establish that a bona fide holder taking a negotiable note in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt is a holder for a valuable consideration, entitled to protection against all the equities between the antecedent parties. And these are the latest decisions which our researches have enabled us to ascertain to have been made in the English courts upon this subject.

In the American courts, so far as we have been able to trace the decisions, the same doctrine seems generally, but not universally, to prevail. In Brush v. Scribner, 11 Conn., 388, the supreme court of Connecticut, after an elaborate review of the English and New York adjudications, held, upon general principles of commercial law, that a pre-existing debt was a valuable consideration, sufficient to convey a valid title to a bona fide holder against all the antecedent parties to a negotiable note. There is no reason to doubt that the same rule has been adopted and constantly adhered to in Massachusetts; and certainly there is no trace to be found to the contrary. In truth, in the silence of any adjudications upon the subject, in a case of such frequent and almost daily occurrence in the commercial states, it may fairly be presumed that whatever constitutes a valid and valuable consideration, in other cases of contract, to support titles of the most solemn nature, is held a fortiori to be sufficient in cases of negotiable instruments, as indispensable to the security of holders, and the facility and safety of their circulation. Be this as it may, we entertain no doubt that a bona fide holder, for a pre-existing debt of a negotiable instrument, is not affected by any equities between the antecedent parties, where he has received the same before it became due, without notice of any such equities. We are all, therefore, of opinion, that the question on this point, propounded by the circuit court for our consideration, ought to be answered in the negative; and we shall accordingly direct it so to be certified to the circuit court.

§ 386. Negotiable paper taken as collateral security is not taken in due course of trade.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CATRON.

Upon the point of difference between the judges below, I concur that the extinguishment of a debt, and the giving a post consideration, such as the record presents, will protect the purchaser and assignee of a negotiable note from the infirmity affecting the instrument before it was negotiated. But I am unwilling to sanction the introduction of a doctrine into the opinion of this court, aside from the case made by the record, or argued by the counsel, assuming to maintain that a negotiable note or bill, pledged as collateral security for a previous debt, is taken by the creditor in the due course of trade; and that he stands on the foot of him who purchases in the market for money, or takes the instrument in extinguishment of a previous debt. State courts of high authority on commercial questions have held otherwise; and that they will yield to a mere expression of opinion of this court, or change their course of decision in conformity to the recent English cases referred to in the principal opinion, is improbable; whereas, if the question was permitted to rest until it fairly arose, the decision of it either way by this court, probably, would, and I think ought, to settle it. As such a result is not to be expected from the opinion in this cause, I am unwilling to embarrass myself with so much of it as treats of negotiable instruments taken as a pledge. I never heard this question spoken of as belonging to the case, until the principal opinion was presented last evening; and therefore I am not prepared to give any opinion even was it called for by the record.

FOSSITT v. BELL.

(Circuit Court for Ohio: 4 McLean, 427-430. 1848.)

Opinion by LEAVITT, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit is brought on a note drawn by the defendant for $1,174.41, payable to Britton Leming, or order, twenty days after date, dated 2d of February, 1847, and indorsed by Leming to the plaintiffs. The defendant has pleaded a set-off to this note, in substance as follows: that before the indorsement of the note to the plaintiffs, Leming was indebted to Bell in the sum of $750, on a note dated 1st of May, 1847, payable to E. Holmes one day after date, and in the further sum of $750, on a note dated 1st January, 1847, payable to said Holmes the 1st of June in that year, both indorsed to Bell by Holmes. The matter in controversy between these parties is whether these notes constitute a legal set-off in the present action. And this depends wholly on the date of the indorsement of the note on which this action is brought. It is very clear, if the plaintiffs became the owners of this note for a good consideration, before its maturity, and without notice of any offset against it by the defendant, the latter cannot avail himself in this action of Leming's note to Holmes, indorsed by Holmes to him.

§ 387. Rights of indorsee before and after maturity.

It is well settled that the bona fide holder of a negotiable note, indorsed before it is due, holds it clear of any claim in favor of the maker against the payee, existing before or at the date of the indorsement. In such a case, the remedy of the maker is against the payee. The reverse of this principle obtains, if the note is indorsed after maturity. Then the indorsee takes it at his own risk, subject to any demand in favor of the maker against the payee. It will be for the jury to decide the question of fact, involving the actual date of the indorsement of the note in question. It would appear from the evidence that this note became the property of the plaintiffs under the following circumstances, as set forth in the deposition of Joseph R. Gitchell. He testifies that in January, 1847, Leming sent for the witness; that he went to Leming's house, and found him sick and confined to his room. Leming expressed a wish to secure certain creditors, and especially the plaintiffs in this suit; and for this purpose transferred, for the special benefit of the plaintiffs, an account against the defendant amounting to $1,300, executing at the same time an order for the payment of the account to them. The defendant, it seems, recognized this transfer, and on the 1st or 2d of February, 1847, paid in cash on the account transferred for the security of the plaintiff the sum of $135, and gave his note, payable to Leming, for the balance, $1,174.41. This is the note on which this suit is brought — it bears date 2d of February, 1847, and is payable in twenty days. Leming, on that day, indorsed the note in blank and delivered it to Gitchell for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs. Gitchell acted as the friend and agent of plaintiffs, but without any previous understanding or conference with them in regard to this transaction. He states that the note was delivered to the plaintiffs or their agent in the beginning of May, 1847.

From the evidence before the jury, there seems to be nothing disclosed impeaching this transaction as fraudulent. Leming, who was a bona fide debtor of the plaintiffs, evinced a proper desire that they should be paid, and for this purpose transferred his claim against Bell, as before stated. Subsequently, on the 2d of February, 1847, Bell gave his note for the balance then due on that account, payable to Leming or order, in twenty days, and this note on the same day was indorsed by Leming, and placed in the hands of Gitchell, to be held by him for the benefit of the plaintiffs. There is no evidence that Leming was, at this time, insolvent or even embarrassed in his circumstances; and there is, therefore, no ground to presume an intention on his part to give a fraudulent preference to the plaintiffs over the other creditors. Nor is there any pretense that he was not justly indebted to the plaintiffs to the amount of this note. If the jury are satisfied that the note on which this suit is brought was fairly indorsed to the plaintiffs, on the 2d of February, 1847, and on that day became the property of the plaintiffs, through the agency of Gitchell, though not delivered to them till the beginning of May following, it will result, from the principles of law before laid down, that they are entitled to a verdict for the amount of the note and interest. The notes of Leming to E. Holmes, insisted on as a proper matter of set-off against the plaintiffs' claim, were indorsed by Holmes to the defendant on the 1st of May, 1847 — more than two months after the maturity of the note indorsed by Leming to the plaintiffs. These notes cannot, therefore, be set off in this suit. It would seem, from the evidence, that they were transferred to the defendant upon the condition that they could be set off against the note on which this suit is brought. From this it is to be inferred that the defendant entertained doubts whether they could be so used, at the time they were transferred to him. He has no ground of complaint that they do not constitute a set-off in this action. By the terms of the agreement between the defendant and Holmes, the former has a clear right to return the notes to Holmes; or, if he prefers that course, he can seek his remedy by suit against Leming. In either case, he will not be a sufferer. Verdict for the plaintiffs.

TILDEN v. BLAIR.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of New York.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The draft in this case was drawn by Pelton, a resident of Chicago, on Tilden & Co., who resided in the state of New York.

The draft was accepted by the drawees for the accommodation of Pelton. The drawees received no consideration and had no funds to protect the draft. The draft was dated at Chicago, but by the acceptance was made payable in the city of New York. It was returned to Chicago, indorsed by Pelton to Coventry, and the latter sold it in Chicago to Blair. Blair had no notice of the arrangement with Tilden & Co.

§ 389. Negotiable paper governed by the law of the state where negotiated, although accepted elsewhere.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

That the contract upon which the suit was brought was made in Illinois must be considered as established by the findings of the circuit court. It is true the defendants formally accepted the draft in New York, and promised to pay at a bank in New York, but there was no operative acceptance until the draft was negotiated. They sent it back to Illinois, where it had been drawn, for the purpose of having it negotiated there. Pelton, the drawer, for whose accommodation the acceptance was given, was thus constituted the agent of the acceptors to give effect to their action. While the draft remained in his hands it was no binding contract. He had no rights as against the defendants, but he was empowered to negotiate the draft, and thereby to initiate a liability not only of himself, but also of the defendants. It was only when the instrument was negotiated that it became an accepted draft. It has long been settled that the liability of an acceptor does not arise from merely writing his name on the bill, but that it commences with the subsequent delivery to a bona fide holder, or with notice of acceptance given to such holder. Byles on Bills, 151. That this is so has often been asserted in judicial decisions, and often in New York. Cook v. Litchfield, 5 Seld., 279; Lee v. Selleck, 33 N. Y., 615; Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 Comst., 271. The doctrine is most reasonable. It is, therefore, quite immaterial, under the facts of this case, that the defendants resided in New York, and that they there wrote their acceptance upon the draft. In legal effect they accepted the draft in Chicago, when by their authority the drawer negotiated it, and thus caused effect to be given to their undertaking. Nor is the law of the contract changed by the fact that the acceptance was made payable in New York. The place of payment was doubtless designated for the convenience of the acceptors, or to facilitate the negotiation of the draft. But it is a controlling fact that before the acceptance had any operation—before the instrument became a bill, the defendants sent it to Illinois for the purpose of having it negotiated in that state—negotiated, it must be presumed, at such a rate of discount as by the law of that state was allowable. What more cogent evidence could there be that it was intended to create an Illinois bill? The case is exactly the same as it would be if the defendants had been residents of Chicago when the draft was drawn, and had accepted it at Chicago for the accommodation of the drawer, designating New York as the place of payment. It is plain, therefore, that the contract is an Illinois contract, and that the rights and liabilities of the parties must be determined according to the law of that state. By its statutes persons may contract to receive ten per cent. interest upon any debt due them, whether it be verbal or written. If they stipulate for a higher rate they forfeit the interest, but the statute expressly allows the recovery of the principal. The contract is not declared to be void. Only so much of it is void as exacts the excessive interest. And by a legislative act passed February 12, A. D. 1857, it is enacted as follows, viz.: “When any contract or loan shall be made in this state, or between citizens of this state and any other state or country, bearing interest at any rate which was or shall be lawful according to any law of the state of Illinois, it shall and may be lawful to make the amount of principal and interest of such contract or loan payable in any other state or territory of the United States, or in the city of London, in England, and in all such cases such contract or loan shall be deemed and considered as governed by the laws of the state of Illinois, and shall not be affected by the laws of the state or country where the same shall be made payable." Provisions very similar to these are also made by the statute of February 12, 1857. Gross' Statutes, 371-2.

If, then, the contract is, as we think it must be regarded, an Illinois contract, and if, therefore, the rights of the plaintiff are to be determined by the laws of that state, there can be no doubt he was entitled to judgment, and to judgment for the full face of the draft, with interest from the time it fell due. Even if the contract had been usurious, he would have been entitled to a judgment for all that the circuit court allowed him, for, as we have seen, the contract would not have been void, the statute expressly declaring that when usury is taken the principal debt may be recovered, while the interest reserved may not be. The case would be quite different if the law of the state made void an instrument usuriously negotiated. There was, however, no usury. And where a note or a bill is not made void by statute, mere illegality in its consideration will not affect the rights of a bona fide holder for value. Norris v. Langley, 19 N. H., 423; Converse v. Foster, 32 Vt., 828; Conkling v. Underhill, 3 Scam., 388. The plaintiff in this case was a bona fide purchaser of the draft. At the time of his purchase he had no notice of any equities in the drawer, or in the acceptors. There was nothing on the face of the instrument to awaken suspicion that it was accommodation paper, or that it had not been regularly and lawfully negotiated. He bought it from bill brokers, after it had been indorsed by the drawer and payee, and also by Carpenter, an apparent indorsee of the payee. That his purchase was not corrupt; that it was perfectly lawful under the law of Illinois, can admit of no question. Sherman v. Blackman, 24 Ill., 347; Hemenway v. Cropsey, 37 Ill., 357. And this is the rule everywhere unless the note or bill is declared by statute to be void in its inception. The plaintiffs in error, therefore, have no cause of complaint. The circuit court gave judgment against them for the sum which the plaintiff had paid for the draft, without interest. The judgment was only too favorable to them. It should have been for the full amount of the acceptance, with interest from the time it fell due, and had the case been brought here by the plaintiffs below we should direct such a judgment. But the present writ presents to us only the assignments of error made by the defendants, and as they are unsustainable, we can do no more than affirm the judgment given.

BROWN v. SPOFFORD.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Brown & Son made their notes payable to one of themselves, and the payee indorsed them in blank and delivered them to Cake, president of a coal company, with whom the firm had business relations. From that company the notes passed in due course of trade (as was alleged), and before maturity, to Spofford. At maturity the notes were duly protested for non-payment, and two suits were brought upon them. The defense was, that at the time the notes were made a written agreement was entered into with Cake, president, etc., to the effect that the notes were collateral for other securities, and upon their payment the notes were to be delivered to Brown & Son. Defendants offered to prove that plaintiffs gave their own note for those of Brown & Son, and that Cake said that the company compromised to indemnify plaintiffs and would take up the Brown notes at their maturity. This testimony was excluded. There were judgments in each case against defendants. Further facts appear in the opinion of the court.

§ 391. Rights of holder of indorsed paper.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Promissory notes payable to order may be transferred by indorsement, or when indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer, they are transferable by mere delivery, and the possession of such an instrument, indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer, is prima facie evidence that the holder is the proper owner and lawful possessor of the same, and nothing short of fraud, not even gross negligence, if unattended with mala fides, is sufficient to overcome the effect of that evidence, or to invalidate the title of the holder, supported by that evidence. Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343; Collins v. Gilbert, 94 U. S., 753 (§§ 432-436, infra); Noxon v. De Wolf, 10 Gray (Mass.), 343; Magee v. Badger, 34 N. Y., 247. Sufficient appears to show that the plaintiffs claim to recover of the defendants the amount of five promissory notes, set forth in the record, each dated January 8, 1872, payable to the order of Austin P. Brown in one, two, three, four and five months from date, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $11,336.64. Due indorsement of the notes was made by the payee, and the plaintiffs also claim to recover the costs and fees of protest and notice to the makers for non-payment. Service was made, and the defendants appeared and pleaded the general issue and two special pleas, which are fully set forth in the record.

§ 392. Special pleas not necessary, when.

Issue was joined by the plaintiffs upon the first plea of the defendants, and to the second plea the plaintiffs replied, and denied the same in fact and in substance, and all and singular the matters therein set forth, and alleged in further reply that they became the holders of the notes in the regular course of mercantile dealings for a full, fair and valuable consideration, before the maturity of the notes and without any notice or knowledge of the matters set forth and alleged in the defendants' second plea. They also deny and traverse all the allegations and averments contained in the defendants' third plea. Special pleas in such a case are unnecessary, as every such defense, where the action is assumpsit upon promissory notes, is admissible under the general issue.

Delay ensued, and at a subsequent term the parties went to trial, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiffs, in the sum of $11,300.47, with costs and interest. Exceptions were taken by the defendants, as appears by the record. Six notes, it seems, were given by the defendants, all of the same date, one of which was not due when the suit was instituted to recover the amount of the first five. On the 2d of August, 1872, the plaintiffs sued the other note, which was signed and indorsed like the other five, and was for the sum of $2,267.32 for value received. Service was made, and the defendants appeared and filed three pleas, of the same legal effect as those filed in the preceding case. Replications were also filed by the plaintiffs, of the same legal import as those which they filed in the suit to enforce payment of the first five notes. Proper issues being joined, the parties went to trial; and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs, in the sum of $2,269.85, with costs and interest, as therein provided. Separate judgments were rendered in the two cases; but the defendants were allowed to file eight bills of exceptions to the rulings of the court in each of the cases, which were subsequently signed and sealed by the presiding judge, each of the bills of exceptions having respect to the trial in the respective suits as if the same had been previously consolidated and the verdicts had been rendered at the same time by the same jury. Both judgments were removed into this court by one writ of error.

Certain errors are assigned here as applicable to the judgment in each of the respective cases, in substance and effect as follows: 1. Evidence was offered by the defendants to prove the alleged agreement between them and the company, which was excluded by the court, and they assign for error that the court erred in excluding that evidence. 2. That the court erred in holding that the agreement between the company and the defendants offered in evidence would not affect the right of the plaintiffs to recover in the suits. 3. That the court erred in holding that if the plaintiffs received the notes before maturity, without notice of the alleged agreement, the defendants were liable in the action, even though the plaintiffs paid their own notes with money borrowed from the company, whose agents they were in the transaction. 4. That the court erred in instructing the jury that if they find from the evidence that the plaintiffs did have notice of the alleged agreement between the company and the defendants, still they may recover in the actions if the jury further find that the defendants neglected and failed to comply with the terms of the agreement. 5. That the court erred in instructing the jury that the agreement to receive as a compromise in discharge of the notes a sum less than the amount of the same could only be made available as a defense, by proving that the sum agreed was paid or tendered by the defendants as therein stipulated. Exceptions not assigned for error will not be separately examined. Two of the errors assigned, to wit, the first and the second, are so nearly alike that they may be examined together.

§ 393. Parol evidence of an agreement contemporaneous with a promissory note and varying its terms or legal affect is not admissible.

Negotiable notes are written instruments, and as such they cannot be contradicted, nor can their terms be varied by parol evidence; and that proposition is universally true where the promissory note is in the hands of an innocent holder. Where a bill of exchange was drawn in the usual form, and was protested for non-payment, the court held twenty years ago that parol evidence of an understanding between the drawer and the party in whose favor the bill was drawn was inadmissible to vary the terms of the instrument. Brown v. Wiley, 20 How., 442. In that case, the defendant offered to prove to the jury, pursuant to the defense set up in a special plea, a parol agreement between him and the plaintiffs, that the bill should not be presented for acceptance until funds were furnished and placed in the hands of the drawees, to provide for a certain other draft, who had agreed to accept the second bill when funds were received to meet their liability for accepting the first bill; but the court below excluded the evidence, and the defendant excepted; and this court decided that the ruling was correct, and affirmed the judgment, holding that the evidence offered, that the bill should not be presented until a distant, uncertain or undefined period, tended in a very material degree to alter and vary the operation and effect of the instrument. Shankland v. Washington, 5 Pet., 394; 1 Greenl. Evid. (12th ed.), 318; Stackpole v. Arnold, 11 Mass., 27; Hunt v. Adams, 7 id., 518; Myrick v. Dame, 9 Cush. (Mass.), 248; Thompson v. Ketcham, 8 Johns., 192.

Certain fixed principles govern the liability of parties to a bill of exchange or promissory note which are essential to the credit and circulation of such paper, of which the most important is that whatever may have occurred between other parties to the instrument, if not fraudulent in its inception, the holder of the same, if he acquired it for value in the usual course of business before maturity, cannot be affected by any such transactions, unless it be first shown that he had knowledge of such transactions at the time the transfer was made. Nothing less than knowledge of such transactions can meet the exigencies of such a defense, the rule being that the bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for value, if acquired before maturity and without notice of any facts which impeach its validity between the antecedent parties, has a good title to the instrument, unaffected by any such prior transaction, and may recover the amount, even though the instrument, as between the antecedent parties, is without any legal validity. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343 (§§ 420-425, infra); Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, supra). Attempt was made in a leading case to prove that the payee agreed with the indorser that, if he would indorse the note, he should incur no responsibility, as the payment was secured by collaterals, and when offered in the circuit court the evidence was admitted; but the court, when the case was brought here on writ of error, reversed the judgment, holding that the evidence should have been excluded. Bank v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51. Decided cases of the most authoritative character have determined that parol evidence of an oral agreement, alleged to have been made at the time of the drawing, making or indorsement of a bill or note, cannot be admitted to vary, qualify, contradict, add to or subtract from, the absolute terms of a written contract. Specht v. Howard, 16 Wall., 564. In the absence of fraud, accident or mistake, the rule is the same in equity as at law, that parol evidence of an oral agreement alleged to have been made at the time of drawing, making or indorsing a bill or note, cannot be permitted to vary, qualify or contradict, or to add to or subtract from, the absolute terms of the written contract. Forsythe v. Kimball, 91 U. S., 291. Parol evidence of an agreement, made contemporaneously with a promissory note which contains an absolute promise to pay at a specified time, is not admissible in order to extend the time for payment, or to provide for the payment out of any particular fund, or in any other way than that specified in the instrument, or to make the payment depend upon condition. Chitty, Contr. (10th ed.), 99; Abrey v. Cruz, Law Rep., 5 C. P., 41; Allan v. Furbish, 4 Gray, 514; 2 Pars. Bills and Notes, 501. Apply these rules to the case before the court and it is clear that the first and second assignments of error must be overruled, as it is clear that the evidence offered was inadmissible, and that the ruling of the court was correct.

Due execution of the notes is admitted, nor is it questioned that they were indorsed in blank, as set up by the plaintiffs. Beyond all doubt, the plaintiffs became the holders of the notes before maturity, and for value; but the defendants insist that the plaintiffs did not become the holders of the same in good faith, nor in the regular course of business; and they requested the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed that the plaintiffs came into the possession of the notes without paying value, or under circumstances which would have put a prudent man upon inquiry concerning the alleged agreement, then the jury must consider the plaintiffs bound by the agreement, and that their verdict should be for the defendants. Three objections arise to that prayer for instruction, any one of which is sufficient to show that it was properly rejected: 1. Because the uncontradicted evidence showed that the plaintiffs did pay value for the notes. 2. Because the settled rule of law is that the plaintiffs, as the holders of the notes for value, and having acquired the same before maturity and in the usual course of business, or without notice of any prior equities, have a good title to the same, irrespective of what may have transpired between the defendants and prior holders of the notes. 3. Because there is no evidence in the case that the plaintiffs had knowledge of any equities between the defendants and such prior parties, the settled commercial rule being that nothing less than prior knowledge of such facts and circumstances as impeach the title can meet the exigencies of such a defense, unless it be shown that the instrument or instruments were fraudulent in their inception. Where the supposed defect or infirmity in the title of the instrument appears on the face at the time of the transfer, the question whether the party who took it had notice or not is in general a question of construction, and must be determined by the court as matter of law, as has been held by this court in several cases. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65; Fowler v. Brantly, 14 id., 318 (§ 427, infra). But it is a very different thing when it is proposed to impeach the title of a holder for value by proof of any facts and circumstances outside of the instrument itself. He is then to be affected, if at all, by what has occurred between other parties; and he may well claim an exemption from any consequences flowing from their acts, unless it be first shown that he had knowledge of such facts and circumstances at the time the transfer was made. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343 (§§ 420-425, infra); Collins v. Gilbert, 94 U. S., 753 (§§ 432-436, infra). Tested by these authorities, it follows that the third assignment of error must be overruled.

Both the fourth and the fifth assignments of error have respect to the supposed compromise which it is alleged was proposed and adopted; and, inasmuch as they relate to the same state of facts, they will be examined together. Parties may, doubtless, adjust their controversies; and where they do so in good faith and understandingly, courts of justice will uphold the adjustment, unless it violates the rules of law applicable to the transaction. Suppose that is so, still it is clear the alleged compromise was never carried into effect. What was proposed is that the notes were to be delivered up upon the payment of a prescribed amount at the time and in the manner set forth in the agreement; but nothing was ever paid or tendered, nor was anything ever done in fulfilment of the agreement. Instead of that, the evidence shows that the defendants never made any attempt to make the payments; and the court instructed the jury, that, if they found that the agreement of compromise was never carried out by the defendants, it constitutes no defense to the action; that such a compromise can only be made available to the defendants as a defense by proving that the sums agreed to be paid in discharge were paid or tendered as stipulated. Formal exceptions were taken to those instructions, and they are the basis of the errors alleged in the fourth and fifth assignments.

Sufficient appears to show that the indebtedness of the defendants amounted to the sum of $13,603.96, and that the plaintiffs agreed to accept $10,000 as a compromise, "upon the payments being made at the times stated," from which it is evident that nothing short of the fulfilment of that agreement would discharge the original demand, and that such a compromise to be available must be performed. 2 Pars. Contr. (6th ed.), 685; 2 Story, Contr. (5th ed.), 537; Chitty, Contr. (10th ed.), 693. Agreements unperformed cannot be pleaded as accord and satisfaction. United States v. Clarke, Hemp., 315. Where a creditor agreed to satisfy a judgment for a less sum than the amount recovered, if paid by a day certain, and the debtor failed to make the payment, it was held that the creditor might enforce the judgment for the full amount. Early v. Rogers, 16 How., 599. Performance of the agreement by the judgment debtor, it was held in that case, was a condition precedent to the proposed reduction of the judgment; and the court said, we think the district judge interpreted the agreement of the parties and the judgment correctly, as the parties made the reduction dependent on a condition which has not been fulfilled. Where an arrangement was made for the discharge of certain notes, but the arrangement failed because one of the debtors disagreed to the terms of the composition, the court decided that the debt stood revived, and that judgment was properly rendered for the whole amount. Clark v. Bowen, 22 id., 270; Addison, Contr. (6th ed.), 996. Two other exceptions were taken at the trial, in respect to which it is only necessary to say that they have not been assigned for error, and if they had been, it would not have benefited the defendant, as the questions presented fall within the rules already sufficiently explained.

Nothing remains for remark except to advert very briefly to certain irregularities which appear in the proceedings. Judgment was rendered in the first suit before the parties went to trial in the second, and yet the defendants were allowed to file eight bills of exceptions, which purport to be applicable to each of the two cases; and the judgment in each case is removed here by one writ of error, though the transcript does not show that the two cases were ever consolidated. Such proceedings are palpably irregular; but inasmuch as they are not the subject of objection by either party, the court has decided to exercise jurisdiction and dispose of the controversy. Separate judgments having been entered in the court of original jurisdiction, the judgment rendered here must be separately applied in the court below.

Judgment affirmed.

OATES v. NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Middle District of Alabama.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HARLAN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a writ of error to a judgment in favor of the First National Bank of Montgomery, against Oates, the plaintiff in error, upon a promissory note for $5,200, executed by him at Eufala, Alabama, on the 25th day of July, 1873, and made payable on the 1st of December thereafter, to the order of B. H. Micow, president, at the office of the Tallassee Manufacturing Company, No. 1, in the city of Montgomery. The consideration of the note was fifty shares of the capital stock of that company purchased by Oates, for which, at the time, he received a certificate in the customary form. As part of the contract of purchase, he took from the company a separate written obligation, reserving to him the option, on the 1st of December, 1873, at the matuurity of the note, of surrendering the certificate of stock and receiving his note duly canceled. It appears that he was induced to buy the stock upon certain representations of the special agent of the company as to its financial condition. These representations were subsequently ascertained by him to have been false and fraudulent. On or about November 4, 1873, Micow applied to the bank for an extension of time upon certain indebtedness then held by it against the company, amounting to about $40,000, and all of which matured thereafter and in that month. That indebtedness had been previously extended, on several occasions, at usurious rates of interest, paid invariably in advance. The bank signified its willingness to give an extension for thirty, sixty, ninety and one hundred and twenty days, upon collateral security being furnished, and upon the payment in advance for such extension of interest at the rate of one and one-quarter per cent. per month, upon the different classes of the company's paper by it held. These conditions were complied with, and the extension was accordingly made for the periods stated. The required interest was not carried into the extension bills, but was paid in advance. Among the collaterals placed with the bank, under this arrangement, was the note for $5,200 already described, indorsed in blank, "B. H. Micow, Prest."

The evidence was somewhat conflicting as to whether the officers of the bank, at the time of receiving the note in question, had actual notice from Oates as to its consideration. It was, however, conceded that its president had reason to believe the note was given for stock of the company. Oates, although residing at Eufala, was a stockholder and director of the bank. No inquiry was made of him by the officers of the bank, before receiving the note as collateral security, as to any defense which he might have against its payment. But it was proven by them that when the extension was given to the company they had no notice of any defect in or defense to the note, or of any equities except such notice as might be implied from the foregoing facts and the relations of the parties. It is not claimed that the bank had at that time any notice of the separate written obligation of the manufacturing company to which we have already referred. On the 24th of November, 1873, the bank gave written notice to Oates that it held his note as collateral security for the indebtedness of the company. A few days thereafter he transmitted to the bank the company's agreement or obligation, under which he had purchased the stock and given his note, informing its officers that he had by the same mail returned his stock certificate to the company and demanded the surrender and cancellation of his note. The bank, replying to this notification, stated that it had purchased the note as negotiable paper, in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any private understanding between Oates and the company, its officers or agents. These are the essential facts developed in the record. We are to inquire whether the court below committed any error of law to the prejudice of the plaintiff in error.

§ 397. Rights of share taker to surrender stock and cancel note.

The first contention of the plaintiff in error is that by the terms of the contract under which he purchased the stock and gave his note, and in view of the false and fraudulent representations of the company's agent as to its financial condition, he was entitled, as of absolute right, to surrender the certificate of stock and have his note returned or canceled; and, further, that his defense upon that ground was secured to him by the statutes of the state of Alabama, in force when the contract was made.

It is clear that as between the Tallassee Manufacturing Company and Oates the defense of the latter is perfect. And it would undoubtedly be sustained, even against the defendant in error, were it true, as claimed, that by the statutes of Alabama the transfer of the note was without prejudice to any defense which the maker might assert against the payee. This renders it necessary that we should ascertain to what extent, if at all, the rights of parties are affected or controlled by the statutes of Alabama. By section 1833 of the Revised Code of that state it is declared that "bills of exchange and promissory notes, payable in money at a bank or private banking house, are governed by the commercial law, except so far as the same is changed by this code." Section 1839 declares that "all contracts or writings, except bills of exchange, promissory notes payable in money at a bank or private banking house, and paper issued to circulate as money, are subject to all payments, set-offs and discounts had or possessed against the same previous to notice of the assignment or transfer." Thus stood the law of Alabama until April 8, 1873, when, by statute of that date, entitled "An act to amend section 1833 of the Revised Code of Alabama," it was enacted that section 1833 (copied in full in the act) "be so amended as to read as follows: 'Bills and notes payable at a banker's or a designated place of payment are negotiable instruments; bills of exchange and promissory notes, payable in money at a bank or a certain place of payment therein designated, are governed by the commercial law.'" Acts 1872-3, p. 111. By the same statute, section 1833, as it then stood in the Revised Code, was expressly repealed. It should be observed that the words "except so far as the same is changed by this code," in section 1833 as it originally stood, are omitted from that section as remodeled by the act of 1873.

The argument of the plaintiff in error is that although, by the explicit declaration in the act of 1873, "bills and notes, payable in money at a certain place of payment therein designated," are negotiable instruments, to be governed by the commercial law, such bills and notes are, nevertheless, under section 1839, "subject to all payments, set-offs and discounts had or possessed against the same previous to notice of the assignment or transfer." We concur with the court below in holding that construction to be wholly inadmissible. It seems that upon this precise point there has been no direct adjudication by the supreme court of Alabama, to which primarily belongs the duty of giving authoritative construction of the statutes of that state. The only case in that court to which we are referred, that has any bearing upon this question, is Cook v. Mutual Insurance Co., 53 Ala., 37. Jones, it seems, gave to Cook, in 1871, a promissory note, payable to the order of the latter at the office of W. H. Roberts, Mobile, and indorsed by the payee to the insurance company. In an action instituted by the latter against Cook, the question arose as to whether the note was commercial paper, protected, in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, against defenses resting upon payment, set-off or discount. The inferior state court ruled that it was paper of that kind; but the supreme court of Alabama held that the note, when made, was not commercial paper, and that the rights and liabilities of the parties were to be determined by the statute in force at the date of its execution. That court, speaking by its Chief justice, said: "Since the making of the promissory note, on the indorsement of which this suit is founded, the statute of April 8, 1873, has converted promissory notes, payable in money at a designated place, into negotiable instruments governed by the commercial law. It operates on the nature and obligation of the contract of the parties to such notes, and cannot be construed as affecting notes made and indorsed prior to its passage. The law in force when the note is made and indorsed regulates and defines the liability of the parties." No other reasons are assigned in support of the conclusion that the act of 1873 did not control the case. It is quite manifest, from the language employed by the court, that, had the note there in suit been executed subsequent to the act of 1873, it would have sustained the ruling of the inferior state court, and excluded all defenses inconsistent with the established doctrines of the commercial law. Such, in our opinion, must have been its determination upon any proper construction of the act of 1873. It is true that that statute does not in express words amend section 1839, whereby only "bills of exchange and promissory notes, payable in money at a bank or private banking house, and paper issued to circulate as money," are, in terms, protected against payments, set-offs and discounts which the maker might assert in the case of all other contracts and writings. But it is perfectly evident that the object of the act of 1873 was to place bills of exchange and promissory notes, payable at a certain designated place of payment, upon exactly the same basis, as to immunity from set-off, discount or equities, as the statute prescribed in reference to bills and notes payable at a bank or private banking house. In declaring that bills and notes of the former class were negotiable instruments, to be governed by the commercial law, the legislature necessarily intended to throw around such paper the same protection that had previously been given by statute to bills and notes payable at banks or private banking houses. If such was not its object, then, confessedly, the act of 1873 was both meaningless and illusory. The duty of the court, being satisfied of the intention of the legislature, clearly expressed in a constitutional enactment, is to give effect to that intention, and not to defeat it by adhering too rigidly to the mere letter of the statute, or to technical rules of construction. Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet., 627; Sedgwick, Const. and Stat. Constr., 196. And we should discard any construction that would lead to absurd consequences. United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall., 482. We ought, rather, adopting the language of Lord Hale, to be "curious and subtle to invent reasons and means" to carry out the clear intent of the law-making power when thus expressed. The defense of the plaintiff in error would be good under section 1839, if no regard was had to the act of 1873; but since that statute expressly included notes payable at a certain designated place in the class of negotiable instruments to be governed by the commercial law,—which could not be if section 1839 be enforced according to its literal import,—the judiciary must respect the latest expression of the legislative will, and not permit it to be eluded by mere construction. "A thing which is within the intention of the makers of a statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter; and a thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute unless it be within the meaning of the makers." Suckley v. Furse, 15 Johns. (N. Y.), 338; The People v. Utica Insurance Co., id., 357, 380.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the statutes of Alabama do not permit, as against a bona fide holder, for value, of a "promissory note, payable in money at a certain place of payment therein designated," defenses which are disallowed in cases where the note is payable at a bank or private banking house.

§ 399. One who takes a note as collateral security is a holder for value and bona fide.

Giving to the Alabama statute the construction indicated, our next inquiry is, whether the bank, under the circumstances disclosed in this case, became, according to the recognized principles of commercial law, a bona fide holder for value of the note in suit. That it acquired the note in good faith, without fraud, we are not permitted by the evidence to doubt. Its officers were not bound to inquire of Oates, before they took the note, whether he had any defense or set-off. They rightfully supposed, as the face of the note imported, that he had undertaken absolutely to pay the amount specified at the time and place designated. That the president of the bank had reason to believe it was given for stock of the Tallassee Manufacturing Company is a fact of no significance whatever in determining the question of good faith. Having no knowledge or notice of the private agreement between Oates and the company, as set forth in the separate obligation of the latter, which was withheld from the public, the bank officers justly assumed that there was no circumstance attending the sale of the stock which could lessen the obligation of Oates to pay the note according to its tenor and effect.

§ 400. Federal courts are not controlled by the decisions of state courts on questions of commercial law.

But it is contended that by the rules of commercial law, as recognized by the supreme court of Alabama, one who receives a promissory note as collateral security for a pre-existing debt does not become a purchaser for value, in the course of business, so as to cut off equities which the maker may have against the payee. Such was declared to be the settled doctrine of that court in Fenouille v. Hamilton, 35 Ala., 319. But the opinion in that case contains some passages which apply with peculiar force to a suit like this. The court said: "In this case there was no other consideration for the transfer of the note to the defendant than the security of the pre-existing indebtedness of the defendant's indorsee. The fact that the defendant may have been led to grant indulgence, or forbear to enforce his remedies for the collection of the debts, does not prove that such indulgence or forbearance was an element of the contract, or the consideration upon which it was made. If there was any forbearance by the defendant, it was a voluntary act to which he may have been persuaded by the collateral security, and may have resulted from a consciousness of security; but such forbearance was not the result of contract, and is not shown to have been the consideration of it." Had there been, in that case, a present consideration for the transfer of the note beyond giving security for a pre-existing debt, or had the forbearance of the creditor to enforce his remedies been an element in a binding contract, under which the collateral security was furnished, we are persuaded that the Alabama court would have ruled that the creditor, in receiving the collateral, became a holder for value in the course of business. But, if we are mistaken in our interpretation of the decision of the supreme court of Alabama, the result will not follow for which plaintiff in error so earnestly contends. While the federal courts must regard the laws of the several states, and their construction by the state courts (except when the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States otherwise provide), as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where applicable, they are not bound by the decisions of those courts upon questions of general commercial law. Such is the established doctrine of this court, so frequently announced that we need only refer to a few of the leading cases bearing upon the subject. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, supra); Carpenter v. Prov. Ins. Co., id., 495; Watson v. Tarpley, 18 How., 517 (§§ 1174-77, infra). We have already seen that the statutes of Alabama placed under the protection of the commercial law promissory notes, payable in money at a certain designated place; but how far the rights of parties here are affected by the rules and doctrines of that law is for the federal courts to determine upon their own judgment as to what these rules and doctrines are.

Upon principle and authority, we do not doubt that the defendant in error was, in the sense of the commercial law, a bona fide holder for value of the note in suit. In Swift v. Tyson (supra), cited by counsel, this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Story, said that it entertained no doubt "that a bona fide holder for a pre-existing debt of a negotiable instrument is not affected by any equities between antecedent parties, when he has received the same before it became due, without notice of any such equities." In some of the state courts the authority of that case has been disputed, so far as the language of the court referred to collateral security received for a pre-existing debt, upon the ground that the note there in suit was transferred in payment of, and not as security for, a pre-existing debt, and that, consequently, the opinion expressed in the language just quoted was unnecessary to the decision of the point in issue. In the more recent case of Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343 (§§ 420-425, infra), it was contended that a party who took negotiable paper merely as collateral security for a pre-existing debt did not acquire it in the usual course of business, but took it subject to prior equities. The court being of opinion that no such question was presented by the record, waived its consideration. But after an extended review of the authorities, American and English, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Clifford, said: "It seems now to be agreed that, if there was a present consideration at the time of the transfer, independent of the previous indebtedness, a party acquiring a negotiable instrument, before its maturity, as a collateral security to a pre-existing debt, without knowledge of the facts which impeach the title as between the antecedent parties, thereby becomes a holder in the usual course of business, and that his title is complete, so that it will be unaffected by any prior equities between other parties, at least to the extent of the previous debt, for which it is used as collateral."

That language would seem to be conclusive of the question under consideration. There was here a present consideration at the time of the transfer, independent of the indebtedness of the manufacturing company to the bank. That consideration as to the bank was the unconditional extension of time upon all the company's indebtedness, for different periods reaching beyond the maturity of the note transferred as collateral security. Such extension for fixed periods was a cardinal element of the contract. The creditor forbore pursuit of the remedies which the law supplied for the enforcement of his demands, then soon to mature, in consideration of collateral security being furnished, and in consideration also of the payment by the debtor of usurious interest in advance. Besides, having received the note, indorsed so that it became a party thereto, the bank was bound to observe all the rules of the law merchant as to presentation, protest, and notice of non-payment. It did not receive the note as the agent of the debtor, and merely for collection. It took it under all the responsibility as to presentation, protest, and notice of dishonor, which attached to absolute ownership, and became liable to have the note treated as payment pro tanto, if there were a failure to make due presentation, and, in the event of non-payment, to give proper notice to the creditor. The debtor could not withdraw his indorsement after delivering the note, under the contract for extension, nor could the bank, after receiving the note under that contract, disregard its agreement for forbearance. Nor was the bank any the less bound by the contract for extension because of the payment in advance of usurious interest by his debtor. Although the taking of usurious interest subjected the bank to certain forfeitures prescribed by law, and to an action by the debtor, if he so elected, to recover twice the amount so paid by him, it could not, of its own volition or by its own act, avoid the contract for indulgence because of such payment of usury. The payment in advance was itself a sufficient consideration for the extension, in the sense that the bank would not be allowed to repudiate its agreement, upon the ground that it had taken usurious interest in violation of law. 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst., sec. 1317. But independent of that aspect of the case, and throwing out of view altogether the usurious feature of the contract, we are of opinion that a creditor who takes a negotiable note before maturity, so indorsed that he becomes a party to the instrument as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, and in consideration of an extension of time to the debtor, actually granted, is, according to the law merchant, a holder for value, and that his rights as such holder cannot be affected by equities between antecedent parties, of which he had no notice. Goodman v. Simonds, supra; 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 221-228; Story, Promissory Notes, sec. 195, notes (7th ed., by Thorndike); 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (2d ed.), secs. 820, 832, and notes; Leading Cases upon Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes, by Redfield & Bigelow, 186-217, and notes. Whether the taking of such note merely as collateral security for antecedent debts, without any binding contract for indulgence, would constitute a valuable consideration within the established rules of commercial law, protecting the creditor against defenses or equities between antecedent parties, of which he had no notice, it is not necessary now to decide. That precise question is not presented in this case, and we forbear to express any opinion upon it.

One other question remains to be considered. Counsel for plaintiff in error have pressed with much vigor the suggestion that the bank, consistently with public policy, should not be regarded as a bona fide holder for value of the note in suit, since the contract under which it received the note involved in its execution a direct violation of the statutes against usury. We are referred in support of that position to several decisions of the supreme court of Alabama, which, it must be conceded, announce the broad doctrine that one "who has become the indorsee of a bill, by violating the provisions of a statute, cannot with any degree of propriety be said to be a bona fide holder in the usual course of trade." 13 Ala., 410; 14 id., 688; 16 id., 406. Without extending this opinion by a critical examination of those cases, we repeat that in the determination of such a question we are not bound by the decisions of the state court. The question is one of general law, and depends in nowise for its solution upon local laws and usages. We are referred, in this connection, to two cases, Levy v. Gadsby, 3 Granch, 180, and Gaither v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet., 37. The first is so meagrely reported that it is difficult to see the precise ground upon which the conclusion of the court was placed, and the second is clearly distinguishable from this. There, a note was indorsed and delivered as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, evidenced by a note given on a usurious contract. The case was held to be governed by the statute of Maryland, which declared "all bonds, contracts, and assurances whatever, taken on a usurious contract," to be utterly void. Under that statute the contract of indorsement was held to be void. In the eye of the law, it was as though it had never existed, and consequently no cause of action, it was adjudged, passed to the indorsee. The case in hand is altogether different. The statute under which the bank was organized, known as the national banking act, does not declare the contract, under which the usurious interest is paid, to be void.

§ 403. The rule of the national banking law concerning usury.

It denounces no penalty other than a forfeiture of the interest which the note or bill carries, giving to the debtor the right to sue for and recover twice the amount of interest so paid. If we should declare the contract of indorsement void, and, consequently, that no right of action passed to the bank on the note transferred as collateral security, an additional penalty would thus be added beyond those imposed by the law itself. "On what principle could this court add another to the penalties declared by the law itself?" DeWolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat., 367; Farmers' & Mechanics' National Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S., 29 (BANKS, N., §§ 205-210); Barnet v. National Bank, 98 id., 555 (BANKS, N., §§ 213-215).

§ 404. Where one consideration of a note is good and another is bad, the good consideration will sustain the contract.

Besides, in this case, the forbearance extended to the debtor was not upon the sole consideration of usurious interest paid in advance; it was upon the additional and substantial consideration that the debtor corporation gave collateral security for the payment of indebtedness about to mature, and which it confessed its inability to meet. We have already seen that the transfer of the note before maturity, as collateral security, and so indorsed that the bank became a party to the instrument under obligation to make due presentment and give due notice of non-payment, was itself a sufficient consideration to constitute the bank a bona fide holder for value, within the recognized principles of the law merchant. The presence, then, in the contract under which the note was indorsed and delivered to the bank of an additional consideration,—the payment in advance of usurious interest,—which the law declares to be vicious and illegal, ought not to destroy the entire contract of indorsement, when there is a sufficient consideration, aside from the usury paid, upon which it may rest. We are of opinion that no error of law was committed by the court below.

Judgment affirmed.

BANK OF PITTSBURGH v. NEAL.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a writ of error to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Indiana. All of the questions presented in this case arise upon the pleadings and the facts therein disclosed. It was an action of assumpsit, brought by the plaintiff in error as the holder of two certain bills of exchange, against the defendants as the acceptors. An amendment to the declaration was filed after the suit was commenced. As now exhibited in the transcript, it contains four counts. Two of the counts were drawn up on the respective bills of exchange, and are in the usual form of declaring in suits, by the holder of a bill of exchange against the acceptor. Those contained in the amendment are special in form, setting forth the circumstances under which the respective bills of exchange were drawn, accepted and negotiated, and averring that these acts were subsequently ratified by the defendants. To the merits of the controversy the defendants pleaded the general issue, and filed seven special pleas in bar of the action. Demurrers were filed by the plaintiff to each of the special pleas, which were duly joined by the defendants, and, after the hearing, the court overruled all of the demurrers. Those filed to the pleas responsive to the first and second counts were overruled upon the ground that the pleas were sufficient, and constituted a good bar to the action; but those filed to the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth pleas were overruled upon the ground that the third and fourth counts, to which those pleas exclusively applied, were each insufficient in law to maintain the action. Whereupon, the plaintiff abiding his demurrers, the court directed that judgment be entered for the defendants, and the plaintiff sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court. It being very properly admitted, by the counsel of the defendants, that the first and second counts of the declaration are in the usual form, it is not necessary to determine the question as to the sufficiency of the third and fourth, and we are the less inclined to do so, from the fact that the counsel on both sides expressed the wish, at the argument, that the decision of the cause might turn upon the question whether the plaintiff, on the facts disclosed in the pleadings, was entitled to recover against the defendants. That question is the main one presented by the pleadings; and inasmuch as it might well have been tried under the general issue, we think it quite unnecessary to consider any of the incidental questions which do not touch the merits of the controversy. Special pleading in suits on bills of exchange and promissory notes ought not to be encouraged, except in cases where by law the defense would otherwise be excluded or rendered unavailing. Full and clear statements of the facts, as disclosed in the pleadings, were presented to the court, at the argument, by the counsel on both sides. They are substantially as follows: In June, 1857, the defendants, residents of Madison, in the state of Indiana, being desirous of procuring a loan of money, made their certain acceptances in writing of two blank bills of exchange, in sets of two parts to each bill, and transmitted the four blanks, thus accepted, to their correspondent, Lot O. Reynolds, then and still residing at Pittsburgh, in the state of Pennsylvania. Both sets of blanks were in the form of printed blanks usually kept by merchants for bills of exchange in double sets, except that each of the four was made payable to the order of the correspondent to whom they were sent, and was duly accepted on its face by the defendants, in the name of their firm. They were in blank as to the names of the drawers and the address of the drawees, and as to date, and amount, and time and place of payment. When the defendants forwarded the acceptances they instructed their correspondent to perfect them as bills of exchange by procuring the signatures of the requisite parties, as accommodation drawers and indorsers, and to fill up each with the appropriate date, and with sums not less than fifteen hundred nor more than three thousand dollars, payable at the longest period practicable, and to sell and negotiate the bills as perfected, for money, and remit the proceeds to the defendants. Afterwards, in the month of July, of the same year, the defendants, at the request of the person to whom those acceptances were sent, made four other similar acceptances, and delivered them to him, to be sold and negotiated as bills of exchange, in double sets, for his own use, and with power to retain and use the proceeds thereof for his own benefit. They were in all respects the same, in point of form, as the four acceptances first named, and, like those, each of the four parts was made payable to the order of the person at whose request they were given, and was duly accepted by the defendants in the name of their firm. When they delivered the sets last named, they authorized the payee to perfect them as bills of exchange, in two parts, in reasonable amounts, and with reasonable dates. Eight acceptances were thus delivered by the defendants to the same person, corresponding in point of form to four bills of exchange, but with blanks for the names of the drawers and the address of the drawees, and for the respective amounts, dates, and times and places of payment. Four contained, in the printed form of the blanks, the words, "first of exchange, second unpaid;" and the other four contained in the corresponding form the words, "second of exchange, first unpaid;" but in all other respects they were alike. All of the first class were perfected by the correspondent as bills of exchange of the first part, and were sold and negotiated by him at certain other banks in the city of Pittsburgh. He perfected them by procuring L. O. Reynolds & Son to become the drawers, addressed them to the defendants, indorsed them himself in blank, and procured another individual or firm to become the second indorser. They were filled up by him for sums varying from about two thousand to three thousand dollars, with dates corresponding to the times when they were negotiated, and were respectively made payable in four months from date. Contrary to his instructions, he retained the proceeds of the one first negotiated, which he had been directed to remit; and he also retained in his possession, but without inquiry or complaint on the part of the defendants, the other four acceptances, constituting the second class. On the 1st day of August, 1857, he perfected and filled up as a separate bill of exchange one of the last-named acceptances, and sold and negotiated it to the plaintiff for his own use and benefit. He also perfected and filled up, on the 18th day of the same month, another of the same class, in the same manner, and for the same purpose, and on the same day sold and negotiated it to the plaintiff. Both of these last-mentioned bills of exchange vary from those of the first class, not only in dates and amounts, but also as to time and place of payment, and are in all respects single bills of exchange. They were each received and discounted by the plaintiff, without any knowledge whatever that either had been perfected and filled up by the payee without authority, or of the circumstances under which they had been intrusted to his care, unless the words, "second of exchange, first unpaid," can be held to have that import.

In all other respects the bills must be viewed precisely as they would be if they had been perfected and filled up by the defendants, and for two reasons, deducible from the decisions of this court: First. Because where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to the custody of another with blanks not filled up, whether it be for the purpose to accommodate the person to whom it was intrusted, or to be used for his own benefit, such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks and perfect the instrument; and as between such a party and innocent third parties, the person to whom it was so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed such instrument to his custody—or in other words it is the act of the principal, and he is bound by it. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 361 (§§ 420–425, infra); Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142 (§§ 553–555, infra).

Secondly. Because a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument, for a valuable consideration, without notice of the facts which impeach its validity between the antecedent parties, if he takes it under an indorsement made before the same becomes due, holds the title unaffected by these facts and may recover thereon, although as between the antecedent parties the transaction may be without any legal validity. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 15 (§§ 382-386, supra); Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 363. Applying these principles, it is obvious that the only question that arises on this branch of the case is as to the effect of the words, "second of exchange, first unpaid," which appear on the face of the bills. That question, under the circumstances of this case, is a question of law, and not of fact for the jury. Three decisions of this court sustain that proposition; and in view of that fact we think it unnecessary to do more than refer to those decisions, without further comment in its support. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65; Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet., 318 (§ 427, infra); Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 366.

§ 407. Where bills of exchange are drawn in sets, an innocent holder of any one of the set may recover.

Another principle firmly established by this court, and closely allied to the question under consideration, will serve very much to elucidate the present inquiry. In Downes v. Church, 13 Pet., 207, this court held that either of the set of bills of exchange may be presented for acceptance, and if not accepted that a right of action presently arises, upon due notice, against all the antecedent parties to the bill, without any others of the set being presented; for, say the court, it is by no means necessary that all the parts should be presented for acceptance before a right of action accrues to the holder. Now, if either of the set may be presented, and when not accepted a right of action immediately ensues, it is difficult to see any reason why, if upon presentation the bill is accepted, it is not competent for the indorsee to negotiate it in the market; and clearly, if the indorsee may properly negotiate the bill, a bona fide holder for value, without notice, may acquire a good title. In this connection Mr. Chitty says that, "unless the drawee has accepted another part of a bill, he may safely pay any part that is presented to him, and that a payment of that part will annul the effect of the others; but if one of the parts has been accepted, the payment of another unaccepted part will not liberate the acceptor from liability to pay the holder of the accepted part, and such acceptor may therefore refuse to pay the bearer of the unaccepted part;" from which he deduces the rule that a drawee of a bill drawn in sets should only accept one of the set. Chitty on Bills, 10th Am. ed. by Barb., 155. Mr. Byles says: "The drawee should accept only one part, for if two accepted parts should come into the hands of different holders, and the acceptor should pay one, it is possible that he may be obliged to pay the other part also;" which could not be, unless it was competent for the holder of a second part to negotiate it in the market. Byles on Bills, p. 310.

Where the drawee accepted and indorsed one part to a creditor as a security, and afterwards accepted and indorsed another part for value to a third person, but subsequently substituted another security for the part first accepted, it was held, in Holdsworth v. Hunter, 10 Barn. & Cress., 449, that under these circumstances the holder of the part secondly accepted was entitled to recover on the bill; and Lord Tenterden and Baron Parke held that the acceptor would have been liable on the part secondly accepted, even if the first part had been indorsed and circulated unconditionally. Judge Story says, in his work on bills of exchange, that the bona fide holder of any one of the set, if accepted, may recover the amount from the acceptor, who would not be bound to pay any other of the set which was held by another person, although he might be the first holder. Story on Bills, sec. 226. No authority is cited, for the defendant, to impair the force of those already referred to; but it is not necessary to express any decided opinion upon the point at the present time. Suffice it to say, that, in the absence of any authority to the contrary, we are strongly inclined to think that the correct rule is stated by Mr. Chitty, and that such is the general understanding among mercantile men.

But another answer may be given to the argument for the defendant, which is entirely conclusive against it; and that is, that the bills described in the first and second counts were not parts of sets of bills of exchange. They were perfected, filled up, and negotiated, by the correspondents of the defendants, to whom the blank acceptances had been intrusted as single bills of exchange; and for the acts of their correspondent, in that behalf, the defendants are responsible to a bona fide holder for value, without notice that the acts were performed without authority. When the transaction is thus viewed, as it must be in contemplation of law, it is clearly brought within the operation of the same rule as it would be if the defendant himself had improvidently accepted two bills for the same debt. In such cases, it is held that the acceptor is liable to pay both, in the hands of innocent holders for value. Davison v. Robertson, 3 Dow. P. C., 218. Lord Eldon said, in that case: "Here were two bills for the same account, and supposed to be for the same sums; they who were to pay them had a right to complain that there were two, and yet they were bound to pay both, in the hands of bona fide holders, if accepted by them, or by others for them, having authority to accept." To suppose, in this case, that the words "second of exchange, first unpaid," import knowledge to the plaintiff that the bills were drawn in sets, would be to give them an effect contrary to the averments of the defendants' pleas, as well as contrary to the admitted fact that they were not so drawn; and for those reasons the theory cannot be sustained.

In view of all the facts as disclosed in the pleadings, we think the case clearly falls within the operation of the rule, generally applicable in cases of agency, that where one of two innocent parties must suffer, through the fraud or negligence of a third party, the loss shall fall upon him who gave the credit. Fitzherbert v. Mather, 1 Term, 16, per Buller; Androscoggin Bank v. Kimball, 10 Cush., 373; Montague v. Perkins, 22 Eng. L. & Eq., 516. Business men who place their signatures to blanks, suitable for negotiable bills of exchange or promissory notes, and intrust them to their correspondents, to raise money at their discretion, ought to understand the operation and effect of this rule, and not to expect that courts of justice will fail in such cases to give it due application.

According to the views of this court, the demurrers to the several pleas filed to the first and second counts of the declaration should have been sustained. Having come to that conclusion, it is unnecessary to examine the other propositions submitted on behalf of the defendants. The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff, as upon demurrer, on the first and second counts of the declaration.

COOPER v. LABER.

Charge by DRUMMOND, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—It is necessary that you should understand clearly the circumstances under which this note was given. By acts of the legislatures of Wisconsin and of Illinois, certain corporations were authorized to construct a railroad from Racine, partly through Wisconsin and partly through Illinois, to the Mississippi river at Savannah, and to consolidate those roads with each other, so as to make one continuous line of road. Articles of association were entered into to accomplish that purpose. After this was done, the company sought to raise money by obtaining subscriptions to the stock of the road from different parties along the line, and took from them notes similar in character to the one that is in evidence here, and to secure their payment mortgages were given on real estate. Accordingly, to secure the payment of this note, the defendant executed a mortgage on his farm. At the time this note and mortgage were given, the Racine & Mississippi Railroad Company entered into an agreement with the defendant to the effect that, in consideration that the defendant assigned to the company his right to any dividends that he might be entitled to on his stock, the company would save him harmless from the payment of interest and from any loss whatever for his subscription to the stock. On the 29th day of May, 1856, the railroad company executed a bond, with coupons attached, and in June of that year this bond, together with the note and mortgage, were assigned to the plaintiff, he paying the amount of the note. The bond recited that the company was indebted to the bearer in the sum of $3,700, payable at their office in the city of New York on the 10th of May, 1861, with interest from and after the 10th of May, 1856, at the rate of ten per cent., payable semi-annually, and that as security for the same it assigned and transferred to the holder of the bond the note and mortgage of the defendant. The note, unindorsed, the mortgage and bond were fastened together and delivered to the plaintiff's son and agent, Fletcher Cooper, at the time the money was paid. There is evidence tending to show that certain representations were made at the time by parties who procured the note and mortgage from the defendant, and which, it is said, caused him to execute them, and there has been also a good deal of evidence introduced, the object of which, on the part of the defendant, is to show that these representations were untrue, and therefore, it is claimed, the defendant was not bound to pay the note and mortgage.

§ 408. The expression of an opinion or a simple recommendation will not be construed to be the inducement or cause of the commission of a certain act by another.

The only remark the court desires to make in relation to that is this: It is necessary for you to distinguish between statements made by way of expressing an opinion or a simple recommendation and those made by the parties with a view of inducing the defendant to execute the note. A mere expression of opinion or a recommendation in relation to certain things should, of course, be regarded merely as the judgment of the party. A statement of the facts which the defendant would not be presumed to know and had not the means of knowing, with a view of inducing him to execute the note, would be different. The court will leave it to you to determine whether there were representations made as facts to the defendant, with a view to induce him to execute the note and mortgage, which were false. If you should find that these statements were made, and were untrue, the next question would be whether they would affect the plaintiff.

§ 409. Notice of fraud or collateral agreement necessary as against a bona fide purchaser.

It was in June, 1856, that the note and mortgage were transferred to the plaintiff. You have to take the state of facts as they existed at that time in order to ascertain the bona fide character of the assignment; whatever might occur afterwards could not affect the plaintiff. It is made a question how far the facts at the time bound the plaintiff. There can be no doubt, from the evidence in the case, that the plaintiff knew for what the note and mortgage were given; that they were given as a subscription for so many shares of the capital stock of the company. The main question is whether the plaintiff knew of the existence of the representations alleged to be made, at the time or prior to the execution of the note, and also knew that they were untrue. Is there evidence in the case that tends to show that the plaintiff or his son, Fletcher Cooper, at the time the bond, note and mortgage were taken, knew or had reason to know that there were any false or fraudulent representations made to the defendant to induce him to execute them? If there is not any such evidence in the case, then, according to the view which the court takes, the plaintiff would be as to that a bona fide holder of the note and mortgage, and would not be bound by any equities which might exist between the railroad company and the defendant.

The defendant's counsel has contended that the note and mortgage were invalid for the reason that the articles of consolidation were void; that there was in reality no foundation in law for the note and mortgage to rest upon; and some authorities have been cited on this point. I have not had as much time as I would desire to consider this question. The main ground upon which he puts it, as I understand, is that those articles of association between the different corporations were not under seal, and therefore the union of the roads in the two states was illegal. So far as I am at present advised I am inclined to think, considering the manner in which this question arises, so far as the authority was concerned on the part of the railroad company to receive this note and mortgage, we must treat them as a valid note and mortgage.

I have spoken of the alleged misrepresentations that were made at the time and of the necessity of the plaintiff or his agent knowing that these misrepresentations were made before that part of the defense can be made out. I will now particularly call your attention to the fact that at the time the note and mortgage were given the railroad company entered into a written agreement with the defendant. There is no doubt that the note and mortgage and the agreement were all one transaction. The question is, was the plaintiff, at the time of the transfer to him, aware of that agreement? Did he know the nature and contents of that contract? If he did, then he was bound by it, not otherwise. You will see that the agreement, by its terms, seems to contemplate that the note and mortgage were to be transferred, because in the case of transfer the company guaranties the defendant against loss. The view that I take of it is that, unless the plaintiff or his son, as agent, knew of the existence of this agreement made by the company, he is not bound by it.

§ 410. An informal indorsement may be cured by the subsequent written indorsement of the note by the assignor thereof, if made before its maturity.

The only remaining question is whether there was an indorsement or assignment of the note to the plaintiff. The evidence shows that the Racine & Mississippi Railroad Company appointed agents to negotiate the loan of these notes and mortgages, and by virtue of the authority so given, as I understand, this and similar bonds were executed by the company, which were secured collaterally, as in this case, by notes and mortgages. As I have stated, the note was not indorsed by the company. By the terms of the bond they transferred and assigned the note; but there is a clause in the bond that declares that the note and mortgage were assigned and transferred in connection with the bond — “in connection with the bond, and not otherwise.” So that I think it is quite clear that it was the intention of the company that the bond, the note, and the mortgage, should all go together, forming one security to the holder or bearer. They were all attached together, and transferred at the same time to the plaintiff. There may be a question whether this was not legally a good indorsement of the note by the payees, the Racine & Mississippi Railroad Company. It is true the indorsement was not written on the back of the note, but it was written upon a paper which was attached to it and which it was intended should become a part of it. However that may be, there was a written indorsement afterward, and years before its maturity, made upon the note by the president of the company to the plaintiff. Some question has been made whether this indorsement was authorized. You have heard the testimony of Mr. Durand, the president, on that subject. There is no doubt that it was the intention of the company to transfer whatever right of property it had in the note to the plaintiff, at the time that the money was received and the negotiation consummated. Therefore, the written indorsement upon the note, which was subsequently made, was only carrying out the intention of the parties at the time. He says that it was the subject of conversation in the board of directors; that indorsements were made by him from time to time in the presence and with the knowledge of the board; and he gives the reason why. It was supposed that under the law of Illinois a written indorsement of a note was necessary. It was thought, he says, by the board, that no additional authority was necessary in order to enable him to make the indorsement, and it was made accordingly. If you believe this, then I think there is no doubt that there was a valid technical indorsement made on the note, because, if his statement is true, it was done with the knowledge and consent of the board of directors, and in fact it would have been a breach of faith for the board of directors to withhold the indorsement from the note, if that were necessary, because they had transferred the note for which they had received value in cash, and it was right that they should give to the plaintiff all the power and control over the note which they themselves had.

§ 411. Of two innocent parties the one who gives occasion for the loss must suffer.

You will perceive, therefore, that according to the view which the court takes in this case, the plaintiff was a bona fide holder of the note, and can recover, if he did not know that there were any false or fraudulent representations made at the time, or previous to its execution, and which caused its execution, and if he did not know of the existence of the contract or agreement given by the railroad company at the time that it was executed, and if he paid value for it. The reason of this is apparent. It is said to be a hard case for the defendant, as the stock has become worthless, that he should pay his money for nothing. That may be true; but the question is, who should suffer a loss in a case like this? Admitting that he has been imposed upon, and as between the original parties themselves he ought not to pay it, still if he or the plaintiff has to suffer, the rule is that, by executing the note and enabling the company to put it in circulation and raise money on it, the defendant must suffer the loss, for if he had never executed the note, or caused it to be put in circulation, the plaintiff never would have advanced his money on it. That is the reason of the rule of law on the subject, and it is founded, it seems to me, on the plainest principles of justice and equity. Therefore you will see that the case turns, so far as you are concerned, upon this, viz.: whether there is any evidence in the case which shows that the plaintiff knew that there were misrepresentations made (if there were misrepresentations of the character that I have stated), and whether the plaintiff knew of the existence of the agreement that was made at the time by the railroad. If he did not, and if there was no fact brought to his knowledge which would cause a prudent man to make inquiry, then I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. If, however he knew of the existence of any fraud,—if he knew of this contract and its terms,—then he is not a bona fide purchaser without notice, but he takes the note and mortgage subject to the equities which exist between the parties, and the defendant would not be liable. The other questions raised by the defendant I shall reserve for future consideration, if it becomes necessary. If you shall find for the plaintiff, of course he is entitled to recover the amount of the note with interest from the last payment, which was the 10th day of May, 1857. Verdict for plaintiff.

BANK OF SHERMAN v. APPERSON.

(Circuit Court for Tennessee: 4 Federal Reporter, 25-31. 1890.)

Opinion by HAMMOND, D. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—On motion for a new trial. Upon full consideration of the arguments made upon this motion, I am satisfied with the rulings I made upon the demurrer and at the trial upon the points then raised against the negotiability of the note sued on.

I think it entirely clear of all doubt that an administrator may negotiate a note made payable to him, and that the recital of the consideration in the face of the note does not at all affect its negotiable character. If the note in question had said that it was subject to the agreement for the purchase of the land, or used other words indicating that it was to be burdened with the conditions of that agreement, the case would be different. Cushing v. Field (Sup. Ct. Me.), 13 Chi. Leg. News, 11. The note is hereinafter copied, and I need only refer to its language to show that it is a simple recital of the consideration. Burchell v. Sloccock, 2 Ld. Raym., 1545; Bailey v. Rawley, 1 Swan, 295; Baxter v. Stewart, 4 Sneed, 213. Even in Tennessee, then, where whatever is sufficient to put a person upon inquiry amounts to notice, the mere recital that the consideration was for land does not have this effect. Ryland v. Brown, 2 Head, 270; Merritt v. Duncan, 7 Heisk., 156. But in the courts of the United States, where the rule is that there must be actual notice or bad faith to charge the holder for value, there can be no question that the recitals of this note are not sufficient to charge the plaintiff with any equities between the defendants and the payee. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343 (§§ 420-425, infra); Merritt v. Duncan, supra; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall., 110.

§ 413. Facts held insufficient to show notice of defense.

This brings us to the question of fact upon the proof as to notice. It is not pretended that there was anything further to charge plaintiff with notice than that he knew the land lay in Arkansas, and that Gregg was an administrator in Arkansas. It is said by a witness that the officer of the bank "looked at some papers" at the moment of taking the note before he agreed to take it. What the papers were, whether one thing or another, is not proved, nor is there anything from which to infer that there was in that circumstance a probable knowledge of any fact connected with this note. It may have been a report of some commercial agency showing the standing of defendants, for anything that appeared in proof, or it may have been some other paper totally disconnected with this transaction. All knowledge of the alleged facts are denied by the officers. But, more than this, the defense is that the consideration of this note has failed by reason of a failure of title and diminution in quantity of the land, and that, by the contract of purchase, the money was not to be paid until the title was satisfactory. There is not a single circumstance or fact in the proof which even tends to show that the plaintiff had any knowledge that there were such defenses to the note, or of the facts upon which they were predicated. It does not follow because the plaintiff knew the note was given for land that it knew the facts as to the title or quantity. The whole argument of defendants is grounded upon the assumption that because the face of the note itself conveyed a knowledge that there was a contract for land, that the land lay in Arkansas, that the payee was an administrator, and because he was pledging a note of $1,500 for a loan of $500 at an enormous interest of four per cent. a month, therefore, in the language of the brief, "the bank had notice or knowledge that there was a probable defense to the note." Now, if the decisions of the supreme court already cited, and many others, mean anything, they forbid, in this court, that any circumstance short of actual knowledge of the facts constituting the defense shall be taken to defeat the holder of his right to recover. The proof showed that in Texas, where this bank resides, the rate of interest was lawful and not unusual, and therefore no imputation of bad faith can be based upon that circumstance. As to the fact that the negotiator of the loan was an administrator, it is wholly immaterial. He may have needed the money for the purposes of the estate. The note may have belonged to him, having been taken in settlement for his commissions, or for a debt, or for a distributive share of the estate, for anything the bank knew to the contrary. He was the payee; the legal title was in him, and the bank need not, under the commercial law of the United States, trouble itself to inquire into the facts.

Any man may pledge a large collateral for a small loan, and they are often out of all proportion to each other. I could see in the proof nothing tending to show that the bank had actual notice of the fact that the title to the land had failed, or the quantity was diminished, or the quality insufficient, and nothing tending to show bad faith on its part, and if the jury had found otherwise I should, without the least hesitation, have set aside the verdict and granted a new trial; therefore, no error was committed in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. Orleans v. Platt, 99 U. S., 676. I was the more willing to do this, because, although the result would have been the same, no matter how well founded the defenses may have been, I allowed the proof upon the issues to be taken, and was satisfied that if the original payee himself had been suing there was absolutely no defense to the suit in a court of law, however it may have been in a court of equity, on a bill for specific performance or a bill to rescind the contract. I shall not undertake to show the correctness of that opinion, because, strictly, it is not properly in judgment, the plaintiff being entitled to recover as a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of any equities in favor of the makers of the note. I should also have mentioned that, even if the contract for the land referred to in the note had been before the bank, it could safely, in my opinion, have taken this note. The facts on which the supposed defects of title and other defenses rest were, at that time, unknown even to the defendants themselves. The land contract contained a stipulation that the purchase money was not to be paid until certain deeds were executed. Those deeds had been executed, and after their receipt the defendants paid all the money due, and executed this note and others for the purchase money not due in satisfaction of, and for the purpose of, closing up the agreement about the land. The supposed defects in the deeds, the mistakes in them, and their alleged worthlessness to convey the title, were afterwards discovered; indeed, they were discovered after the pledge of this note to the bank. This demonstrates that, at the time this note was negotiated, the defendants themselves had no knowledge of the facts constituting their defenses.

I come now to consider a new question, raised since the motion for a new trial was submitted, and never before referred to by counsel or detected by the court. The note sued on reads as follows:

"$1,500.

MEMPHIS, TENN., June 7, 1875.

"On the 14th February, 1876, we promise to pay to Col. E. P. Gregg, the administrator de bonis non of the estate of James L. Goree, deceased, the sum of $1,500, for value received, being for a part of the third payment on the Goree plantation purchased of said Gregg, as per agreement of the 14th February, 1874.

E. M. APPERSON & Co."

§ 414. The words "or order" or their equivalent are not necessary to the negotiability of a note.

It will be observed that the note does not contain the words "or order," "or bearer," "or assigns," or any equivalent words of negotiability. It is now said that this omission destroys the negotiability of this note, and that it cannot be sued upon in the name of the indorsee. This latter objection, as to the form of the suit, should have been taken by demurrer or plea in abatement. But even if so taken it would be untenable under our statutes. Whether negotiable or not, the note is assignable, and may be sued on in the name of the assignee. T. & S. Code, § 1967, and notes; Wolf v. Tyler, 1 Heisk., 313. Nor is it a jurisdictional question in this court, for the pleadings show that a suit might have been prosecuted in this court if no assignment had been made, Gregg, the payee, being a citizen of another state. Wherefore, the jurisdiction does not depend upon the commercial character of the paper. Act March 13, 1875 (18 U. S. St., 470). If we consult the authorities immediately preceding and subsequent to the statute of 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9, cited in Muir v. Jenkins, 2 Cr. C. C., 18, and elsewhere, by the text writers and annotators, it will be discovered, I think, that there has been much confusion of opinion as to the precise effect of that statute on notes omitting the words "or order," usually inserted to give the note negotiability, with the general result that these or other special words were not essential, if from the words actually used an intention to issue negotiable paper were manifested. If, under that statute, and solely by force of it, a note not containing these or equivalent words could be declared upon in the same manner as a bill of exchange, according to the custom of merchants, was entitled to grace, and would support a contract of indorsement, it does not seem satisfactory to hold that the note is not otherwise fully negotiable. And it will be seen that the judicial and professional mind never fully recognized the soundness of the position. Yet it is well settled that a bill or note is not negotiable unless it contains these words, or some word of like effect, except where made so by local statute. 1 Am. Lead. Cas. (5th ed.), 399, top page; 3 Kent (12th ed.), 77; 1 Dan'l, Neg. Inst., §§ 104-107. The most direct and satisfactory case I have found is Gerard v. La Corte, 1 Dall., 194; S. C., 1 Am. Lead. Cas. (5th ed.), 369.

The unsatisfactory state of the law on this subject induced the state of North Carolina, from which we have derived it, nearly one hundred years ago, to enact that "every bill, bond, or note for money, whether sealed or not, and whether expressed to be payable to order, or for value received, or not, shall be negotiable in the same manner as promissory notes." Act 1786, c. 4, § 1; T. & S. Code, § 1957. The act of 1762 (chapter 9) had substantially re-enacted the statute of Anne. T. & S. Code, § 1956. The argument now made is that the only effect of the act of 1786 was to make bills single negotiable in the same manner as promissory notes were under the act of 1762, and notes like this assignable. This is contrary to the words of the act itself, which says that "every note for money, whether expressed to be payable to order or not, shall be negotiable in the same manner as promissory notes." This is more manifest by reference to the original act itself, which this section of the code more briefly expresses. Besides, it was further amended by the acts of 1820 (chapter 25) and 1837 (chapter 5), where it is enacted that upon every such instrument the holder may maintain a joint action against the maker and the indorsers, or a several action against any one or more of the indorsers. T. & S. Code, § 1958. See, also, id., § 1967. The cases cited in the notes to these sections of the code fully sustain this construction, which is too plain to require further notice. This note is, then, fully negotiable by our local statute. It is confidently argued, however, that the federal courts do not recognize or enforce the laws of the states upon the subject of commercial law, and that this question must be decided according to the law merchant and the statute of Anne, and that this act cannot change the rights of the parties under that law. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, supra); Keary v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, id., 89; Watson v. Tarpley, 18 How., 517 (§§ 1174-77, infra); Dromgoole v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 2 How., 241; 1 Am. Law Rev. (N. S.), 211, 226.

§ 415. When state statutes affecting the "law merchant" are binding on federal courts.

It is said in Gregg v. Weston, 7 Biss., 360, that congress meant by "the law merchant," as used in the act of March 13, 1875, the law of contract governing the note, and that the statute of the state enters into and becomes a part of the contract. Whether this would be so as to restrictive statutes may be doubtful under the above decisions, particularly Watson v. Tarpley, supra. I must confess that, if the state has power, by legislation, to enlarge the commercial law, it does not seem very clear why it should not have power to restrict it in the same way; but there can be no doubt that restrictions are not binding. No case has, however, been cited which holds that a statute of a state enlarging the negotiability of bills and notes is not binding on the federal courts. On the contrary, such statutes are frequently enforced. The latest case I find is Oates v. Nat. Bank, 100 U. S., 239. There are many others. Nearly all the cases either construe the statute of Anne as adopted by the states or the statutes in lieu of it regulating the subject of negotiable paper.

The result of the authorities seems to be that while the decisions of the state courts construing contracts under the general commercial law are not binding as rules of property or rules of construction on the federal courts, nor are state statutes which restrict or impair the rights and remedies secured to the citizens of the several states under the general commercial law, or which divest the federal courts of the cognizance of those rights and remedies, those statutes which enlarge and extend the general commercial law will be enforced. It is so in equity cases. While the federal courts uniformly administer the equitable rights and remedies of the general law, and will not permit any restriction by state legislation or judicial decision, they recognize and enforce any new equitable right given by the legislature of the states. Broderick's Will, 21 Wall., 503; Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S., 10, at p. 21. The motion for a new trial is overruled.

SWIFT v. SMITH.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The appellants complain of the decree of the circuit court because it adjudged that the complainant Janet Smith, as administratrix of David Smith, deceased, had a lien on the lots described in the bill, by virtue of the deed of trust purporting to have been made by George N. Williams to Obadiah Jackson on the 1st day of October, 1868, and because it adjudged that lien to be prior to the lien in favor of Joseph Swift and Edwin Swift, and that in favor of Elizabeth Carroll and Ellen Carroll. There are other objections to the decree, but the two mentioned are the most important, for they strike at all the relief sought by the complainant's bill.

Both the defendants below (now appellants) and the complainant claim under Charles C. Waite, who, it is agreed, was the owner of the lots on the 1st day of October, 1868. On that day Charles C. Waite made his deed of the lots to one George N. Williams, which was duly recorded on the 24th day of the same month. To secure the payment of part of the purchase money, Williams gave two promissory notes, both dated October 1, 1868, payable to the order of Charles C. Waite,—one for $6,000, payable in one year from its date, and the other for $30,000, payable four years after its date, with interest at the rate of eight per cent., payable semi-annually. On the same day (October 1st) Williams made and delivered his deed of trust of the lots, sold to him by Charles C. Waite, to Obadiah Jackson, to secure payment according to the tenor of the promissory notes he had given. This deed was duly acknowledged and recorded concurrently with Waite's deed to him. In effecting the sale from Waite to Williams, and in taking the notes and security for the payment of the purchase money, Jackson was the attorney and agent for the vendor, and during some years thereafter the interest on the $30,000 note appears to have been paid through him. The $6,000 note was paid at its maturity. The other note came into the hands of Waite, the vendor, then living in New York, and he soon afterwards transferred and indorsed it to the order of his brother, Silas M. Waite, who subsequently, and before it fell due, indorsed it generally in blank to Obadiah Jackson. Thus Jackson became clothed with apparent ownership of the note, and with apparent power to transfer it by his indorsement. On the 18th day of April, 1871, Jackson borrowed from David Smith, the complainant's intestate, the sum of $31,500, giving his promissory note therefor, and to secure the payment of his note he indorsed and delivered to Smith the Williams note for $30,000 as a collateral. This was nearly a year and a half before its maturity. At the time when the note was thus indorsed to Smith there were entries upon its back of payments of interest upon it up to May 17, 1871. These entries purported to be acknowledgments of "S. M. Waite by O. Jackson." There was also a regular chain of indorsements by Charles C. Waite, the payee, to Silas M. Waite or order; by Silas M. Waite to Obadiah Jackson or order, followed by an indorsement by Obadiah Jackson in blank. There was also on the margin of the note the following: "This note secured by trust deed of even date herewith, duly stamped."

Thus far the facts appear without any real controversy, and unless there is something in the case to qualify them, they unquestionably establish that on the 18th of April, 1871, Smith became the bona fide holder of the $30,000 note for value paid, and as such entitled to the benefit of the deed of trust given by Williams to Jackson to secure its payment. Though he took it only as a collateral security for a loan made to Jackson at the time, he was entitled to the protection of a purchaser for value, without notice of anything to impeach his right. Conceding, what appears to be more than probable, that Jackson was not, in fact, the owner of the note when he transferred it to Smith, that he simply held it as agent or attorney of S. M. Waite for collection, and that in transferring it to Smith he perpetrated a fraud upon the true owner, it is still certain that he was clothed by Waite with power to transfer the ownership as he did. Waite's indorsement of the note to him gave him that power; and though its exercise was a fraud, if Smith advanced his money in good faith, relying upon Jackson's apparent ownership, he was justified in so doing, and S. M. Waite, who enabled Jackson to negotiate the note, thereby lost his title. He was bound by Jackson's act.

§ 416. One who purchases negotiable paper, for value, before maturity, acquires a good title that can only be defeated by proof of actual notice, or of bad faith.

There is nothing in the case to show that Smith's purchase was not in good faith. There was nothing upon the note, nor anything in the indorsement thereon, to notify him that it did not belong to Jackson, both legally and equitably. It was mercantile paper and not due. One who purchases such paper from another, who is apparently the owner, giving a consideration for it, obtains a good title, though he may know facts and circumstances that cause him to suspect, or would cause one of ordinary prudence to suspect, that the person from whom he obtained it had no interest in it, or authority to use it for his own benefit, and though by ordinary diligence he could have ascertained those facts. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343. He can lose his right only by actual notice or bad faith. It is true that if the bill or note be so marked on its face as to show that it belongs to some other person than the one who offers to negotiate it, the purchaser will be presumed to have knowledge of the true owner, and his purchase will not be held to be bona fide. Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet., 318 (§ 427, infra). Nothing of this kind existed in the present case. Everything upon the note tended to show that it belonged absolutely to Jackson when Smith bought it. And we fail to discover anything in the entries of interest payments, or in any other circumstances, that should have aroused even suspicion to the contrary. We are unable, therefore, to comprehend how it can be maintained, as the appellants contend, that the note did not belong to the complainant, but belonged to Silas M. Waite. Whatever may have been the fact before its indorsement to David Smith, and even after its indorsement to Jackson, Waite was estopped from asserting any claim to it by its transfer to Smith. It is true Waite is not a party to this suit. The decree does not bind him. But there is enough without the decree to estop him. He was examined as a witness for the appellants on the 12th of May, 1877. Then, if not before, he was informed that the note had been transferred to Smith, and that Smith's administratrix was proceeding to collect it. Plainly, then, it became his duty to assert his claim to it, if any he then had. He could not innocently lie by without intervention, or any action to vindicate his claim, while she was proceeding to enforce the trust. His laches, if he had any right, was inexcusable. But he made no movement in this case, and, so far as it appears, none elsewhere. Without further remark upon this part of the case, we think we have said enough to warrant the conclusion at which we have arrived, that the complainant's intestate, on the 18th of April, 1871, became the owner of the note, and thereby entitled to the benefit of the trust declared in the deed of Williams to Jackson.

The appellants, however, contend that no lien was created by that deed, because, as they assert, Williams was a fictitious person, or an alias of Jackson, and, therefore, that the pretended deed was void, since no man can convey to himself. This is a strange position for the appellants to take. If there was no such person as Williams, then Waite's deed to Williams was a nullity, for there was no person to take, and, as all the rights which the appellants assert come from Waite through Williams (as will appear hereafter), they have no interest in resisting the demand of the complainant, and are not entitled to be heard in the case. And so, as all the rights they assert are by virtue of a deed subsequently made by Williams (a deed hereafter to be noticed), it is not easy to see how they can have any standing; or, if Williams was but another name for Jackson, and Waite's deed was made to Jackson under the name of Williams, then the note, though signed by the name George N. Williams, was Jackson's note, and the trust deed signed by the same name would be construed as a declaration of trust for the security of the note, equivalent to a covenant to stand seized to uses for the holder. But we are of opinion that Williams was not a myth. Beyond doubt Waite's deed was made to a person calling himself Williams, and made to the same person who signed the note and signed and acknowledged the deed of trust. Whether that was his real name or not is immaterial. He appeared before the notary and acknowledged the deed as his. He was not Jackson, it is clear. The evidence that the witnesses called in 1877 knew no such person as George N. Williams, in a city containing several hundred thousand inhabitants, is hardly worthy of respect as proof that no such person was in Chicago in 1868. The existence of the lien, or of the trust declared by the deed, is not to be disproved by such evidence.

Concluding, then, that David Smith, on the 18th of April, 1871, obtained a lien on the lots described in the bill by virtue of the deed of trust from Williams to Jackson, we come to consider the second leading objection urged against the decree of the circuit court. It is that the court erred in decreeing that lien to be prior to the liens in favor of the appellants Swift and Carroll. To comprehend this assignment of error, it is necessary to observe the facts as they appear in the record. On the 5th day of October, 1868, Williams, who had then become the purchaser of the lots, and who held them subject to his deed of trust to Jackson, sold and conveyed them by warranty deed to Mary

P. Moody for the consideration of $60,000, subject to the deed of trust to secure the payment of the $30,000 note which the grantee agreed to assume and pay as part of the consideration of the purchase. This deed was recorded October 24, 1868. On the 17th of May, 1871, Mary P. Moody, by warranty deed, recorded May 25, 1871, conveyed the lots, for the consideration of $45,000, to Charles V. Dyer, subject to the trust deed aforesaid, describing it as given to secure the note for $30,000, which amount, with interest from date, the grantee covenanted to pay as part of the consideration. Afterwards, on the 1st day of June, 1872, Charles V. Dyer and wife, by deed of that date, with warranty, conveyed the lots to Obadiah Jackson aforesaid, expressly subject "to a trust deed given by George N. Williams to Jackson, dated October 1, 1868, . . . to secure a certain note on which is due $30,000, and interest." This deed was filed for record June 18, 1872. Subsequently Jackson, with his wife, made a deed of trust of the same property to Norman Perkins to secure the payment of an indebtedness by two bonds, each for $25,000, given by Jackson, one to Joseph Swift and the other to Edwin Swift. This deed was dated June 1, 1872, acknowledged June 29, 1872, and filed for record August 3, 1872. On the same day, August 3, 1872, there was filed for record an instrument purporting to be a release by Jackson to Charles V. Dyer, for the consideration of $1, of the right, title, interest, claim and demand of him, the said Jackson, which he had acquired by virtue of the trust deed given to him by Williams to secure payment of the $30,000 note. This release was dated October 2, 1871. It was not acknowledged until August 3, 1872, the day when the deed of trust to Perkins was filed for record, nor did it acknowledge the payment of the note. On the 13th day of November, 1876, Jackson and wife made a second deed of trust, conveying the lots with other property to George Chandler, to secure the payment of notes which he had given to Elizabeth Carroll and Ellen Carroll. This deed was filed for record on the next following day. This recital of the conveyances exhibits the fact that the lien of the trust deed to Jackson, given to secure the payment of the note for $30,000, was long prior in time to the liens of the Messrs. Swift, and Elizabeth and Ellen Carroll, and it was certainly in existence on the 18th of April, 1871, when that note was indorsed to Smith, the complainant's intestate.

§ 418. A release executed by a trustee of a lien on property of which, by mesne conveyances, he has become the owner, is a fraud upon the beneficiary of the trust.

But it is earnestly insisted by the appellants that the act of Jackson in making the release to Dyer protects them against the Williams deed of trust. That the release was a gross fraud upon the rights of Smith, the holder of the Williams note, is plain enough, and we think both the Swifts and the Carrolls had constructive, if not actual, notice that it was fraudulent. They were bound to know what was in the line of their title, that title being upon record. They are presumed to have known, and they are affected by the recitals in the deed under which they assert their rights. The trust deed to Jackson informed them of the trust to protect the $30,000 note, and informed them that when the release was made and put upon record the note had not matured. The deeds to Mrs. Moody, to Dyer, and from Dyer to Jackson, all recited the continued existence of the debt, down to June, 1872, and each grantee, including Jackson, assumed its payment. The record assured them that Jackson was the owner of the lots when the release to Dyer was made, and that Dyer had no interest in the trust deed to be released. They, therefore, were informed that the release was substantially a release by Jackson to himself of a debt which he had assumed to pay. Even if his power to execute the trust confided in him by the trust deed was not extinguished by his acquisition of the property, it was evident that he could not release the lien while he remained the owner of the lots without a gross abuse of his trust. In regard to Perkins, who was the trustee in Jackson's deed to secure the Swifts' loans, and who was their attorney to examine the title before the loans were made and the trust deed was executed, it appears that he knew there was no release of the trust for the protection of the Williams note, and required one to be filed. The release was brought to him by Jackson, unacknowledged. It was, therefore, in Jackson's possession, and, in fact, Dyer had never seen it. It was dated in 1871, October 2, and Perkins was informed that was not the date when the instrument was made. Jackson told him, indeed, it was the date when the debt was paid; but he was not authorized to rely upon Jackson's assertion, more especially when he had before him in Dyer's deed of the lots to Jackson the acknowledgment that the note was unpaid on the 1st day of June, 1872, nine months after the time when Jackson affirmed it had been paid, and had in view also Jackson's assumption, at that time, to pay it. The evidence leaves no doubt that the release was not made until August, 1872, when it was put upon record. Then Jackson, being the owner of the lots subject to the operation of the Williams deed of trust, was in such a situation that he could not, without an abuse of his trust, destroy the rights of the holder of the note. It is impossible, therefore, to maintain that there was not enough on the face of the recorded title under which the Swifts claim, and in the facts attending the execution of the release, to make it their duty to inquire whether the Williams note had been in fact paid,—enough to apprise them that the holder of that note could not be postponed or injured by the fraudulent release.

The other appellants are in no better condition. When the deed of trust was made to Chandler to secure the debt due to the Carrolls, the prior trust protecting the Williams note was on the record in the line of their title. They were affected by notice of it. And though the subsequent release to Dyer also appeared upon the record, the fact that Dyer had no interest in the property when the release was acknowledged and recorded; that Jackson was then the owner; that he then held the lots under a deed from Dyer, declaring the property to be subject to the payment of the $30,000 note, which he assumed to pay; that the note was not then mature, and that therefore the release was practically a release by Jackson to himself,—these facts were all before them when they took their lien, that is, the trust deed to Chandler. The Carrolls were dealing with one who they knew had been a trustee for the holder of the Williams note, and who was still such trustee, unless the trust had been extinguished or transferred. The facts by which they were confronted were more than enough to put them upon inquiry whether the Williams note had been in fact paid. They revealed a plain abuse of his trust by Jackson, from which, with the knowledge of it that they must be presumed to have had, they could derive no advantage. In the face of it they could not obtain a priority over the earlier equity held by Smith. We conclude, therefore, that the circuit court correctly decided that the complainant has a lien on the lots described in the bill by virtue of the deed of trust purporting to have been made by George N. Williams to Obadiah Jackson, and that the lien is prior to the liens held by the Messrs. Swift and by the Carrolls. We may add that there is no evidence of such laches as should postpone the complainant's lien to those of the appellants, or either of them. It is agreed, however, that in the decree in the circuit court there was an error in calculating the amount due to the complainant. The amount is too large by $554.27. The sum decreed to the complainant should have been $34,101.73.

§ 419. The rule in Illinois as to redemption of lands sold at a judicial sale.

We think, also, the court erred in not according to the defendants the right of redemption after the sale ordered by the master, according to the provisions of the statute of the state. In Brine v. Insurance Co., 96 U. S., 627, we held that the statutory right of redemption after a judicial sale, under a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, or deed of trust, is a rule of property in Illinois, and that it must be accorded in the federal courts equally as in those of the state. It may be admitted that if the sale ordered in this case had been made by the trustee named in the deed of trust, or by a substitute under the power which the deed gave him, and made in accordance with its directions, no right of redemption would exist. But such was not the sale directed. A strict foreclosure was not decreed. The bill prayed for nothing of the kind. It prayed for a sale, in default of payment, under the order and decree of the court, and the court decreed that its master should make the sale, after giving notice of the time and place thereof, according to the course of practice of the court, not according to the provision of the trust deed. Henry W. Bishop, it is true, was substituted as trustee in place of Jackson, but he was one of the masters of the court, and he was ordered to sell as master. He was required to make a report to the court, to pay into court any surplus arising from the sale, there to abide the court's order. The decree also contemplated a report of the sale by the master, and a confirmation of it by the court. The sale, therefore, as ordered, was in all respects a judicial sale, instead of a sale by the trustee under the power conferred by the deed. Hence it comes within the rule declared in Brine v. Insurance Co., and the right to redeem should have been preserved in the decree.

For this error, as well as for the mistake in the amount adjudged to be due the complainant, the decree must be reversed. In all other particulars the decree was correct. The decree will be reversed, and the record remitted with instructions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion, and it is so ordered.

GOODMAN v. SIMONDS.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was a writ of error to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Missouri.

Timothy S. Goodman, a citizen of the state of Ohio, complained in the court below of John Simonds, a citizen of the state of Missouri, in a plea of trespass on the case upon promises. The declaration was filed on the 1st day of March, 1854. It contained two counts—one upon a bill of exchange, and the other upon an account stated. At the April term following, the defendant appeared and pleaded the general issue, which was joined, and several special pleas in bar of the action. The special pleas were held bad on demurrer, and at the October term, 1855, the parties went to trial on the general issue. Robert M. Nesbit, a witness called for the plaintiff, testified that he was a notary public of the county of St. Louis; and that, as such, on the 15th day of January, 1848, he presented the bill in suit for payment to John Simonds, the acceptor, who refused to pay it, and that he afterwards gave due notice of the presentment and refusal to both indorsers. And the witness further testified that he was well acquainted with the signatures of all the parties to the bill, except that of the drawer, and that they were genuine. Whereupon the plaintiff read in evidence the bill of exchange described in the first count of the declaration, together with the indorsements thereon, as they appear in the record. W. Nesbit & Co. were merely nominal holders of the bill, never having had any interest in it, and only indorsed it to the plaintiff for the greater convenience in bringing the suit. Evidence was then introduced on the part of the defendant, exhibiting substantially the following state of facts: On the 21st day of June, 1847, the defendant addressed a letter to Wallace Sigerson, who resided at Cincinnati, informing him that he wished to avail himself of banking facilities in that place, to carry on certain business, in which he and John Sigerson had determined to engage, and asking his assistance, as a correspondent, to negotiate discounts, inclosing at the same time his letter of credit for $10,000, and two bills of exchange, each for the sum of $5,000, and suggesting in the same letter that they should require some twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars during the next four or five months, in sums of about five thousand dollars, as the same could be used from time to time. In the same letter also he instructed his correspondent to negotiate $5,000 immediately, authorizing him to use for that purpose either the letter of credit or the bills of exchange. When those bills were transmitted to Cincinnati, they were in all respects perfect bills of exchange, except that the name of the drawer was wanting, and they were without date. They were both made payable to the order of John Sigerson, and by him indorsed in blank, and were accepted by the defendant. Soon after their receipt, Wallace Sigerson, as drawer, procured one of the bills to be discounted according to his instructions, and remitted the proceeds, or a part thereof, to the defendant; and it also appeared that, during that season, he procured other bills of the same kind to be discounted for the same parties, to the amount of $25,000. The other bill forwarded at the time is the one now in suit. Wallace Sigerson had also large transactions of his own, the same season, amounting to $400,000. Many of his own transactions were with his brother, John Sigerson, who was the payee and indorser of this bill, and was jointly engaged in the same business with the defendant. He and his brother interchanged accommodation paper, and some of their acceptances were regularly discounted in bank, and it did not appear that any complaint was made, either by the acceptor or indorser, that this bill had not been accounted for or returned. There were dealings, also, the same season, between T. S. Goodman & Co. and Wallace Sigerson. They made a settlement on the 12th day of October, 1847, when it was ascertained that the amount due to T. S. Goodman & Co. was about five thousand six hundred dollars, arising principally from notes discounted, secured by bills of exchange as collaterals, on which nothing had been realized. At the settlement, the debt was divided into two notes, one having sixty and the other seventy-five days to run; and Wallace Sigerson testified that he gave his two notes in payment of the debt, and left this bill as collateral security to the notes, fixing the dates so that the notes would mature twelve or fifteen days before the bill. Two drafts on Ravissess, Bullock & Co., previously held as collaterals, were embraced in the settlement, and formed a part of the indebtedness for which the notes were given; and McDonald, who was the book-keeper of the plaintiff's firm, and a witness for the defendant, testified he knew of no other collateral security than this bill, which the firm held for those notes. It would seem, therefore, that all the prior collaterals were surrendered to the defendant at the settlement.

There is some confusion, and perhaps uncertainty, in the evidence reported, respecting the history of the bill from the time it went into the possession of Wallace Sigerson till it was thus placed in the hands of T. S. Goodman & Co., as collateral security to the above-mentioned notes. It may, however, be gathered from the testimony of Wallace Sigerson, that he first offered it for discount to the Ohio Life and Trust Company, and shortly afterward to the plaintiff, for the same purpose, and that the plaintiff declined to discount it, but soon after took it as collateral security for temporary loans. How long the bill remained in the possession of the plaintiff as collateral security for temporary loans does not appear, nor for whose benefit the money was obtained. When the settlement took place, Wallace Sigerson told the plaintiff that he had a right to use the bill, and the plaintiff agreed that it should not be sent to St. Louis for collection till after the maturity of the notes to which it was collateral. Nothing of the kind was agreed when it was left as collateral security for temporary loans. Wallace Sigerson became the drawer of this bill, as he had previously done with respect to the other, which was sent him at the same time, and filled up the date, but whether at the time of the settlement, or previously, was not entirely certain. He failed in business in November, 1847, and on the 20th day of the same month, T. S. Goodman & Co. addressed a letter to C. W. Clark & Brothers, inclosing this bill, and requesting them to pass it at the least rate, not exceeding twelve per cent. interest, saying, "We do not indorse it, as we are selling it for another;" and when L. C. Clark, one of that firm, a few days afterward offered the bill for sale to the defendant, "he said it was a forgery of his name; that Wallace Sigerson had no authority to use it." At the trial, the court, on the prayer of the plaintiff, instructed the jury to the effect that, if the plaintiff acquired the bill of Wallace Sigerson as collateral security without notice of his want of authority to transfer it, that the plaintiff was unaffected by such abuse of trust, and that the defendant was precluded from setting it up as a defense in this suit, to which no exceptions were taken. We pass over the first instruction given to the jury on the prayer of the defendant, for the same reason that it was not excepted to, and proceed to examine the second, as amended by the court, which presents the principal subject of controversy at the present time. It was to the effect that, "if such facts and circumstances were known to the plaintiff as caused him to suspect, or that would have caused one of ordinary prudence to suspect, that Wallace Sigerson had no interest in the bill, and no authority to use the same for his own benefit, and by ordinary diligence he could have ascertained these facts, then the jury will find for the defendant."

§ 420. An instruction given without evidence on which to base it is erroneous.

I. The general question which the bill of exceptions presents, arising upon that instruction, is certainly one of very considerable importance, especially to the mercantile community, as it affects the transfer and free circulation of bills of exchange and promissory notes, which, by virtue of their negotiable quality, constitute the principal medium for the transaction of their business affairs.

There is, however, some reason to doubt whether the evidence at the trial furnished any proper basis for the application of the instruction in this case, even supposing the principle announced to be correct as an abstract proposition; and this gives rise to a preliminary question, which will be first considered, whether the instruction ought not to be regarded as objectionable on that account. When a prayer for instruction is presented to the court, and there is no evidence in the case for the consideration of the jury, it ought always to be withheld; and as a general rule, if it is given under such circumstances, it will be error in the court, for the reason that its tendency may be and often is to mislead the jury, by withdrawing their attention from the legitimate points of inquiry involved in the issue. All that was shown at the trial, in addition to the description of the bill, was the refusal of the plaintiff to discount it when it was offered for that purpose, his possession and control of it shortly after, as a pledge for temporary loans, and the subsequent transfer of the bill to him as collateral security at the settlement, together with the circumstances of that transaction, and what appeared in the letter of T. S. Goodman & Co., transmitting the bill to St. Louis for sale. Other circumstances are adverted to in the printed argument for the defendant; but as they do not appear to be sustained by the evidence in the case, they are omitted. Nothing transpired when the bill was offered for discount, more than what occurs on similar occasions in the daily transactions among business men. It was offered and declined, and that was the whole transaction, so far as it was disclosed in the evidence. No reasons were assigned by the plaintiff for declining, and none were asked for by the holder, who offered the bill. Mere speculative inferences are never allowable, and cannot be regarded as evidence. The refusal to discount the bill might have been for the reason supposed in the instruction; and so also it might have been for a very different reason, such as a prior obligation to other customers, want of available funds, or from a desire for farther information as to the pecuniary standing of the parties to this bill; and whether it was for any one of the reasons suggested, or some other, in the absence of any explanation, was a mere naked conjecture. Another answer may also be given to this suggestion, which is equally decisive, and that is, the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff in taking the bill as a pledge for temporary loans, which seems to negative the supposition altogether that the previous refusal to discount it was on account of any suspicion he entertained, either as to the genuineness of the paper or of the authority of the holder to pass it. Some time elapsed, after the bill was offered for discount, before it was finally transferred to the plaintiff, and that fact undoubtedly was well known to the plaintiff at the time of the transfer; and so also was the more important one in this investigation, that during all that time the bill remained in the custody or under the control of Wallace Sigerson, as the ostensible owner, and that he claimed and exercised over it all the rights of a holder for value. If these circumstances are taken in connection with each other, as they unquestionably should be, there can be no doubt they were far better suited to inspire confidence in the title of the holder than to excite suspicion in regard to his authority to pass the bill; and if they had that effect, it was plainly the fault of the defendant in executing and forwarding the bill to his correspondent, and in intrusting it to his control and suffering it to remain in his custody without inquiry or complaint.

§ 421. Delivery of note or bill to agent without date authorizes him to fill the blank.

The want of date to the bill at the time it was offered for discount, under circumstances disclosed in the evidence, was entirely an immaterial consideration. When the defendant sent the bill to Wallace Sigerson, indorsed in blank and without date, and intrusted it to his care and discretion, to be used for his own benefit, he thereby empowered him to fill the blank, as a necessary incident to the trust conferred, just as effectually as if the authority had been expressly delegated by the terms of the letter in which it was sent. Nor was it of any consequence that it was antedated, as compared with the time when it was passed to the plaintiff, inasmuch as it was filled up by his own correspondent before he parted with its possession and control, and was actually made to bear date subsequent to the time when it was received from the defendant. In filling it up, he but carried into effect one of the purposes for which it had been forwarded, as is plainly indicated from the general scope and design of the letter. He was authorized to use the bill to raise money for the benefit of the defendant; and in order to use the bill for that purpose, it must have been expected that he would become the drawer, and fill up the date at his discretion. Independently, however, of the terms of the letter, it may be asserted as a general principle, that where a party to a negotiable bill of exchange or promissory note intrusts it to the custody of another, when it is without date, whether it be for the purpose to accommodate the person to whom it was intrusted, or to be used for his own benefit, such bill or note carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blank; and, as between such party to the bill or note and innocent third parties, the person to whom it was so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed such bill or note to his custody, and as acting under his authority, and with his approbation. Mitchell v. Culver, 7 Cow., 336. The general doctrine on this subject, and the reasons on which it is founded, are stated by Shaw, C. J., in Androscooggin Bank v. Kimball, 10 Cush., 373, as follows: "The rule is very clear that if one party, intending to accommodate another, signs his name to a blank paper, he authorizes the other to whom he delivers it and for whose accommodation it was made, to fill up the blank; and the filling up being done by his authority, is his act, and he is bound by it; and we concur in the principle, and think it applies with even more force when it was done for his own benefit, as in this case." Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142 (§§ 553-555, infra); Russell v. Langstaffe, 2 Doug., 514; Collis v. Emett, 1 H. Black., 313; Montague v. Perkins, 22 Eng. L. & Eq., 516.

The circumstances thus far considered, we think, afforded no ground of inference whatever to support the theory of fact assumed in the instruction. But it is more difficult to dispose of those that follow in the same way, on account of the extremely indefinite nature of the inquiry arising under the instruction. One man is more readily influenced to suspect fraud in matters of business than another, and the same individual may be differently impressed by similar transactions occurring at different times under precisely similar circumstances; so that in some cases, where the evidences to excite suspicion were slight, it might be impossible to determine whether they were or were not of a character to be regarded as tending to support an issue like the one presented under the first branch of the instruction, without first ascertaining the general characteristics of the mind of the individual who was the subject of the inquiry, and his usual habit in conducting his business affairs. A striking illustration of the difficulty attending the investigation is to be found in the instruction itself, assuming for the present that it must be understood according to the usual import of the language employed. Under its first branch it was necessary, in order to relieve the defendant, that the jury should find that such facts and circumstances were known to the plaintiff as caused him to suspect the title or authority of the holder to transfer the bill. But the jury might come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was thoughtless, confiding, or inattentive on the occasion, and that he in fact took the bill without any such suspicion; and to guard against the effect of such a finding, the second branch of the instruction was framed, and under that it was of no consequence whether the plaintiff himself suspected the title of the holder or not, as the defendant was nevertheless to be fully exonerated if the jury found that such facts and circumstances were known to him as would have caused one of ordinary prudence to suspect, and by ordinary diligence he could have ascertained, the true state of the title. Here was an attempt to prescribe a standard in the investigation, by which the degree of suspicion intended to be required to defeat the claim of the plaintiff could be ascertained and measured by the jury; but under the first branch of the instruction no such attempt was made, and no other criterion was furnished to guide the jury in their deliberations than mere naked suspicion; and consequently, if the jury believed, from the evidence in the case, that the plaintiff at the time of the transfer suspected the title or authority of the holder to pass the bill, no matter how slight his suspicions were, they were directed to return their verdict for the defendant. With this explanation as to the nature of the present inquiry, we will proceed to notice the remaining circumstances relied on as evidence in the case to support the instruction. They consist of the knowledge that the plaintiff is supposed to have acquired at the settlement, that Wallace Sigerson was embarrassed in his business affairs, and of the subsequent conduct of his firm, in forwarding the bill to St. Louis before the maturity of the notes, and the remark in their letter that they did not indorse the bill, as they were selling it for another. These circumstances are consistent with the proposition of fact assumed in the instruction; and though they are susceptible of an entirely different explanation, yet perhaps it would be going too far to say, as matter of law, that they afforded no ground of inference in the direction supposed by the defendant. We think, therefore, that the judgment ought not to be reversed on the ground that there was no evidence in the case to authorize the instruction. We say so, however, in reference to the peculiar issue arising under that instruction, and the form of the questions submitted to the jury, and not in respect to any different issue which may properly arise hereafter in cases of this description. There is a wide difference between suspicion and knowledge in respect to the subject matter under consideration, and even as between the evidences of suspicion, and such as would show gross negligence on the part of a banker or business man when discounting or purchasing negotiable paper transferable by delivery. A person may often suspect in matters of business what in fact he does not believe, and experience teaches that he will sometimes suspect what he has no reason to believe, and that too when the evidences to excite suspicion are so slight that he himself would scorn to acknowledge them as the basis of his action in the premises. Evidence merely tending to show, as in this case, that a party, in acquiring a negotiable bill of exchange or promissory note, suspected the title of the holder at the time of the delivery, would clearly be insufficient to authorize the conclusion that he was guilty of gross negligence when the transfer was made, and it would hardly constitute an approach towards proof that he had knowledge that such holder, who was known to be dealing in such paper, and claimed the right to use it, was guilty of any breach of trust in passing it.

II. The more important question, whether the instruction was correct, remains to be considered; and in approaching that question it becomes necessary in the first place to ascertain what the instruction was, and to deduce from it the principle of commercial law which was applied to the case. It was somewhat peculiar in its language, and, in fact, contained two distinct propositions, differing essentially in certain aspects, and not entirely reconcilable with each other; and yet we cannot doubt that the circuit court, in giving the instruction to the jury, intended to apply the doctrine to the case that the title of the holder of a negotiable bill of exchange acquired before maturity is not protected against prior equities of the antecedent parties to the bill, where it was taken without inquiry, and under circumstances which ought to have excited the suspicions of a prudent and careful man. Such was certainly the general scope of the instruction, especially its second proposition; and such, it may be presumed, was the general principle intended to be embodied in the questions submitted to the jury. They have been so treated here in the oral argument for the plaintiff, and were treated in the same way in the printed argument filed for the defendant. Whether either or both of the questions, in the form in which they were submitted, were objectionable as involving a departure from the doctrine intended to be applied, it will not become necessary to inquire. One thing is certain — if the general principle cannot be sustained, there is nothing in the features of the departure from it, or the particular phraseology of the questions submitted, to benefit the defendant. Undoubtedly the same general idea pervaded the instruction, though the questions were submitted to the jury in different forms, in order to meet the different aspects of the evidence in the case. It was to the effect that, if the plaintiff had acquired the bill under the circumstances described in either branch of the instruction, then he had acted without due caution, and was not entitled to recover. All the other grounds of defense had been provided for in other prayers for instruction. This one was obviously prepared to raise the single question whether the plaintiff had acted with due caution in acquiring the bill, and consequently assumed all the other requisites of a good title in favor of the plaintiff. The only question, therefore, arising under the instruction is, whether the rule of commercial law applied to the case was correct § 423. Bills of exchange are favored instruments.

Bills of exchange are commercial paper in the strictest sense, and must ever be regarded as favored instruments, as well on account of their negotiable quality as their universal convenience in mercantile affairs. They may be transferred by indorsement; or when indorsed in blank, or made payable to bearer, they are transferable by mere delivery. The law encourages their use as a safe and convenient medium for the settlement of balances among mercantile men; and any course of judicial decision calculated to restrain or impede their free and unembarrassed circulation, would be contrary to the soundest principles of public policy. Mercantile law is a system of jurisprudence acknowledged by all commercial nations; and upon no subject is it of more importance that there should be, as far as practicable, uniformity of decision throughout the world.

§ 424. The holder of negotiable paper acquired before due is not affected by suspicious circumstances, but only by actual knowledge of infirmity in the title.

A well-defined and correct exposition of the rights of a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument was given by this court in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, supra), as long ago as 1842; and we adopt that exposition relative to the point under consideration on the present occasion, as one accurately defining the nature and character of the title to those instruments which such holder acquires when they are transferred to him for a valuable consideration.

This court then said, and we now repeat, that a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for a valuable consideration, without notice of facts which impeach its validity between the antecedent parties, if he takes it under an indorsement made before the same becomes due, holds the title unaffected by these facts, and may recover thereon, although, as between the antecedent parties, the transaction may be without any legal validity. That question was not one of new impression at the date of that decision, nor was it so regarded either by the court or the learned judge who gave the opinion; on the contrary, it was declared to be a doctrine so long and so well established, and so essential to the security of negotiable paper, that it was laid up among the fundamentals of the law, and required no authority or reasoning to be brought out in its support; and the opinion on that point was fully approved by every member of the court, and we see no reason to qualify or change it in any respect. Such being the settled law in this court, it would seem to follow as a necessary consequence from the proposition as stated, that if a bill of exchange indorsed in blank, so as to be transferable by delivery, be misappropriated by one to whom it was intrusted, or even if it be lost or stolen, and afterwards negotiated to one having no knowledge of these facts, for a valuable consideration, and in the usual course of business, his title would be good, and that he would be entitled to recover the amount. The law was thus framed, and has been so administered in order to encourage the free circulation of negotiable paper by giving confidence and security to those who receive it for value; and this principle is so comprehensive in respect to bills of exchange and promissory notes, which pass by delivery, that the title and possession are considered as one and inseparable, and in the absence of any explanation the law presumes that a party in possession holds the instrument for value until the contrary is made to appear, and the burden of proof is on the party attempting to impeach the title. These principles are certainly in accordance with the general current of authorities, and are believed to correspond with the general understanding of those engaged in mercantile pursuits. The word notice, as used by this court on the occasion referred to, we think must be understood in the same sense as knowledge, and indeed that is one of its usual and appropriate significations. Where the supposed defect or infirmity in the title of the instrument appears on its face at the time of the transfer, the question whether a party who took it had notice or not is in general a question of construction, and must be determined by the court as matter of law; and so it was understood by this court in Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65, where it is said that "a person who takes a bill which, upon the face of it, was dishonored, cannot be allowed to claim the privileges which belong to a bona fide holder. If he chooses to receive it under such circumstances, he takes it with all the infirmities belonging to it, and is in no better condition than the person from whom he received it." And the same doctrine was adopted and enforced in Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet., 318 (§ 427, infra), where, in speaking of a promissory note, so marked as to show for whose benefit it was to be discounted, this court held that all those dealing in paper "with such marks on its face, must be presumed to have knowledge of what it imported." See Brown v. Davies, 3 Term, 80.

Other cases of like character, where the defect appears on the face of the instrument, are referred to in the printed argument for the defendant as affording a support to the instruction under consideration; but it is so obvious that they can have no such tendency, that we forbear to pursue the subject. Ayer v. Hutchins, 4 Mass., 370; Wiggins v. Bush, 12 John., 305; Cone v. Baldwin, 12 Pick., 545; Brown v. Tabor, 5 Wend., 566. But it is a very different matter when it is proposed to impeach the title of a holder for value, by proof of any facts and circumstances outside of the instrument itself. He is then to be affected, if at all, by what has occurred between other parties, and he may well claim an exemption from any consequences flowing from their acts, unless it be first shown that he had knowledge of such facts and circumstances at the time the transfer was made. Nothing less than proof of knowledge of such facts and circumstances can meet the exigencies of such a defense; else the proposition as stated is not true, that a party who acquires commercial paper in the usual course of business, for value and without notice of any defect in the title, may hold it free of all equities between the antecedent parties to the instrument. Admit the proposition, and the conclusion follows. And the question whether the party had such knowledge or not, is a question of fact for the jury, and, like other disputed questions of scienter, must be submitted to their determination, under the instructions of the court; and the proper inquiry is, did the party, seeking to enforce the payment, have knowledge, at the time of the transfer, of the facts and circumstances which impeach the title, as between the antecedent parties to the instrument? And if the jury find that he did not, then he is entitled to recover, unless the transaction was attended by bad faith, even though the instrument had been lost or stolen. Every one must conduct himself honestly in respect to the antecedent parties, when he takes negotiable paper, in order to acquire a title which will shield him against prior equities. While he is not obliged to make inquiries, he must not wilfully shut his eyes to the means of knowledge which he knows are at hand, as was plainly intimated by Baron Parke in May v. Chapman, 16 Mees. & W., 355, for the reason that such conduct, whether equivalent to notice or not, would be plenary evidence of bad faith. Mere want of care and caution, which was the criterion assumed in the instruction, falls so far below the true standard required by law, which is knowledge of the facts and circumstances that impeach the title, that we feel indisposed to pursue the general discussion, and proceed to confirm the views we have advanced as to what the law is, by referring to some of the decisions in the English courts, from which, as an important source of commercial law, most of our own rules upon the subject have been derived.

The leading case, among the more modern decisions in that country, is that of Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870. That was a case in bank, on a rule nisi, which was made absolute. Lord Denman, in delivering judgment, said: "We are all of opinion that gross negligence only would not be a sufficient answer, where a party has given consideration for the bill; gross negligence may be evidence of mala fides, but it is not the same thing. Where the bill has passed to the plaintiff without any proof of bad faith in him, there is no objection to his title." That case was followed by Uther v. Rich, 10 Ad. & Ell., 784, which was also argued before a full court, and the same learned judge held that the only proper mode of implicating the plaintiff in the alleged fraud by pleading was to aver that he had notice of it, leaving the circumstances by which that notice was to be proved, directly or indirectly, to be established in evidence; and he further held, that an averment that the plaintiff was not a bona fide holder was not equivalent. According to the rule laid down in Goodman v. Harvey, which indubitably is the settled law in all the English courts, proof that the plaintiff had been guilty of gross negligence in acquiring the bill ought not to defeat his right to recover; and if not, it serves to exemplify the magnitude of the error assumed in the instruction, that any.

facts and circumstances which would excite the suspicion of a careful and prudent man were sufficient to destroy the title. It is clear that one or the other of these rules must be incorrect; both cannot be upheld. Gross negligence is defined to consist of the omission of that care which even inattentive and thoughtless men never fail to take of their own property; and if such neglect would not defeat the right to recover—and clearly it would not, unless attended by bad faith,—it cannot require any farther reasoning to demonstrate that the instruction was erroneous. Several cases have been decided in England upon the same subject, and to the same effect, and the rule laid down in Goodman v. Harvey is now adopted and sanctioned by the most approved elementary treatises upon commercial law. Raphael v. Bank of England, 33 Eng. L. & Eq., 276; Stephens v. Foster, 1 Crompt., Mees. & W., 849; Palmer v. Richards, 1 Eng. L. & Eq., 529; Arbouin v. Anderson, 1 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 498; May v. Chapman, 16 Mees. & W., 355; Chitty on Bills, 12th ed., 257; Story on Bills, 3d ed., sec. 416; Byles on Bills, 4th Am. ed., 121–126; Smith's Mer. Law, ed. 1857, 255; Edwards on Bills, 309; 1 Saun. Plea. & Ev., 591; Wheeler v. Guild, 20 Pick., 545; Brush v. Scribner, 11 Conn., 388; Backhouse v. Harrison, 5 Barn. & Add., 1098; Gwynn v. Lee, 9 Gill, 137.

These cases, beyond controversy, confirm the rule laid down by this court in Swift v. Tyson, and they also furnish the fullest evidence, by their harmony each with the other, as well as by their entire consistency with the principal case, that the law has been uniform since the decision in Goodman v. Harvey, which was decided in 1836; and we think it will appear, upon an examination, that it has always been the same, at least from a very early period in the history of English jurisprudence down to the present time, except for an interval of about twelve years, while the doctrine prevailed which is now invoked in support of the instruction in this case. That doctrine had its origin in Gill v. Cubitt, 3 Barn. & Cress., 466, and it was followed by the other cases referred to in the printed argument for defendant. It was decided in 1824, and it is true, as the cases cited abundantly show, that it was acquiesced in for a time as a correct exposition of the commercial law upon the subject under consideration. At the same time it is proper to remark, that there is not wanting respectable authority that it had been much disapproved of before it was directly questioned; and it is certain that, nearly two years before it was finally overruled, Parke, baron, in delivering judgment in Foster v. Pearson, regarded it as mere "dicta," rather than the decision of the judges of the king's bench." See Raphael v. Bank of England, per Cresswell. The reasons assigned for that departure from the long-established rule upon the subject are as remarkable and unsatisfactory as the change was sudden and radical, and yet their particular examination at this time is unnecessary. It is a sufficient answer to the case to say, that it has been distinctly overruled in the tribunal where it was decided, and has not been considered an authority in that court for more than twenty years. The doctrine, says Mr. Chitty in his Treatise on Bills, is now completely exploded, and the old rule of law that the holder of bills of exchange, indorsed in blank and transferable by delivery, can give a title which he does not possess, to a person taking them bona fide for value, is again re-established in its fullest extent. It was not, however, accomplished at a single blow, but the error, so to speak, was literally broken up and destroyed by instalments. The foundation of the superstructure was severely shaken in Crook v. Jadis, 5 Barn. & Ad., 909, when the full bench first came to the conclusion that want of due care and caution were insufficient to constitute a defense, and that gross negligence, at least, must be shown, to defeat a recovery. But it was left to the case of Goodman v. Harvey to announce a complete correction of the error, when Lord Denham declared we have shaken off the last remnant of the contrary doctrine.

A brief reference to some of the earlier cases will be sufficient to show that the decision in Gill v. Cubitt was a departure from the well-known and long-established rule upon the subject under consideration. One of the earliest cases usually referred to is that of Hinton's case, reported in 2 Show., 235. It was an action of the case against the drawer upon a bill of exchange payable to bearer. The court ruled that the holder must entitle himself to it on a consideration; "for if he come to be bearer by casualty or knavery, he shall not have the benefit of it;" and so in Anonymous, 1 Salk., 126, where a bank note payable to A., or bearer, was lost, and found by a stranger, and by him transferred to C., for value. Holt, Ch. J., held that "A. might have trover against the stranger, for he had no title to it, but not against C., by reason of the course of trade, which creates a property in the bearer." And again in Miller v. Race, 1 Burr., 452, where an innkeeper received a bank note from his lodger in the course of business, and paid the balance, Lord Mansfield held he might retain it, as he came by it fairly and bona fide, and for value, and without knowledge that it had been stolen. And on a second occasion, in Grant v. Vaughan, 3 Burr., 1516, where a bill payable to bearer was lost, and the finder passed it to the plaintiff, the same court left it to the jury to find whether he came to the possession fairly and bona fide. But a still stronger case is that of Peacock v. Rhodes, 2 Doug., 633, where a bill of exchange, indorsed in blank, was stolen and passed to the plaintiff by a man not known. It was argued for the defendant that a holder should not in prudence take a bill unless he knew the person. Lord Mansfield answered, "that the law is well settled that a holder coming fairly by a bill has nothing to do with the transaction between the original parties. . . . The question of mala fides was for the consideration of the jury." And lastly, and to the same effect, is Lawson v. Weston, 4 Esp., 56, where a bill of exchange for £500 was lost or stolen, and was discounted by plaintiff for a stranger. It was insisted for the defendant that "a banker or any other person should not discount a bill for one unknown, without using diligence to inquire into the circumstances." Lord Kenyon replied, that "to adopt the principles of the defense would be to paralyze the circulation of all the paper in the country, and with it all its commerce; that the circumstance of the bill having been lost might have been material, if they could bring knowledge of that fact home to the plaintiff." The cases cited, commenced in 1694 and ending in 1801, are sufficient to show what the state of the law was in 1824, when Gill v. Cubitt was decided, especially as the judges of the king's bench, in giving their opinions on that occasion, did not pretend that there were any later decisions in which it had been modified.

§ 425. Surrender of other collaterals and extension of time on principal note is sufficient consideration for note indorsed as collateral.

III. But, assuming that the instruction was erroneous, it is still insisted by the course of the argument for the defendant that it was immaterial; and the argument proceeds upon the ground that the case as made in the bill of exceptions shows that the plaintiff was not the holder of the bill for a valuable consideration in the usual course of business. On the contrary, it is insisted that he held it merely as a collateral security for a pre-existing debt, without any present consideration at the time of the transfer, and that a party who takes negotiable paper under such circumstances does not acquire it in the usual course of business, and consequently takes it subject to prior equities. Whatever may be our impressions in a case like the one supposed, we think the question does not arise in the present record, assuming the facts to be as they are exhibited in the bill of exceptions; and the answer to the argument will be based entirely upon that assumption without prejudice to what may hereafter appear. When the settlement was made, the new notes were given in payment of the prior indebtedness, and the collaterals previously held were surrendered to the defendant, and the time of payment was extended and definitively fixed by the terms of the notes, showing an agreement to give time for the payment of a debt already overdue, and a forbearance to enforce remedies for its recovery; and the implication is very strong that the delay secured by the arrangement constituted the principal inducement to the transfer of the bill. Such a suspension of an existing demand is frequently of the utmost importance to a debtor, and it constitutes one of the oldest titles of the law under the head of forbearance, and has always been considered a sufficient and valid consideration. Elting v. Vanderlyn, 4 John., 237; Morton v. Burn, 7 Ad. & Ell., 19; Baker v. Walker, 14 Mees. & W., 465; Jennison v. Stafford, 1 Cush., 168; Walton v. Mascall, 13 Mees. & W., 453; Com. Dig., Action, Assumpsit, B. 1; Wheeler v. Slocumb, 16 Pick., 52; Story on Prom. Notes, sec. 186, and cases cited. The surrender of other instruments, although held as collateral security, is also a good consideration; and this, as well as the former proposition, is now generally admitted, and is not open to dispute. Dupeau v. Waddington, 6 Whart., 220; Hornblower v. Proud, 2 Barn. & Ald., 327; Ridout v. Bristow, 1 Crompt. & Jer., 231; Bank of Salina v. Babcock, 21 Wend., 499; Youngs v. Lee, 2 Ker., 551. It seems now to be agreed that if there was a present consideration at the time of the transfer, independent of the previous indebtedness, that a party acquiring a negotiable instrument before its maturity as a collateral security to a pre-existing debt, without knowledge of the facts which impeach the title as between the antecedent parties, thereby becomes a holder in the usual course of business, and that his title is complete, so that it will be unaffected by any prior equities between other parties, at least to the extent of the previous debt for which it is held as collateral. White v. Springfield Bank, 3 Sand., S. C., 222; New York M. Iron Works v. Smith, 4 Duer, 362. And the better opinion seems to be, in respect to parol contracts, as a general rule, that there is but one measure of the sufficiency of a consideration, and consequently whatever would have given validity to the bill as between the original parties is sufficient to uphold a transfer like the one in this case. We are not aware that the principle, as thus limited and qualified, is now the subject of serious dispute anywhere, and that is amply sufficient for the decision of this cause. Whether the same conclusion ought to follow where the transfer was without any other consideration than what flows from the nature of the contract at the time of the delivery, and such as may be inferred from the relation of debtor and creditor in respect to the pre-existing debt, is still the subject of earnest discussion, and has given rise to no small diversity of judicial decision. It seems it is regarded as sufficient in England, according to a recent case. Poirier v. Morris, 20 Eng. L. & Eq., 103; Byles on Bills, pp. 96 and 127. A contrary rule prevails in New York, as appears by several decisions. Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns., 637; Stalker v. McDonald, 6 Hill, 93; and also in Tennessee, Napier v. Elam, 6 Yerg., 108. It is settled that it is a sufficient consideration in Massachusetts, Vermont and New Jersey, and such was the opinion of the late Justice Story, as appears from his remarks in Swift v. Tyson, and in his valuable treatise on Bills of Exchange. Stoddard v. Kimball, 6 Cush., 469; Story on Bills, sec. 192; Chicopee Bank v. Chapin, 8 Metc., 40; Blanchard v. Stevens, 3 Cush., 162; Atkinson v. Brooks, 26 Vt., 569; Allaire v. Hartshorne, 1 Zab., 665. We think, however, that the point does not arise in this case for the reasons before stated, and consequently forbear to express any opinion upon the subject. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, with directions to issue a new venire.

DRESSER v. MISSOURI & IOWA RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION COMPANY.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Iowa.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HUNT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought upon three several promissory notes made by the Missouri & Iowa Railway Construction Company, dated November 1, 1872, payable at two, three and four months to the order of William Irwin, for the aggregate amount of $10,000. The defense is made that they were obtained by his fraudulent representations. But a single point requires discussion. Conceding that the present plaintiff received the notes before maturity, and that his holding is bona fide, the question is as to the amount of his recovery. Under the ruling of the court he recovered $500. His contestation is that he is entitled to recover the face of the notes, with interest.

After the evidence was concluded, the plaintiff asked the court to charge the jury that if they believed, from the evidence, that the plaintiff purchased the notes in controversy of William Irwin, for a valuable consideration, on the 1st of November, 1872, and paid $500, part of the consideration, on 21st of January, 1873, before any notice of any fraud in the contract, he was entitled to recover the whole amount of the notes; and the court refused this instruction. But the court charged the jury: "That, in the first place, the jury must find that there was fraud in the inception of the notes as alleged; and that, if the defendants failed to satisfy the jury of that fact, the whole defense fails. That, if the fact of fraud be established, and the jury find, from the evidence, that the plaintiff paid $500 upon the notes, without notice of the fraud, and that, after receiving notice of the fraud, the plaintiff paid the balance due upon the notes, he is protected only pro tanto; that is, to the amount paid before he received notice."

It does not appear that, upon the purchase of the notes in suit, the plaintiff gave his note or other obligation which might, by its transfer, subject him to liability. His agreement seems to have been an oral one merely—to pay the amount agreed upon, as should be required; and he had paid $500, and no more, when notice of the fraud was brought home to him. The argument of the plaintiff in error is, that negotiable paper may be sold for such sum as the parties may agree upon, and that, whether such sum is large or small, the title to the entire paper passes to the purchaser. This is true; and if the plaintiff had bought the notes in suit for $500, before maturity and without notice of any defense, and paid that sum, or given his negotiable note therefor, the authorities cited show that the whole interest in the notes would have passed to him, and he could have recovered the full amount due upon them. Fowler v. Strickland, 107 Mass., 552; Park Bank v. Watson, 42 N. Y., 490; Bank of Michigan v. Green, 33 Ia., 140. The present case differs from the cases referred to in this respect. The notes in question were purchased upon an unexecuted contract, upon which $500 only had been paid when notice of the fraud and a prohibition to pay was received by the purchaser. The residue of the contract on the part of the purchaser is unperformed, and honesty and fair dealing require that he should not perform it; certainly, that he should not be permitted, by performing it, to obtain from the defendants money which they ought not to pay. As to what he pays after notice, he is not a purchaser in good faith. He then pays with knowledge of the fraud, to which he becomes a consenting party. One who pays with knowledge of a fraud is in no better position than if he had not paid at all. He has no greater equity, and receives no greater protection. Such is the rule as to contracts generally. In the case of the sale of real estate for a sum payable in instalments, and circumstances occur showing the existence of fraud, or that it would be inequitable to take the title, the purchaser can recover back the sum paid before notice of the fraud, but not that paid afterwards. Barnard v. Campbell, 53 N. Y., 73; Lewis v. Bradford, 10 Watts, 82; Juvenal v. Jackson, 2 Harris, 529; id., 430; Youst v. Martin, 3 S. & R., 423, 430. In Weaver v. Barden, 49 N. Y., 291, the court use this language: "To entitle a purchaser to the protection of a court of equity, as against a legal title or a prior equity, he must not only be a purchaser without notice, but he must be a purchaser for a valuable consideration; that is, for value paid. Where a man purchases an estate, pays part and gives bonds for the residue, notice of an equitable incumbrance, before payment of the money, though after giving the bond, is sufficient. Tourville v. Naish, 3 P. Wms., 306; Story v. Lord Windsor, 2 Atk., 630. Mere security to pay the purchase price is not a purchase for a valuable consideration. Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk., 304; Maundrell v. Maundrell, 10 Ves., 246, 271; Jackson v. Cadwell, 1 Cowen, 622; Jewell v. Palmer, 7 J. C., 65. The decisions are placed upon the ground, according to Lord Hardwicke, that if the money is not actually paid, the purchaser is not hurt. He can be released from his bond in equity."

The plaintiff here occupies the same position as the bona fide purchaser of the first of a series of notes; of which, after notice of a fraud, he purchases the rest of the series. He is protected so far as his good faith covers the purchase, and no farther. Upon receiving notice of the fraud, his duty was to refuse further payment; and the facts before us required such refusal by him. Authorities supra. Crandell v. Vickery, 45 Barb., 156, is in point. Holdridge had obtained the indorsement by Vickery of his (Holdridge's) notes by false and fraudulent representations. These notes were transferred to Crandell without notice or knowledge of the fraud, he giving to Holdridge several checks for the amount, upon the understanding that they were not to be presented for payment, but, when the money was wanted, he was to give new checks as needed. Before giving the new checks, plaintiff was informed of the fraud, and requested not to make payment, or to give his checks. He did, however, give his new checks, according to the original agreement, and brought suit upon the notes against Vickery, the indorser. It was held that he was not a bona fide holder, for the reason that the transaction was executory when he received notice of the fraud; that he had then parted with no value; that the real obligations were given afterwards, and under circumstances that afforded no protection. That case is stronger for the holder than the one before us, in the fact that checks were there given on the original transaction, which might have been presented or passed off to the prejudice of the maker; while here the transaction was oral throughout. To the same purport in principle, although upon facts somewhat different, are the cases of Garland v. Salem Bank, 9 Mass., 408; Fulton Bank v. Phoenix Bank, 1 Hall, 562, and White v. Springfield Bank, 3 Sandf., S. C., 227.

The cases are numerous that where a bona fide holder takes a note misappropriated, fraudulently obtained, or without consideration as collateral security, he holds for the amount advanced upon it, and for that amount only. Williams v. Smith, 2 Hill, 301. In Allaire v. Hartshorn, 1 Zab., 663, the case was this: Hartshorn sued Allaire on a note of $1,500 at ninety days, made by Allaire. It was proved that the note had been misapplied by one Pettis, to whom it had been intrusted; that he had pledged it to the plaintiff as security for $750 borrowed of him on Hegeman's check, and also as security for a $400 acceptance of another party then given up to Pettis. On the trial, the court charged the jury that, if any consideration was given by the plaintiff for the note, "they should not limit their verdict to the amount so given, but should find the whole amount due on the face of the note." The case was carried to the court of errors and appeals of the state of New Jersey, upon an exception to this charge. The court reversed the judgment, holding that, although a bona fide holder, Hartshorn could recover only the amount of his advances. The case before us is governed by the rule that the portion of an unperformed contract which is completed after notice of a fraud is not within the principle which protects a bona fide purchaser. No respectable authority has been cited to us sustaining a contrary position, nor have we been able to find any. The judgment below is based upon authority, and upon the soundest principles of honesty and fair dealing. It has our concurrence, and is affirmed.

FOWLER v. BRANTLY.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Alabama.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CATRON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action of assumpsit by the assignee of a note against the makers. The questions of law arising in this cause depend on the construction of a note of hand in the following words:

"SELMA, DALLAS COUNTY, ALABAMA, March 1, 1836.

"Eleven months after date, we, Harris Brantly, Peyton S. Graves and Hugh Ferguson, jointly and severally, promise to pay Andrew Armstrong, cashier, or bearer, $2,000, value received, negotiable and payable at the Branch Bank of the State of Alabama, at Mobile.

(Signed)

"HARRIS BRANTLY,
"PEYTON S. GRAVES,
"HUGH FERGUSON.

"Credit: Diego M'Voy.

"HARRIS BRANTLY,
"PEYTON S. GRAVES,
"HUGH FERGUSON."

The note had on it the two indorsements of Diego M'Voy and William D. Primrose, and that of Taulmin, Hazard & Company was stricken out. On the face of the note there was, in pencil, the figures 169. The defendants, the three makers, introduced evidence to prove that the note, in its present form (except the indorsements), was sent by one of the makers to M'Voy, who was his factor in Mobile, to be offered for discount in the Branch Bank of the State in that city as an accommodation note, the proceeds of which were to be forwarded to said maker; that the note was offered for discount, and rejected. The factor then proposed to raise money on the note for his own use, without the knowledge of the makers, and intended to conceal the appropriation of the note from them. The first person to whom he offered to sell the note deemed the attempt a fraud and refused to purchase. M'Voy then indorsed and transferred the note to Primrose for $1,200, communicating to him it had been offered for discount at the bank and rejected. Taulmin, Hazard & Company held a note for $3,250, on Black, indorsed by Vail and Dade and by Primrose, and which was past due, to discharge which in part Primrose transferred the note in controversy to Taulmin, Hazard & Company, and Taulmin, Hazard & Company indorsed the same, before its maturity, to the plaintiff, Fowler, and received credit on their account, they being largely indebted to him at the time.

The leading feature in the cause, involving the principle on which it turns, is this: the note was in the form prescribed by the bank to those who desired accommodations at it, which form was not in use before its adoption there. The memorandum on the left-hand side of the note, and signed by the drawers, was designed to show the officers of the bank to whose credit the money was to be placed should the note be discounted, and, by the usages of the bank, no other person than the one thus named could receive the money. Primrose testified he knew from the pencil mark on the face of the note it had been offered for discount and refused when he purchased it. The cashier proved the pencil mark was made, according to the usage of the bank, on all notes offered for discount and refused. To a part of the first instruction that held, if the plaintiff took the note in payment of a pre-existing debt due to him from Taulmin, Hazard & Company, then the jury ought to find for the defendants, exception is taken; and the court refused to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff took the note fairly in payment of a debt due to him before its maturity, without notice of the purpose for which M'Voy had held it, then he was entitled to recover; and also refused to instruct, if the jury believed plaintiff took the note bona fide in payment of a previous debt, that he had no notice of any fraud, and there were no circumstances to put him upon an inquiry into any fraud committed on the part of M'Voy, he was entitled to recover. There were other instructions asked and refused, but, as they are, in effect, the same as those recited, an answer to which will cover the whole case, they need not be further noticed.

§ 427. Restrictive indorsement, together with mark showing refusal of bank to discount note, held to be notice.

The known customs of the bank, and its ordinary modes of transacting business, including the prescribed forms of notes offered for discount, were matters of proof and entered into the contract, and the parties to it must be understood as having governed themselves by such customs and modes of doing business; and this whether they had actual knowledge of them or not; and it was especially the duty of all those dealing for the paper in question to ascertain them if unknown. Such is the established doctrine of this court as laid down in Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 581 (§§ 754-759, infra); Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 431 (§§ 958-963, infra), and the Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet., 32, 33 (§§ 760-768, infra).

The note sued on is peculiar in its form; it was made for the purposes of discount, and only intended for negotiation at the bank, and not for circulation out of it. The pencil mark on its face when sold was common to all rejected paper, and was put there by the officers of the bank as evidence of the fact that it had been offered and rejected, and those dealing for it with the mark on its face must be presumed to have had knowledge what it imported, as the slightest inquiry would have ascertained its meaning. These were the legal presumptions attached to the contract when the plaintiff purchased it, and the explanatory evidence to prove the customs of the bank was introduced to enlighten the court and jury in regard to the rules governing the transaction, and furnishing the law of the case, and which the plaintiff, when he purchased the paper, is presumed to have known and understood as the court knew and understood it after it was proved on the trial. This was the case made up of law and fact on which the court was asked to charge the jury, and not the abstract proposition whether, on a proper construction of the statutes of Alabama, negotiable paper, payable in bank, purchased bona fide and without notice of an existing infirmity, but taken in discharge of a pre-existing debt, carried the infirmity with it into the hands of the purchaser, for the reason that the mode of payment was not in the usual course of trade. A note overdue or bill dishonored is a circumstance of suspicion to put those dealing for it afterwards on their guard, and in whose hands it is open to the same defenses it was in the hands of the holder when it fell due. 13 Pet., 79. After maturity such paper cannot be negotiable "in the due course of trade," although still assignable. So the paper before us carried on its face circumstances of suspicion so palpable as to put those dealing for it, before maturity, on their guard, and as to require at their hands strict inquiry into the title of those through whose hands it had passed. Failing to be thus diligent, they must abide by the misfortune their negligence imposed, and stand in the condition of M'Voy. As between him and the defendants, there was no contract or liability on their part; nor as bearer of the note could he lawfully pass it off in the due course of trade, so as to communicate a better title to another, the face of the paper betraying its character and purposes and M'Voy's want of authority.

All the rulings of the court below must be referred to this paper and to the special case made by the proofs. Any instruction asked, which cannot be given to the whole extent asked, may be simply refused, or it may be modified, at the discretion of the court. No instruction was asked that could have been lawfully given; to every one the court could well say, and did in substance say, that under no circumstances could a purchase of this note be made by the plaintiff from Taulmin, Hazard & Co., so as to exempt it in the hands of the assignee from the infirmity it was subject to in the hands of M'Voy. And in regard to the last part of the first instruction, where the jury is in substance told that if they believed the note was taken in payment of a pre-existing debt due to plaintiff from Taulmin, Hazard & Co., still they should find for the defendants, the court might have gone further and instructed the jury that neither could the plaintiff recover had the note been purchased bona fide, and without notice of the fraudulent conduct of M'Voy. The judgment is, therefore, ordered to be affirmed.

LEMOINE v. BANK OF NORTH AMERICA.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 3 Dillon, 44-52. 1874.)

Opinion by DILLON, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—On the facts found by the district court, upon which, by stipulation, the cause is submitted to this court, it is to be taken as true that the notes in question were indorsed with the firm name of Earickson & Boyd solely for the accommodation of White Brothers, the makers, without any consideration to the indorsers therefor. It is also to be taken as true that this indorsement of the firm name was made by Earickson, without the knowledge or consent of Boyd, and against the express stipulation on this subject in their articles of copartnership, and that the notes, when thus indorsed, were returned to the possession of the makers, from whom the bank received them, and at whose instance it discounted them, and who, through the checks of Earickson, drawn in the firm name, received the proceeds of the transaction. There is no finding or agreement that the indorsement of the firm name was made in accordance with any habit of dealing of the firm known to Boyd, or that there was with Boyd's knowledge such a course of dealing as respects accommodation indorsements in the firm name as to justify an inference of Earickson's authority to bind the firm in this manner.

I concede that in favor of third persons acting in good faith it is a presumption of law that notes indorsed in the name of the firm were indorsed on the partnership account, and hence the indorsement on the notes in question will bind the firm, unless it appears that the bank had notice that the indorsement was made outside of the partnership affairs. Story on Notes, sec. 72; Byles on Bills, 47; Austin v. Vandermark, 4 Hill (N. Y.), 259, 262, per Nelson, C. J. But inasmuch as the settled rule of law is that it is not within the general scope of one partner to bind the firm by contracts of suretyship or to issue accommodation paper in the name of the firm for third persons, if the bank had notice that this was an accommodation indorsement, the burden of proof is upon it to show the assent of the other partners (either expressly or from the firm's course of dealing in this respect) or their subsequent ratification. Byles on Bills, 47, and cases cited in the notes. If, therefore, the bank discounted these notes without notice of the fact that the name of the firm had been indorsed upon them by one of the partners without the consent of the other and for the accommodation of the makers, it is entitled to hold the firm upon the indorsement, although in point of fact it was placed there by one of the partners in fraud of the rights of his copartner, or without authority from him. And the question on which the case turns is whether the bank had such notice, for it is not attempted to show that Earickson had authority from Boyd, express or implied, to make the indorsement. The bank is sought to be affected with such notice by virtue of the fact that after the notes bore the indorsement of the firm they were in the hands of the makers, who met one of the directors of the bank when on his way to a meeting of the board of directors, and giving him the notes asked him to have them discounted for the makers. It does not appear that the director informed the board of whom he had received the notes, but this is not material, for the learned counsel for the bank conceded on the argument that he supposed the law to be that the board or the bank would be chargeable with the knowledge of the director thus obtained.

§ 429. Possession by maker, before maturity, of an indorsed note is notice that the indorsement is for his accommodation.

Thus viewed, the real question in the case is reduced to this: Does the fact that the maker is in possession of a note before maturity, indorsed by another, affect the bank that receives it from the maker and discounts it for him, with the notice that it was indorsed for the maker's accommodation? At the bar counsel stated that they had been unable to find any adjudged cases upon the exact point, and they argued it on general principles. In view of the nature of the notice required to defeat the rights of the holder for value of commercial paper, as settled by the supreme court of the United States in Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343 (§§ 420-425, supra), I was at first impressed in favor of the bank; but subsequent reflection has brought me to an opposite conclusion. To make accommodation paper is so entirely extra the business of a partnership and the legitimate authority of a partner, that the presumption is against, and properly against, the power of one partner thus to bind his co-partners; for suretyship, it has been well remarked, is "a contract which carries with it a lesion by its very nature." Louisiana, etc., Bank v. Nav. Co., 3 La. Ann., 294. Therefore, when a bank has knowledge that an indorsement of the name of a firm is an accommodation indorsement, it is bound at its peril to ascertain whether the members of the firm on whom it intends to rely assented to this use of its name. This it can easily do. While on the other hand, if the bank were entitled to presume that the other members of the firm assented, the presumption would in many instances, as in the case before us, be contrary to the fact, and highly disastrous to innocent partners, who would be without the means of guarding against the fraudulent use of the copartnership name in unauthorized transactions.

If the facts of the case as found by the district court be considered there can be little doubt that the bank knew the discount was for the benefit of White Brothers, and, consequently, that the indorsement of Earickson & Boyd was presumptively, as it was in fact, for the accommodation of the makers. On examination I find several cases distinctly asserting this to be law, and have not met with any holding a different view. When a note not due is taken by the makers to a bank for discount for their account, with an indorsement thereon, the presumption, unless there is something in the transaction to rebut it, is that the indorsers are sureties for the maker, and that they did not indorse it in the ordinary course of business. Upon this subject, Mr. Chancellor Walworth, in Stall v. Catskill Bank, 18 Wend., 466, holds this language: "If, therefore, it appears from the face of the paper that the partnership name is signed as surety for some other person, the party who takes the note from such person has actual notice of the fact that it is not signed in the ordinary course of partnership business. He must, therefore, at his peril, make the necessary inquiries and ascertain that there is some special authority for one partner to sign the partnership name as such surety, express or implied. So if the drawer of a note carries it to the bank to get it discounted on his own account, or transfers it to a third person, with the name of the firm indorsed thereon, the transaction, on its face, shows that it is a mere accommodation indorsement, or the note would not be in the hands of the drawer; and the bank or person who thus receives it from the drawer, being thus chargeable with the notice that the firm are mere sureties of the drawer, and that it has not passed through their hands in the ordinary course of partnership business, the members of the firm, who have been made sureties without their consent, are not liable to such holder of the note." This language was quoted and approved by Mr. Chief Justice Sawyer, in giving the judgment of the supreme court of California in Hendrie v. Berkowitz, 37 Cal., 113, 1869, and in which the court distinctly held, in a case precisely like the one now before the court, that the presumption was that the indorsement was an accommodation indorsement, and that the burden of proving the consent of the member who did not write the indorsement is upon the holder. So, in Overton v. Hardin, 6 Coldw., 375, 1869, the supreme court of Tennessee said: "There can be no doubt that the possession of an indorsed note by the maker is presumptive evidence that it was indorsed for his accommodation. Edwards on Bills, 103, 105; Brown v. Taber, 5 Wend., 566; Erwin v. Shaffer, 9 Ohio St., 43."

In this last case Brinkerhoff, J., says: "That although an indorsed note in the hands of the maker after due is presumed to have performed its office, and to have been paid off and taken up by the maker, yet no such presumption arises in the case of such a note before due; but that on the contrary, in such case, it is a matter of legal presumption that the note is unsatisfied, and is indorsed and placed in the hands of the maker for his accommodation. Wallace v. The Branch Bank, 1 Ala., 565; Mauldin v. The Branch Bank, 2 Ala., 502; Stall v. Catskill Bank, 18 Wend., 478." See, also, language of Mr. Justice Nelson in Bank of Rochester v. Bowen, 7 Wend., 159; Byles on Bills, 47, and note.

§ 431. The indorsement hereinbefore mentioned not binding on the firm, but on Earickson alone.

The amount of the notes less the discount was, in accordance with a usage of the bank, placed to the credit of the last indorsers, in this case Earickson & Boyd, and was drawn out on the two checks of Earickson & Boyd, signed by Earickson, without the knowledge of Boyd, in favor of White Brothers. One of these checks showed on its face that it was for the proceeds of the note discounted, and the amount of each showed that it was for the note transactions. It is insisted that this makes the indorsement binding on both. This view rests upon the ground of ratification by Boyd; but the essential element of knowledge on his part, both of the fact of the indorsement and of the check being drawn, is wanting. The checks do not, therefore, change the rights of Boyd, or make binding upon him his partner's act in indorsing the firm's name to the notes in question. The district court erred in holding that the two notes were a claim upon the firm assets. The indorsement is alone binding upon Earickson.

Judgment accordingly.

COLLINS v. GILBERT.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Western District of Pennsylvania.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action on an acceptance of a draft, drawn by Collins & Co. to their own order, and indorsed by them in blank. Collins & Co. were sub-contractors, under Barnes, for the grading of a railroad, and the draft was given to Barnes as security for advances. The draft was accepted by Thomas Collins, and the action is against him by Gilbert & Gay. Further facts appear in the opinion.

§ 432. Presumption that transferees are bona fide holders for value, without notice.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Transferees of a negotiable instrument, such as a bill of exchange or promissory note payable subsequent to its date, hold the instrument clothed with the presumption that it was negotiated for value in the usual course of business at the time of its execution, and without notice of any equities between the prior parties to the instrument.

Instruments of the kind are commercial paper in the strictest sense, and must ever be regarded as favored instruments, as well on account of their negotiable quality as their universal convenience in mercantile affairs. They may be transferred by indorsement, or, when indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer, they are transferable by mere delivery. Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 365 (§§ 420-425, supra); Wheeler v. Guild, 20 Pick. (Mass.), 545; Noxon v. De Wolf, 10 Gray (Mass.), 346; Magee v. Badger, 34 N. Y., 249.

Possession of such an instrument payable to bearer, or indorsed in blank, is prima facie evidence that the holder is the proper owner and lawful possessor of the same; and nothing short of fraud, not even gross negligence, if unattended with mala fides, is sufficient to overcome the effect of that evidence, or to invalidate the title of the holder supported by that presumption. Story on Bills (4th ed.), sec. 416; Byles on Bills (10th ed.), 119; Chitty on Bills (12th ed.), 257; Mills v. Barber, 1 Mees. & W., 425; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall., 110; Bank of Pittsburgh v. Neal, 22 How., 96 (§§ 405-407, supra). Apply that rule in a suit in the name of the transferee against the maker, and it is clear that he has nothing to do in the opening of his case except to prove the signatures to the instrument, and introduce the same in evidence, as the instrument goes to the jury clothed with the presumption that the plaintiff became the holder of the same for value at its date, in the usual course of business, without notice of anything to impeach his title. Bank v. Leighton, Law Rep., 2 Exch., 61; Pettee v. Prout, 3 Gray (Mass.), 503; Way v. Richardson, 3 id., 413. Clothed as the instrument is with those presumptions, the plaintiff is not bound to introduce any evidence to show that he gave value for the same until the other party has clearly proved that the consideration of the instrument was illegal, or that it was fraudulent in its inception, or that it had been lost or stolen before it came to the possession of the holder. Uther v. Rich, 10 Ad. & Ell., 784; Bailey v. Bidwell, 13 Mees. & W., 73; Arbouin v. Anderson, 1 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 504; Bank v. Fagan, 7 Moore, P. C., 76; Fitch v. Jones, 5 Ed. & Bl., 238; Smith v. Braine, 16 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 251; Hall v. Featherstone, 3 Hurlst. & N., 286.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Sufficient appears to show that the drawers of the draft described in the declaration were sub-contractors to grade seven miles of a railroad referred to in the affidavit of defense, and that they were to be paid monthly for work done, subject to a certain deduction to be retained as a security for the completion of their contract. Moneys received from the monthly payments being insufficient for the purpose, they were unable to complete their undertaking without an advance from the principal contractor. What they wanted was an advance of $8,000; and it appears that the contractor was willing to make it if they would give him the acceptance of the defendant in the same amount, as a security that they would perform their contract.

Pursuant to that arrangement, they drew their draft upon the defendant in that amount, payable to the order of their senior partner; and the record shows that the draft was accepted by the defendant, and was duly indorsed by the payee. Beyond doubt, the draft was duly executed and delivered to the contractor as security for the performance of the contract of the drawers of the instrument. By its terms it was payable in ninety days from date; and it must be assumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the plaintiffs became the holders of the same before maturity. Payment being refused, the plaintiffs instituted the present suit to recover the amount. Process was served, and the defendant appeared and pleaded that he never accepted the draft, and that he never promised in manner and form, as alleged in the declaration. Subsequently the parties went to trial, and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs. Exceptions were filed by the defendant, and he sued out the present writ of error.

Six offers of proof were made by the defendant in the course of the trial, all of which were excluded by the court, subject to the exception of the defendant. Four of the rulings of the court in that regard are now assigned for error, and they present the only matters of controversy exhibited in the record. Rulings of the kind, not assigned for error, may be dismissed without remark; nor would the other two exceptions have required much examination, even if they had been assigned for error, as they involve substantially the same questions as those presented by the other rulings of the court.

1. Testimony having been introduced by the defendant that one of the plaintiffs was informed, before the draft came into their hands, that the contractor had agreed to advance money to enable the sub-contractors to pay their employees, they, the sub-contractors, giving the defendant an acceptance as security in lieu of retained percentage, the defendant proposed to ask the witness what was the arrangement between the sub-contractors and the contractor, by virtue of which the defendant's acceptance was obtained; to which the plaintiffs objected, and the court excluded the question. 2. Evidence having been given by the same witness that there was an arrangement between the sub-contractors and the contractor to the effect that the latter would advance money to the former to pay their men upon their giving to the contractor the defendant's acceptance, to be retained by him in lieu of the stipulated percentage, the defendant proposed to show by the same witness that the work was finished by the defendant, and that by the terms of the contract all of the percentage retained became due and payable when the contract was completed; which offer of proof was objected to by the plaintiffs, and was ruled out by the court. 3. Complete execution of the draft is not denied; but the theory of the defendant is that the contractor took the same of the sub-contractors in lieu of retained percentage; and he proposed to show that the sub-contractors subsequently abandoned their contract, and that the defendant, at the suggestion of the contractor, finished the same, he agreeing that if the defendant would complete the work, he, the contractor, would return the acceptance; and that the defendant never got either the percentage or the acceptance; to which the plaintiffs objected, and the court excluded the testimony. 4. Finally the defendant proposed to show that the contractor, when the acceptance was delivered to him, was indebted to the sub-contractors for retained percentage in excess of the amount of the acceptance; which was also objected to by the plaintiffs, and was excluded by the court.

Properly analyzed and construed, it is quite obvious that these several offers of proof present but a single question, and that they serve to illustrate very fully the different theories of law maintained by the respective parties in respect to such commercial instruments. Throughout the trial the plaintiffs contended that they were the bona fide holders for value of the acceptance, having received the same before maturity in the usual course of business, and that they held a good title to the instrument, unless the defendant could show that they had notice of such facts as were sufficient to impeach the title between the antecedent parties, or that the consideration of the instrument was illegal, or that it was fraudulent in its inception, or that it had been lost or stolen before it came to their possession. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 15 (§§ 332-336, supra). Due delivery of the executed draft to the contractor indorsed in blank is admitted; but the theory of the defendant is that the contractor received it merely as security that the sub-contractors would perform their contract, and that the contractor caused it to be discounted without authority. Neither illegality of consideration nor fraud in the inception of the instrument is charged or pretended; nor is it alleged that the acceptance had been lost or stolen before the plaintiffs received it for discount. Instead of that, the theory of the defendant assumes that the contractor became the lawful holder of the acceptance indorsed in blank for the specified purpose, which is an implied admission that the acceptance was one of a class of commercial instruments which may be transferred by delivery. Suppose that is so, still it is insisted by the defendant that evidence is admissible in such a case to show that the first holder under such circumstances appropriated the acceptance to a use other than that for which it was delivered to him, and that proof of such a misappropriation is sufficient to impeach the title of a subsequent holder for value, even though it came into his possession before maturity in the usual course of business.

Where the supposed defect or infirmity in the title of the instrument appears on its face at the time of the transfer, the question, whether the party who took it had notice or not, is, in general, a question of construction, and must be determined by the court as matter of law. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65; Fowler v. Brantly, 14 id., 318 (§ 427, supra); Brown v. Davies, 3 Term R., 86. But it is a very different matter when it is proposed to impeach the title of a holder for value by proof of any facts and circumstances outside of the instrument itself. He is then to be affected, if at all, by what has occurred between other parties, and he may well claim exemption from any consequences flowing from their acts, unless it be first shown that he had knowledge of such facts and circumstances at the time the transfer was made. Nothing less than proof of that character can meet the exigencies of such a defense, if it be true that a party who acquires commercial paper for value in the usual course of business may, if it was acquired before maturity and without notice of any defect in the title, hold it free of all equities between the antecedent parties to the instrument. Indorsees of negotiable bills of exchange and promissory notes enjoyed the benefit of that rule for ages before any attempt was made to annex any qualification to it, unless it appeared that the consideration was illegal, or that the instrument was fraudulent in its inception, or that it had been lost or stolen before it came to the possession of the holder. Hinton's Case, 2 Show., 235; Anonymous, 1 Salk., 126; Miller v. Race, 1 Burr., 462; Grant v. Vaughan, 3 id., 1516; Peacock v. Rhodes, 2 Doug., 633; Lawson v. Weston, 4 Esp., 56. Attempt was subsequently made to qualify that right of a bona fide holder, and to establish the rule that, if the indorser of the instrument had no valid title to the same, and that such facts and circumstances were known to the indorsee at the time of the transfer as would have caused a person of ordinary prudence to suspect that the indorser had no right to transfer the instrument or to use the same for his own benefit, then the holder, as against the acceptor or maker, is not entitled to recover. Gill v. Cubitt, 3 Barn. & Cress., 466. Though the modified rule was never satisfactory, yet it must be admitted that it was followed for a time in many jurisdictions. But it is unnecessary to discuss that topic, as the case referred to has been distinctly overruled in the tribunal where it was decided, and has not been considered an authority there for more than forty years. Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870. Abundant authority for that proposition is found in the cases already cited, and Mr. Chitty says that the old rule of law, that the holder of bills of exchange, indorsed in blank and transferable by delivery, can give a title which he does not possess to a person taking the same bona fide for value, is again re-established in its fullest extent. Chitty on Bills (12th ed.), 257. Speaking upon that subject, the supreme court of Massachusetts said that it was once held that the holder of a bill of exchange or promissory note fraudulently put in circulation must show that he had used due and reasonable caution in taking it; but the court proceeds to say that it has since been definitively adjudged that if he took the instrument in good faith he is entitled to recover on it, and that even gross negligence is not tantamount to fraud, though it may be given in evidence as tending to prove that charge; that the burden of proving good faith is all the burden which the law imposes on such a holder. Worcester Bank v. Dorchester Bank, 10 Cush. (Mass.), 491. Conclusive support to that conclusion is found in the authorities which the court cite for that purpose, among which are the following: Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870; Arbouin v. Anderson, 1 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 504. We must hold, said Lord Denman, in the case last cited, that the owner of a bill of exchange is entitled to recover upon it if he has come by it honestly, and that that fact is implied prima facie by possession; that, to meet the inference so raised, fraud, felony, or some such matter, must be proved. Smith v. Sac County, 11 Wall., 146.

Instruments of the kind are intended for circulation, and Shaw, Ch. J., says that the law is so framed to give confidence and security to those who receive them, for valuable consideration, in the ordinary course of business, when payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, so as to be transferable by delivery; and he adds that, in general, a party taking such an instrument under such circumstances has only to look to the credit of the parties to it, and the regularity and genuineness of the signatures and indorsements. So that if such a bill or note be made without consideration, or be lost or stolen, and afterwards be negotiated for a valuable consideration, in the usual course of business, to one who has no knowledge of those facts, his title is good, and he shall be entitled to receive the amount. Wheeler v. Guild, 20 Pick. (Mass.), 545. Title and possession in such a case are, in general, considered one and inseparable, and it will be presumed that a party thus in possession of such an instrument holds it for value until the contrary appears, and the burden of proof is on the party impeaching his title. Collins v. Martin, 1 Bos. & Pull., 648; Bank v. Hoge, 35 N. Y., 68; Phelan v. Moss, 67 Penn. St., 63; Raphael v. Bank, 17 C. B., 171. In order to defeat the rights of a bona fide holder for value of a promissory note, which it is claimed was procured by fraud, it must be shown, either directly or by circumstances, that he had notice of such infirmity. Proof of such facts and circumstances as would have put a reasonable man upon inquiry in relation thereto are not sufficient to constitute a defense to a suit by the holder. Lake v. Reed, 29 Ia., 359; Gage v. Sharp, 24 id., 15. Adjudged cases to support those propositions are very numerous, and it is equally well settled that where a negotiable bill or note is given in evidence duly indorsed, the legal presumption is that such indorsement was made at the date of the instrument, or at least antecedently to its becoming due; and the rule is, that if the defendant would avail himself of any defense not open to him, unless the bill or note was negotiated after it was dishonored, it is incumbent on him to show that the indorsement was in fact made after the instrument was overdue. Ranger v. Cary, 1 Metc. (Mass.), 373; Noxon v. De Wolf, 10 Gray (Mass.), 347.

Actual possession of a negotiable instrument, payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, is plenary evidence of title in the holder "until other evidence is produced to control it;" but if to an action on the same "the defendant pleads that it was illegal in its inception, and that the plaintiff took it without value, the illegality being proved, the onus is cast upon the plaintiff to prove that he gave value." Smith v. Braine, 16 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 250; Bailey v. Bidwell, 13 Mees. & W., 73. Proof of gross negligence is not sufficient to overcome the prima facie presumption of title arising from possession; but if it be alleged and proved that the instrument had its inception in illegality or fraud, a presumption arises from that proof that the plaintiff took it without value, or, in other words, it so far shifts the burden of proof, that, unless the plaintiff gives satisfactory evidence that he gave value for the same, the defense will prevail. Fitch v. Jones, 5 Ell. & Bl., 246; Harvey v. Towers, 6 Hurlst. & G., 656. Where there are circumstances in the nature of fraud or illegality which can properly be left to the jury, proof of those circumstances by the defendant will cast on the plaintiff the onus of showing that he gave value for the bill or note. Hall v. Featherstone, 3 id., 287; Mills v. Barber, 1 Mees. & W., 432. Negotiable instruments are expressed to be for value, and, if payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, they pass by delivery from hand to hand, clothed with that presumption; nor is that presumption overcome, where the suit is in the name of a subsequent holder, by proof that the indorsement was for the accommodation of the maker. If it appears that the bill or note was obtained by fraud, or that it had been stolen before it came to the possession of the holder, then the presumption may arise that the holder did not pay full consideration for it, because in such a case it is probable that the person obtaining the instrument would pass it away for less than its full value. But where there is only the simple fact that it was an accommodation bill or note, then the inference is that the holder did give value for it, because that was the very object for which the instrument was given. Percival v. Frampton, 2 Crompt., M. & R., 183; Seybel v. Bank, 54 N. Y., 291. Decided cases almost without number support that proposition; but if the note or bill is founded in fraud, or was fraudulently obtained and put in circulation, the indorsee must prove that he paid value for it before he can recover the amount. Tucker v. Morrill, 1 Allen (Mass.), 528; Maither v. Maidstone, 1 C. B., N. S., 287; Sisternans v. Field, 9 Gray (Mass.), 337; Brush v. Scribner, 11 Conn., 390.

Tested by these several considerations, it is clear that there is no error in the record.

TRUST COMPANY v. NATIONAL BANK.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case as made by the bill, answers, replications and proofs is as follows: On the 24th day of September, 1874, the First National Bank of Wyandotte, Kansas, made its promissory note at Chicago, Illinois, in these words:

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, Sept. 24, 1874.

“Four months after date we promise to pay to Cook County National Bank of Chicago, or order, five thousand dollars, with interest at the rate of — per cent. per annum after due, value received, all payable at Cook County National Bank.

“B. JUDD,

“Cashier 1st Nat'l Bank, Wyandotte, Ka's.

“$6,000 Wyandotte Co. and city bonds as collateral.”

The note was made and delivered to the Cook County Bank in pursuance of an arrangement between that bank and Judd, the cashier of the Wyandotte Bank, by which it was agreed the latter should execute a four months' note for $5,000, with security, and have the same discounted by the Cook County Bank, and the proceeds placed to the credit of the Wyandotte Bank, but not to be drawn against, so as to reduce the credit for such proceeds below $4,000,—such note to remain with the Cook County Bank, and to be surrendered to the maker on the renewal or close of the account. It was distinctly understood between the officers of the two banks when the note was given that it should be held by the Cook County Bank as a memorandum, and not be negotiated or separated from the Wyandotte city and county bonds for $6,000 accompanying it, which were delivered contemporaneously with it as collaterals. Accordingly, the sum of $4,000, part of the proceeds of the discount, was suffered to remain on deposit to the credit of the Wyandotte Bank, until the Cook County Bank failed, became insolvent, and passed into the hands of a receiver. At the time of such failure and the appointment of a receiver there was also an additional credit of $868 due from the Cook County Bank to the Wyandotte Bank. When, therefore, the note matured there was due from the payee to the maker of the note the sum of $4,868. But before its maturity, to wit, on the 7th day of October, 1874, the Cook County Bank, in violation of its agreement above mentioned, passed the note to the New York State Loan and Trust Company, by which it was discounted, without any knowledge of any defense which the Wyandotte Bank had against it, or any knowledge of the origin of the note and of the agreement between the two banks, other than what the face of the note revealed. The note was protested when it fell due, and it is now held by the Central Trust Company of New York, the receiver of the New York State Loan and Trust Company, and the collaterals, the municipal bonds, are held still by the Cook County Bank.

This bill has been filed to compel its surrender and the surrender of the Wyandotte city and county bonds on the payment of $132, the difference between $5,000 and $4,868, the sum standing to the credit of the Wyandotte Bank against the payee, the claimant offering to pay that sum. In view of these facts, fairly deducible from the evidence, it is manifest that, as between the complainant and the Cook County Bank, there is a perfect defense against the note to the extent of $4,868, the sum standing to the credit of the Wyandotte Bank due from the payee. On the payment of $132 the maker of the note has a clear equity to have it surrendered, together with the municipal bonds hold as collaterals. But it is claimed that the Trust Company having received the note before its maturity, and having discounted it in the usual course of business without any knowledge of any equities or defense against it, is entitled to hold it free from any defense which the maker could set up against the payee; that is, against the Cook County Bank.

§ 437. A guaranty is not such an indorsement as will cut off the equities of the maker.

A large portion of the argument before us has been expended upon the questions whether, inasmuch as the note was given by the cashier of the Wyandotte Bank at Chicago, and was made payable at a future day, it was not void under the general banking law. We pass those questions as unnecessary to be considered. If it be conceded that the note was valid at its inception, it is certainly true the maker had a good defense against it while it was in the hands of the payee, and we do not perceive that the manner in which the Trust Company or its receiver obtained it puts them or either of them in any better position than the payee occupied. The note was not indorsed to the Trust Company, and it was not, therefore, taken in the usual course of business by that mode of transfer in which negotiable paper is usually transferred. Had it been indorsed by the Cook County Bank, it may be that the Trust Company would hold it unaffected by any equities between the maker and the payee. But instead of an indorsement, the president of the Cook County Bank merely guarantied its payment, and handed it over with this guaranty to the Trust Company. The note was not even assigned. There was written upon it only the following: "For value received, we hereby guaranty the payment of the within note at maturity or at any time thereafter, with interest at ten per cent. per annum until paid, and agree to pay all costs and expenses paid or incurred in collecting the same. B. F. ALLEN, Pres't."

In no commercial sense is this an indorsement, and probably it was not intended as such. Allen had agreed that the note should not be negotiated, and for this reason, perhaps, it was not indorsed. That a guaranty is not a negotiation of a bill or note, as understood by the law merchant, is certain. Snevily v. Ekel, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.), 203; Lamourieux v. Hewitt, 5 Wend. (N. Y.), 307; Miller v. Gaston, 2 Hill (N. Y.), 188. In this case, the guaranty written on the note was filled up. It expressed fully the contract between the Cook County Bank and the Trust Company. Being express, it can raise no implication of any other contract. Expressum facit cessare tacitum. The contract cannot, therefore, be converted into an indorsement or an assignment. And if it could be treated as an assignment of the note, it would not cut off the defenses of the maker. Such an effect results only from a transfer according to the law merchant; that is, from an indorsement. An assignee stands in the place of his assignor, and takes simply an assignor's rights; but an indorsement creates a new and collateral contract. 2 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 46 et seq., notes. At best, therefore, the defendants below can claim no more or greater rights than those of the Cook County Bank, and the complainants are entitled to a return of the note and of the collaterals on payment of the sum of $132.

BRABSTON v. GIBSON.

(9 Howard, 263-279. 1849.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE McLEAN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This writ of error is brought to review a judgment of the circuit court for Louisiana. The action was founded on two promissory notes given by Tobias Gibson, and dated the 24th of December, 1839, in which he promised to pay to William Harris, for value received, at the "Agricultural Bank of the State of Mississippi," in one note, $6,000, the 1st of February, 1845, and in the other, $7,000, the 1st of February, 1846. These notes were given in part consideration for a plantation and slaves in Louisiana, sold by William Harris to Gibson, to secure the payment of which and other notes a mortgage was executed on the property. The words "Ne varietur" were indorsed on the notes to identify them with the sale of the estate. On the 21st of January, 1840, these notes were assigned, in the state of Mississippi, to the plaintiff, as collateral security for the payment of a note to her of the same date, given by Harris, who was a citizen of Mississippi, for $6,000, payable twelve months after date. In the sale of the above property, there was reserved to the vendor a right to repurchase it within ten years; and it appears there was a redemption of the property at the price for which it was sold, and a reconveyance to Harris was executed on the 18th of September, 1841. Two notes on Gibson were given up as a part of the consideration for the repurchase, but the above two notes for $13,000, having been assigned by Gibson to the plaintiff, were not surrendered, but Harris agreed that they should be given up and canceled, and a mortgage was executed on the property to indemnify Gibson against him. The first mortgage for the consideration money was canceled. Harris became bankrupt, and took the benefit of the bankrupt act (5 Stats. at Large, 440) in 1843. The cause was submitted to the court on the facts agreed, and a judgment was rendered for the defendant. On several grounds, the plaintiff asks the reversal of this judgment. The notes were given in Louisiana, but they were made payable and indorsed in Mississippi; consequently they are governed by the law of Mississippi. The law of the place where a contract is to be performed, and not the place where it was executed, applies. The indorsement of a note subjects the indorser to the obligations imposed by the law where the indorsement is made.

§ 438. Redemption from mortgage given to secure notes no defense to an action on the notes by an innocent indorsee.

It is contended that, under the law of Mississippi, the defendant is not bound. The law referred to is in Howard and Hutchinson's Digest, 373, which declares that "all bonds, obligations, single bills, promissory notes, and all other writings for the payment of money or any other thing, shall and may be assigned by indorsement," etc., and the assignee may bring an action, etc., "and in all actions commenced or sued upon any such original bond, obligation, bill single, or promissory note, or other writing as aforesaid, the defendant shall be allowed the benefit of all want of lawful consideration, failure of consideration, payments, discounts, and set-offs, made, had, or possessed against the same previous to notice of the assignment." The only question in the case which can arise under this statute is, whether the admitted facts constitute a defense to the action. The facts not being within the statute, cannot be set up as a defense under it. They do not show "an illegal consideration, a failure of consideration, payment, discount, or set-off." There was no pretense of payment of these notes in the redemption of the property. They were declared to remain in force, and to be subject to extinguishment when obtained. The case cited, of Parham v. Randolph, 4 How. (Miss.), 435, was where the note was given for land, the title to which failed; the failure of the consideration was held a good defense against the note in the hands of an assignee. That case was clearly within the statute. These notes being negotiable, were assigned to the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, without notice, prior to the act of redemption. That act being a voluntary one by Harris, the assignor of the notes, it could in no respect prejudice the rights of his assignee. Under the laws of Louisiana, the right of redemption may be enforced against a purchaser of the thing liable to be redeemed, though that fact was not named in the second sale. And when a vendor recovers the possession of land, by virtue of the power of redemption, he takes it free of all incumbrances created by the purchaser. But these principles can have no application to negotiable paper, though given for a thing purchased which the vendor may redeem. The purchaser who holds land or other property liable to be redeemed reconveys the property only on the payment of the consideration money. And whether this payment be made by returns of the notes given, in money, or in some other manner acceptable to the parties, cannot be material. In the present case, it seems, Gibson was content to take a mortgage on the property reconveyed, to indemnify him against the outstanding notes.

From the fact that the notes were not given up, and an indemnity against him having been taken, a jury might well presume that Gibson had notice of the assignment. But this was not important to the right of the assignee. She stands unaffected by the reconveyance. The indorsement of the words, "Ne varietur" could have no effect on the notes which were payable in Mississippi, and which were indorsed to the plaintiff in that state. Nor could they have affected the negotiable character of the notes, had they been assigned in the usual course of business in Louisiana. Abat v. Gormley, 3 La., 241.

§ 440. No demand is necessary as between the indorsee and maker of a promissory note to fix the liability of the latter.

These notes were assigned to the plaintiff, as collateral security, by Harris, for the payment of his note for $6,000, executed at the same time, which constituted a legal transfer of the notes, for the purpose stated. On the credit of these notes, it may be presumed, the plaintiff received the note of $6,000 from Harris. If Gibson be considered as a guarantor, as contended, yet a notice was not necessary, as he received an ample indemnity against the $6,000 by the mortgage. But he was not a guarantor in any sense of that term. Harris assigned the notes as security, and, under the circumstances, he cannot complain of want of notice of his own default. No demand of the notes, when due, at the Agricultural Bank of Mississippi, where they were made payable, was necessary. The action is against the maker of the notes, and if the money was in the bank, or if the party was there with the money to pay the notes on presentation, it is matter of defense, and consequently the demand at the bank need not be averred in the declaration nor proved on the trial. This question was fully considered and decided in Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet., 136 (§§ 1539-43, infra).

We think the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court for further proceedings, conformably to this opinion.

§ 441. In general.—Transferee of negotiable paper before maturity presumed to have no notice of defenses to it. Carpenter v. Longan, 16 Wall., 271 (§§ 225, 226).

§ 442. Transferee after maturity takes subject to antecedent equities. National Bank of Washington v. Texas, * 20 Wall., 72.

§ 443. Promissory notes are presumed to have been taken before due, in good faith and without notice of antecedent equities or infirmities. New Orleans C. & B. Co. v. Montgomery, 5 Otto, 16.

§ 444. Against a bona fide holder suing on a bill, it cannot be shown that another person had an interest in the consideration which was given for the bill. Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet., 80 (§§ 1178-82).

§ 445. Defenses against donee.—Any defense good against the payee is good against his assignee to whom the paper has been transferred as a gift. Hicks v. Jennings, 4 Fed. R., 859.

§ 446. Defenses against assignee.—Any equity, such as fraud or failure of consideration, follows a note made in Pennsylvania into the hands of an indorsee. Commercial & Farmers' Bank v. Patterson, * 2 Cr. C. C., 346.

§ 447. The maker of a note may set up the same defenses against it in the hands of an assignee that he might make if held by the payee. Bradley v. Trammel, * Hemp., 164.

§ 448. Purchaser after due; equities.—When a note is assigned after maturity, it is subject in the hands of the assignee to all the equities to which it was liable in the hands of the payee. Gwathney v. McLane, * 3 McL., 371.

§ 449. United States notes.—One who takes United States treasury notes after maturity, takes them subject to the same conditions which attach to bills and notes taken after maturity. Vermilye v. Adams Ex. Co., 21 Wall., 138.

§ 450. Carrier who pays for stolen notes is an equitable assignee.—Where treasury notes had been stolen while in the possession of a common carrier, and the bailee had paid the bailor the value of the notes, held, that in equity there was an assignment to the bailee of all the bailor's title to the notes. United States v. Vermilye, 10 Blatch., 290.

§ 451. Fraud or illegality.—The indorsee of negotiable paper, which has a fraudulent or illegal inception, must, in order to recover thereon, prove himself to be a bona fide holder for value. This will not be presumed from his possession, nor will it be proved by evidence of a judgment in his favor as to other similar paper. This will not estop the defendant from showing the fraud. Stewart v. Lansing, 14 Otto, 505.

§ 452. Where county court house bonds were executed by the county judge outside of his county, who at the time received one of the bonds from the contractor as a gratuity, and the court house for which the bonds were given was never built, held, in an action upon interest coupons, that the plaintiff must prove that he was a holder of the same for value before maturity. Smith v. Sac County, 11 Wall., 139.

§ 453. Possession; presumption of ownership.—Possession of bills by the original indorser, with the subsequent special indorsements uncanceled, raises a prima facie presumption that he is the owner, and authorizes him to sue in his own name. Picquet v. Curtis, * 1 Sumn., 479.

§ 454. The rule which allows a payee of negotiable paper to strike out subsequent special indorsements, and which presumes ownership from possession, does not extend to an action brought by him as trustee in the right of another. Fremont v. United States, * 4 Ct. Cl., 252.

§ 455. The fact that certain bills did not appear ever to have been presented to the drawees for acceptance rebuts the presumption that the holder whose duty it was to present them was a bona fide holder for value, and, further, warrants the presumption that they were in his hands merely as agent. Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat., 277.

§ 456. Representations bind assignee.—If a firm represents that certain notes on which its name appears are business and not accommodation notes, and a third person takes them, relying upon such representations, the assignee in bankruptcy of the firm cannot deny their truth against such party. In re Many, * 17 N. B. R., 514.

§ 457. Warranty of signatures.—A person who sells a note affirms the genuineness of the maker's and indorser's signatures. Semmes v. Wilson, * 5 Cr. C. C., 285.

§ 458. Deduction not notice of forgery.—A deduction of ten per cent. and interest upon a dishonored note, not indorsed by the party who offers it for sale, only justifies the inference that the party who purchased it agreed to take the risk of the responsibility of the parties whose names appear upon the note. It does not imply that the purchaser takes also the risk of the paper being genuine. Ibid.

§ 459. Presumption from holding for some time; forgery.—The longer a dishonored note remains in the hands of the holder the more reason for a purchaser to suppose it to be genuine, for he might reasonably presume the forgery would have been discovered at maturity or soon after. Ibid.

§ 460. Agreement between maker and payee.—Where notes payable to the order of A. were indorsed by him, it was held that a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity is not affected by an agreement between the maker and the payee at the time the note was given. Brown v. Spofford,* 17 Alb. L. J., 31.

§ 461. Possession of note not essential.—A bona fide indorsee for a pre-existing debt acquires a good title to a note although he never had possession of it. Lanning v. Lockett, 10 Fed. R., 453.

§ 462. Antecedent debt.—If a negotiable note is accepted in satisfaction of a previous debt, the person so receiving the note is a holder for value, and is protected against equities. Cummings v. Mead,* 6 Am. L. Reg. (O. S.), 51.

§ 463. Notes carry their whole evidence of title on their face; and the law assures the right to him who obtains them for valuable consideration, by regular indorsement or delivery, and without actual notice of an adverse claim, or of such suspicious circumstances as should lead to inquiry. Ibid.

§ 464. Unless a note is taken in good faith, for a valuable consideration and without notice, the holder is considered as being in privity with the indorser. This privity is created when the note is taken under suspicious circumstances, such as would alarm a man of ordinary prudence; and where the parties are brothers-in-law, this fact puts the holder to stricter proof of the bona fides of the transaction. Ibid.

§ 465. Taker for antecedent debt a bona fide holder.—A's draft was accepted by B. on security of a warehouse receipt and storage certificate of certain property deposited by the drawer, but which was already covered by a chattel mortgage. C. took the draft for an antecedent debt without notice of any fraud by A. Held, that he was a bona fide holder for value. Even if C. had taken the draft only as security, he would have been a bona fide holder within the rule protecting such holders. Pugh v. Durfee,* 1 Blatch., 412.

§ 466. The holder of a negotiable note, who has taken it for a pre-existing debt, is a holder for value, and, as such, protected against any equities subsisting between the original parties to it. Wood v. Seitzinger,* 2 Fed. R., 843; Cummings v. Mead,* 6 Am. L. Reg. (O. S.), 51.

§ 467. A pre-existing debt is a valuable consideration upon which the holder of a negotiable instrument is entitled to be protected against antecedent equities. Jewett v. Hone, 1 Woods, 530 (§§ 169, 170).

§ 468. Collateral security.—A bona fide purchaser, without notice and for value, is not chargeable with notice that the draft was given to a contractor as security for the performance of a contract. Collins v. Gilbert,* 15 Alb. L. J., 813. See §§ 7, 40, 278.

§ 469. A party who accepts a note as collateral security is a holder for a valuable consideration, and is not affected by equities between the antecedent parties. (Decided on the authority of Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1, and other cases and authorities dissented from.) National Bank of the Republic v. Brooklyn, etc., R. Co.,* 14 Blatch., 242; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343 (§§ 420-425).

§ 470. Suspicion not knowledge.—A person who takes negotiable paper before due for a valuable consideration, without knowledge of any defect of title, in good faith, can hold it against all the world. A suspicion that there is a defect of title in the holder, or a knowledge of circumstances that might excite such suspicion in the mind of a cautious person, or even gross negligence at the time, will not defeat the title of the purchaser. That result can only be produced by bad faith, which implies guilty knowledge or wilful ignorance, and the burden of proof lies on the assailant of the title. Hotchkiss v. National Banks, 21 Wall., 359; Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall., 110; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343 (§§ 420-425).

§ 471. Duty of bankers as to record of lost or stolen paper.—It is the duty of bankers, brokers and other financial men to keep records of notices of lost or stolen paper, by which to enable them, with very little trouble, to ascertain, when overdue paper is presented, whether they have been served with notice of a claim adverse to the party presenting it. Vermilye v. Adams Ex. Co., 21 Wall., 188.

§ 472. Acceptance of federal officer.—A person taking a bill of exchange drawn or accepted by an officer of the United States must look to the statutes to ascertain whether such officer is authorized to draw or accept it. He takes it at his peril. The Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall., 466 (§§ 15-23).

§ 473. Banks.—That paper has not been authorized by the discount committee of a bank does not affect a bona fide holder. Blair v. First National Bank, 2 Flip., 111 (§§ 617-619).

§ 474. The knowledge of a bank officer of an infirmity in a note discounted when he is not present is not imputable to his bank. Third National Bank v. Harrison, 3 McC., 316 (§§ 1314-18).

§ 475. If a note was payable to some person not connected with a bank, but assigned to it and indorsed by its cashier, and presented by an outsider to another bank for discount, these facts would be enough to put such other bank on inquiry as to the nature of the transaction, and as to the authority of the cashier to make such indorsement. Blair v. First National Bank, 2 Flip., 111 (§§ 617-619).

§ 476. State certificate of debt.—A person claiming title to a state certificate of debt, which is not strictly negotiable paper, through assignment by an agent, should show all the circumstances surrounding his acquisition of title, in order to prove himself a bona fide holder. Combs v. Hodge, 21 How., 397 (§§ 8-10).

§ 477. Signature in blank; figures at top; not notice.—The fact that a note was signed in blank, with the sum in figures marked at the top of the paper, is not enough to put a person on inquiry as to whether the note was fraudulently issued or not. Riley v. Anderson,* 2 McL., 589.

§ 478. Absence of pinned certificate.—The negotiability of a bond, payable to a certain person or bearer, is not affected by a pinned certificate to the effect that the bearer is entitled to a certain amount of the stock of the company upon the return of the certificate, bond and all unmatured coupons thereon; and the absence of the certificate at the time the bond is purchased by a third party is not of itself a sufficient circumstance to put the purchaser upon inquiry as to the title of the holder. Hotchkiss v. National Banks, 21 Wall., 359.

§ 479. Drafts by master of vessel.—Repairs became necessary to a vessel. She put into port, and while there the owners of the ship advised the master by mail as to obtaining the money needed. The bills for repairs were, by the fraud and collusion of the master, made extravagantly high. The master then drew upon the owners drafts which were upon their face "recoverable against the vessel, freight, and cargo." Relying upon the owners' letter, and without knowledge of any fraud, A. discounted the drafts. Held, that he was a bona fide purchaser, but that the drafts did not create any lien upon the vessel or cargo. The Woodland, 14 Blatch., 499.

§ 480. Title obtained from bona fide purchaser; notice.—A title obtained from a bona fide holder of a note is good, even in the hands of a taker with notice of antecedent equities between the original parties. Commissioners v. Clark, 4 Otto, 278.

§ 481. That maker is "slow" is not notice.—The fact that an indorsee of a promissory note considers the maker in doubtful credit, or "slow," does not show that he is not a bona fide holder; especially if he paid for the note in other paper equally "slow." In re Great Western Telegraph Co., 5 Biss., 363.

§ 482. Taking certificate of deposit after bankruptcy.—A party taking a certificate of deposit, which has been proved and filed as a claim in bankruptcy, from the apparent owner, and merely as collateral security for a precedent debt, is not a purchaser for value, and has no equity superior or equal to that of the true owner. In re Sime,* 12 N. B. R., 315.

§ 483. Dishonored check.—A party who takes a dishonored check, payable to bearer, takes it subject to equities; also, if he knew that the party had no right to transfer it. Rounsavel v. Scholfield,* 2 Cr. C. C., 139. See §§ 47, 48, 200, 335, 358.

§ 484. Son's knowledge of unsoundness in horse.—A father and son owned a horse together and the latter acted as agent for the former in selling it. A note was given the father for the purchase price and he indorsed it to the son, who sued upon it. The defense was a total failure of consideration and fraud, in that the horse was diseased and known to be so, although represented as sound, at the time of sale. Held, that the son could not be considered as a bona fide indorsee, but was a party to the sale, and could not claim the rights and immunities of an innocent holder. Pease v. McClelland,* 2 Bond, 42.

§ 485. Stolen bonds and coupons.—Bonds of a corporation, negotiable by delivery, were stolen, and sold before maturity to a bona fide purchaser. Held, that the purchaser took a good title to the bonds, and to the coupons which were not due, but not to the past-due coupons. Gilbough v. Norfolk & Petersburg R. Co.,* 1 Hughes, 410. See § 495.

§ 486. Inadequacy of consideration.—The selling of notes amounting to over $5,000 for $1,000, coupled with knowledge by the indorsee that there was trouble between the maker and the payee, is sufficient to put the indorsee upon inquiry, and to charge him with notice of matters of defense against the notes. In re Hook,* 11 N. B. R., 232.

§ 487. One-half bank note.—The purchaser of the half of a bank note that is lost or stolen does not become a bona fide holder; he takes it subject to every defense which could have been legally made against the finder or robber. The fact of mutilation is sufficient to charge him with notice. Bullett v. Bank of Pennsylvania, 2 Wash., 172.

§ 488. Cessation of interest; option to exchange for bonds.—U. S. 7-30 treasury notes were stolen from the Adams Express Company. They were sold, after they ceased to bear interest, and after the time for exercising an option to exchange them for bonds had passed, as appeared from the face of the notes. Held, that this was notice to the purchaser. United States v. Vermilye, 10 Blatch., 280.

§ 489. Overdue treasury notes.—A person who takes overdue United States treasury notes is chargeable with all antecedent equities, and bankers, brokers and others cannot establish a usage in dealing with such paper which contravenes this rule. Vermilye v. Adams Ex. Co., 21 Wall., 138.

§ 490. Notice by special indorsement.—A note was indorsed thus: "This note is transferred and the collection of the same guaranteed to the holder hereof." Held, not an indorsement of the paper within the law merchant, and that the indorsee, although without notice and a taker before maturity, received the note subject to any defense existing between the maker and payee—e. g., want of consideration. Such an indorsement amounts only to a guaranty of payment, provided payment cannot be enforced against the maker. Omaha National Bank v. Walker,* 2 McC., 565.

§ 491. Knowledge of fraud.—One who takes notes as collateral security for a debt, and with knowledge that the notes were tainted with fraud by reason of false representations as to their consideration, is chargeable with all defenses which can be made against antecedent parties. Smith v. Babcock, 2 Woodb. & M., 246. See § 451.

§ 492 Printed hand-bill.—A printed hand-bill advising of the stealing of certain United States treasury notes and particularly describing them, if served after the notes become due, and before they come into the hands of a purchaser, is sufficient notice. United States v. Vermilye, 10 Blatch., 280.

§ 493. Dishonor by non-acceptance is non-payment; notice.—One who takes a bill which shows its dishonor upon its face is not a bona fide holder; and there is no distinction between such a bill transferred after it is dishonored by non-acceptance and one transferred after dishonor by non-payment. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65.

§ 494. Recovery from one not a bona fide purchaser.—An express company which acquires the title of the rightful owner of stolen treasury notes may recover them from a purchaser of them after maturity. Vermilye v. Adams Ex. Co. 21 Wall., 147.

§ 495. But in United States v. Read, 2 Cr. C. C., 159, the court refused to order stolen bank notes passed to persons who received them innocently in the usual course of business to be given up to the original owners. See § 485.

§ 496. Transfer by agent bona fide.—A. was indebted to B., his attorney and agent. B. being obliged to have money, and A. not being able to pay him, and to pay certain notes of his (A.'s) about to mature, B. charged himself with the amount of the notes, took them up before maturity and indorsed them on the first or second day of grace to C. in payment of claims which B. owed individually to C., which claims C., in consideration of the transfer of the notes, released. Held, that C. was a purchaser for value without notice of antecedent equities. Turnbull v. Thomas. 1 Hughes, 172.

§ 497. Overdue note.—One who buys an overdue note from a bank that has no title or authority to sell it cannot intervene and claim a right under the note to be paid, in preference to the true owner of the note, out of the proceeds of property sold under a mortgage given to secure it by the maker. Foley v. Smith,* 6 Wall., 492.

§ 498. Accommodation paper.—The fact that the check was drawn to accommodate the payee is no defense to a suit by an innocent holder against the drawer. Deener v. Brown,* 1 MacArth., 350. See §§ 5, 278, 364.

§ 499. The fact that an accommodation indorser did not indorse the notes until long after they were made, and had no interest in them, is no defense against a bona fide holder. Bank of British North America v. Ellis, 6 Saw., 96 (§§ 1439-43).

§ 500. An accommodation acceptor of a bill which has come into his possession after having been put in circulation is presumed to own it, and may recover upon it without first showing that he has paid it. Hunter v. Kibbe, 5 McL., 279.

§ 501. Although by the laws of Massachusetts the treasurer or manager of a trading company cannot bind it by an accommodation indorsement, yet if the paper is held by an innocent purchaser, it is good. Ex parte Estabrook, 2 Low., 547.

§ 502. A bona fide holder of an accommodation bill may recover upon it, even when he purchases it with notice of its character. Perry v. Crammond,* 1 Wash., 104.

§ 503. A maker of a promissory note, payable to another party, is not estopped from showing that it was accommodation paper, even in favor of one who took it in good faith upon the representation of the payee that it was business paper. In re Dolge,* 17 N. B. R., 504.

§ 504. Agent's excess of authority; money; certificate of deposit.—An agent being authorized to raise money on a promissory note of his principal, took a certificate of deposit, payable to order at sight, indorsed it in blank, and it was soon paid to a bona fide holder. Held, that the principal could not avoid responsibility on his note on the ground that the certificate was not money. Parrman v. Woodward, 21 How., 236.

§ 505. Conditional note.—A. gave B. certain acceptances of C. B. in return gave A. his note or due bill. It was agreed that B. was to collect the acceptances; and if they were paid, he was to pay his note or due bill; if they were not paid, then the note or due bill was not to be of any value. The note or due bill was negotiated to an innocent assignee. Held, that, notwithstanding a statute allowed the same defenses to be set up against an assignee that might be urged against the assignor, the defense of non-payment of the acceptances could not be set up against the assignee, as this would make the agreement of the original parties amount to a fraud upon the innocent holder. Thomas v. Page,* 3 McL., 369. It is also held that such a condition might be attached to a note or due bill by separate agreement of the parties, and would be obligatory upon a purchaser of the note or due bill with notice of it. Thomas v. Page,* 3 McL., 167.

V. INDORSERS, SURETIES AND GUARANTORS.

SUMMARY—Whether a party is maker, indorser or guarantor, § 506.—Joint makers as sureties, § 507.—Usurious interest; extension of note, § 508.—Indorsing blank paper before note is written, § 509.—Indorser liable as guarantor, § 510.—Consideration for a guaranty, §§ 511, 512, 516.—Extent of guaranty, § 513; release by lapse of time, § 514.—Notice of acceptance of promise to guaranty, § 515.—Notice to guarantor of default, § 517.—Suing principal; release of surety or indorsers, §§ 518-527.—Accommodation paper; extension; release of surety, § 528.—Right of surety after judgment against him, § 529.—Agreement of sureties to share loss pro rata, §§ 530, 532; right to sue in federal court, § 531.—Contribution, §§ 533, 534.—Subrogation, §§ 529, 535, 536.—Proof as to the capacity in which paper is held, §§ 537, 538.—Indorsement by cashier, § 539.—Negligence of one holding paper as collateral, § 540.

§ 506. When a promissory note, made payable to a particular person or order, is first indorsed by a third person, such third person is held to be an original promisor, guarantor, or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties at the time it took place: (1) If he put his name in blank on the back of a note at the time it was made, and before it was indorsed by the payee, to give the maker credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration of the note, he must be considered as a joint maker of the note. (2) If his indorsement was subsequent to the making of the note and to the delivery of the same to take effect, and he put his name there at the request of the maker, pursuant to a contract of the maker with the payee for further indulgence or forbearance, he can only be held as guarantor: which can only be done where there is legal proof of the consideration for the promise, unless it be shown that he was connected with the inception of the note. (3) If the note was intended for discount, and he put his name on the back of the note, with the understanding of all the parties that his indorsement would be inoperative until the instrument was indorsed by the payee, he would then be liable only as a second indorser, in the commercial sense, and as such would clearly be entitled to the privileges which belong to such an indorser. Good v. Martin, §§ 541-549.

§ 507. Joint and several makers of a note may agree, as among themselves, that one of them shall pay the note. Such one then becomes principal debtor, and the others are his sureties; and this may be shown by parol. But this agreement does not affect the creditor, as to whom they are all principal debtors. But if the holder, after notice of such agreement, extend the time of payment, it will release the sureties. Vary v. Norton, §§ 550-552.

§ 509. A. wrote his name on a blank piece of paper, intending that B. should write out and sign upon the other side a promissory note. B. did so. Held, that A. was liable as an indorser to one who lent money upon it. The lending of money to B. formed a valid consideration for such an indorsement by A., and the facts that his indorsement was made before the note was written, and that there was no memorandum of A.'s agreement in writing, do not release him. Violett v. Patton, §§ 553-555.

§ 510. An indorsement of a note, by which the indorsers name a place of payment (one not being named in the note), and guaranty the payment of the amount when due, creates a different liability from what the law implies from a mere indorsement. It binds the indorsers as guarantors, and can only be enforced by the parties with whom it is made. If made after the creation of the note, it does not pass by assignment. How v. Kemball, §§ 556-558.

§ 512. The consideration of a guaranty may be the acceptance of the paper guaranteed. Ibid.

§ 513. A guaranty of the notes of S. will not cover the notes of a firm of which he is a member. Russell v. Perkins, §§ 559, 560.

§ 514. The lapse of a long time, e. g., twelve years, during which a guaranty of notes is not used, will exhaust the guaranty. Ibid.

§ 515. Notice of the acceptance of a promise to guaranty need not be shown to charge a guarantor where the guaranty itself is written. The written guaranty is alone sufficient evidence of the acceptance of the oral promise to guaranty. Lewis v. Brewster, §§ 561-565.

§ 516. A sale of goods in reliance upon a promised guaranty is a sufficient consideration for it. Ibid.

§ 517. A guarantor is entitled to reasonable notice of the default of his principal; such notice, or an excuse for not giving it, must be specially averred in the declaration; and a delay of seven months after default, or until the commencement of suit, is fatal to a recovery against him. Ibid.

§ 518. At common law a creditor cannot be required to sue the principal in a note or bill on request by the surety that he do so; and the creditor's failure to sue the principal after such request will not release the surety. Dennis v. Rider, §§ 566-539.

§ 519. Indorsers are not within the meaning of a statute expressly applicable to a "surety." Ross v. Jones, §§ 570-578.

§ 520. It is not the duty of the indorsee to sue the maker unless he choose, even though the indorser requests him to sue the maker. Ibid.

§ 521. Demand of the maker, and protest and notice to the indorser, were duly given by the holder. Subsequently, the indorser gave the holder notice in writing to sue the maker and the indorser at a time when the maker was solvent. The holder (plaintiff) omitted to do so for more than thirty days, during which time the maker became insolvent. Held, that the indorser, after notice of non-payment duly given, did not stand precisely in the position of a surety, and that the omission of plaintiff to sue within the thirty days did not release the indorser from liability. Ibid.

§ 522. In Illinois the assignor of a note, unless he expressly agree to guaranty it, is liable to pay it only in case the assignee by the exercise of due diligence prosecutes the maker to insolvency; but if the institution of suit against the maker will not avail the assignee, or if the maker, when the note falls due, is out of the jurisdiction of the court and therefore beyond the reach of legal process, the assignor is equally as liable as if due diligence by suit had been used. Want of consideration or the maker's being adjudged a bankrupt is also enough to show that suit against him would have been unavailing. Wills v. Claffin, §§ 579-581.

§ 523. In Indiana, the indorser of renewal notes forwarded to the holder of the paper renewed, who resides in another state, is not liable in consequence of their non-payment and notice thereof to pay them. Due diligence to collect them from the maker by suit against him must generally be used in order to fix the liability of an indorser. But in New York such notes are governed by the law merchant, and the indorser is liable as upon an inland bill. Mott v. Wright, §§ 582-584.

§ 524. The maker of a note need not be sued before proceeding against an indorser, if he be insolvent. Violett v. Patton, §§ 553-555.

§ 525. The record of suit by the holder against the maker and prior indorsers of a note is competent evidence of due diligence by the holder; and if the defendants to such suit were shown to have been insolvent, or to have left the state, these facts would excuse the plaintiff for not suing out executions against the judgment debtors. Camden v. Doremus, §§ 585-588.

§ 526. The "due diligence" required of an indorsee who sues the maker is not lessened by an error of the court in which he brings suit, whereby less than the amount sued for is recovered. Ibid.

§ 527. Where a suit has been instituted on a bill against a drawer, an agreement for a valuable consideration, by the plaintiff, to continue it until the next term of court, releases the indorsers. Bank of United States v. Hatch, §§ 589-591.

§ 528. A. made a note of $6,000 for the accommodation of B., who indorsed it to the C. bank, which discounted it, knowing that A. was an accommodation maker merely. Subsequently, B. made a new note for $5,000, at ninety days, which the C. bank discounted, passing the proceeds to the private account of B., who banked with it, and he gave his check for $5,000, which was charged against his account. As the indorser's note was not secured, the bank retained the original note for $6,000 as security. Held, that a holder who knows the maker of a note is only nominally such, but actually an accommodation indorser, must deal with the paper and parties in reference to their true relationship to the obligation; that the second note amounted to an extension of time to the principal (the indorser) and released the surety (the maker). In re Goodwin, §§ 592-595.

§ 529. After judgment against the principal and surety the relation of principal and surety ceases to exist. The character of the surety is merged in the judgment, and he can claim no right but the right of subrogation on paying the judgment. Nor is the liability of the surety affected by the conduct of the creditor after judgment against himself and his principal. Findlay v. United States Bank, §§ 596-602.

§ 530. An agreement, collateral to a note, by which two co-sureties agree to share the loss.

pro rata, is founded on a good consideration and may be by parol. It is the promise of the one co-surety to lose one-half if the other co-surety will become a surety with him and lose the other half, followed by the actual payment by the one co-surety of the whole of the note. Phillips v. Preston, §§ 603-607.

§ 531. One surety who sues his co-surety under a contract, collateral to the note, to divide the loss between them, may sue in a federal court, although the assignor could not sue in such court. Ibid.

§ 532. If two persons agree to indorse a note and to divide between them any loss, one of them who settles the note upon the failure of the maker to pay it may recover from the other the share which he should have paid. The claim upon his co-surety of the person who pays the note rests entirely upon the collateral agreement to divide the loss, and not upon any promise contained in the note, or the co-sureties' indorsements on it. Ibid.

§ 533. A's note was indorsed by B. as an accommodation indorser. To insure its being discounted, A. subsequently secured the accommodation indorsement of C. The note being paid by B., the first indorser, held, that he could not recover a moiety of the amount paid from C., who was neither liable to B. as co-surety, nor as a general indorser. McDonald v. Magruder, §§ 608-611.

§ 534. Under the statute of Virginia, giving to debts due on protested bills of exchange the rank of judgment debts, a joint indorser who has paid more than his moiety of the debt can subject the estate of his co-indorser to contribution with the priority of a judgment creditor. Liddersdale v. Robinson, §§ 612, 613.

§ 535. The indorser who pays a bill or note is subrogated to the rights of the holder. Ibid.

§ 536. Where a surety of a surety pays the debt of the principal he may recover from the principal. Hall v. Smith, § 614.

§ 537. A member of a firm who are indorsers, thus: "Pay Sweeney, R. F. & Co., for collection. Sam Harris & Sons," is competent to testify that his firm held the paper only as agents to collect it, and that they were not owners of it. Such testimony does not contradict the indorsement but merely explains it. Sweeney v. Easter, §§ 615, 616.

§ 538. On the question whether a firm of bankers from whom certain notes were received were owners of them or merely agents to collect them, evidence of one of the firm as to its private practice of distinguishing between paper of which they were owners, and paper they were merely agents to collect, is inadmissible to charge with notice of agency a person to whom such paper was sent by said firm of bankers, unless such person is also shown to have knowledge of such private practice of the firm. Ibid.

§ 539. A note made payable to A., cashier, is presumed to belong to the bank, and an indorsement by the cashier before maturity will bind the bank. Blair v. First National Bank, §§ 617-619.

§ 540. One who holds an unpaid draft as collateral security, refusing to deliver it to the pledgee so that he may collect it, but at the same time making no effort to secure its payment by dividends declared in the estate of the drawee in bankruptcy, is liable for whatever sum is lost by this negligence, though not for the full amount of the bill, if that could not have been recovered from the bankrupt drawee. Childs v. Corp., §§ 620, 621.

GOOD v. MARTIN.

(5 Otto, 90-98. 1877.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Colorado Territory.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Good wrote his name on the back of a note of which he was neither payee nor indorsee. There was judgment against him, as well as against the makers. Further facts appear in the opinion of the court.

§ 541. Indorser in blank before delivery held a second indorser by some courts.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Decisions of a conflicting character exist as to the nature and legal effect of the obligation which a third person assumes who indorses his name in blank on a negotiable promissory note before the payee and before the instrument is delivered to take effect. Courts of justice, in some jurisdictions, hold that such a party is a second indorser, even though it be true that the payee may never indorse the instrument. Phelps v. Vischer, 50 N. Y., 69; Shafer v. Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, 59 Penn. St., 144.

Even elementary rules show that he cannot be first indorser, for the reason that he is not payee; and it is well settled law that no one but the payee can sustain that relation to the maker, or put the note in circulation as a negotiable instrument. Essex Company v. Edmunds, 12 Gray (Mass.), 272; Moies v. Bird, 11 Mass., 436.

Three of the counts of the declaration are framed upon a promissory note, dated June 29, 1866, payable to Alexander Davidson or order sixty days after date, signed by the first two defendants; and the record shows that it was indorsed by Good, the other defendant, before it was indorsed by the payee and before it was delivered to take effect as a negotiable instrument. His indorsement was in blank, and, of course, was without any written explanation as to its nature and intended effect. Besides the three counts framed upon the promissory note, the declaration also contained the common counts, in which it was alleged that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000 for work and labor done and performed, and in the same sum for goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered, and in the same sum for money had and received, and other counts in indebitatus assumpsit. Service was made; but the two defendants first named failed to appear and were defaulted. Instead of that Good appeared, pleaded the general issue and went to trial. Evidence was introduced on both sides; and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff in the sum of $3,625.33. Exceptions were filed by Good, and he sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court. Only two of the exceptions are embodied in the assignment of errors, and those only will be re-examined: 1. That the court erred in instructing the jury that if they found from the evidence that the defendant wrote his name upon the back of the note before the delivery of the same to the payee, and that he did not then make any statement of his intention in so doing, he is presumed to have done so as the surety of the makers, and for their accommodation, to give them credit with the payee, and is liable for the payment of the note in this action, and that if that presumption is not rebutted by the evidence in the case, they must find for the plaintiff in the issue joined between her and Good. 2. That the court erred in excluding the testimony of the two defendants called as witnesses by Good.

Decided cases almost innumerable affirm the rule, that, if one not the promisee indorses his name in blank on a negotiable promissory note before it is indorsed by the payee, and before it is delivered to take effect as a promissory note, the law presumes that he intended to give it credit by becoming liable to pay it either as guarantor or as an original promisor. Bryant v. Eastman, 7 Cush. (Mass.), 111; Benthal v. Judkins, 13 Metc. (Mass.), 265; Colbun v. Averill, 30 Me., 310. Different courts, as remarked in that case, hold different views in respect to the question here involved; but all concur that such an act constitutes a contract which is to receive a reasonable and an available construction. Great conflict exists in the decided cases; but the better opinion is, that there are certain general rules and principles to be followed in the interpretation of such a contract, which, in the absence of other evidence, will lead to satisfactory results, even amid the conflicting decisions. Beyond all doubt, the contract should be construed as it was at the time it was made. If made at the inception of the note, it is presumed to have been for the same consideration and a part of the original contract expressed by the note. If made subsequently to the date of the note and without a prior indorsement by the payee, it will be presumed that it was not made for the same consideration, and the party, if liable at all, will be regarded as a guarantor. Such a contract to guaranty the debt of a third person must be in writing, and there must be sufficient proof of the consideration. Brewster v. Silence, 8 N. Y., 207; Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns. (N. Y.), 29; Hall v. Farmer, 5 Den. (N. Y.), 484.

§ 544. Indorser of a note after a prior indorsement by the payee regarded as a subsequent indorser and liable as such.

These remarks apply where the third person indorses the note before the payee; but where such a person indorses the note after a prior indorsement by the payee, the law presumes it to have been done in aid of the negotiation of the note, and the party will be regarded as a subsequent indorser, the rule being, that, if the indorsement is without date, it will be presumed to have been made at the inception of the note. Ranger v. Cary, 1 Metc. (Mass.), 369; Noxon v. De Wolf, 10 Gray (Mass.), 343; Collins v. Gilbert, 94 U. S., 753 (§§ 432-436, supra). Irregularities of the kind in the execution of promissory notes are noticed by Judge Story in his work on Promissory Notes, and he says that the maker and such a party are both to be deemed original promisors, and the note a joint and several promissory note to the payee, although as between the maker and the other party they stand in the relation of principal and surety. Standard authorities, too numerous for citation here, are referred to by the author in support of the proposition. Story, Pr., sec. 58; Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt., 355; Lewis v. Harvey, 18 Mo., 74; 1 Parsons, Contr. (6th ed.), 243. None will deny, it is presumed, that the cases cited sustain the proposition where the third person indorses his name in blank on the note at the time when it was made and before it was indorsed by the payee; and the same learned author admits that the rule would be otherwise if the party actually wrote his name at a subsequent period, unless it was done in compliance with an agreement made before the note was executed. Hawkes v. Phillips, 7 Gray (Mass.), 284; Leonard v. Wilder, 36 Me., 265; Champion v. Griffith, 13 Ohio, 228. Prior decisions of this court are to the same effect, as appears by the following citation. Rey v. Simpson, 22 How., 341.

§ 545. Nature of contract where indorsement is made before delivery.

When a promissory note made payable to a particular person or order is first indorsed by a third person, such third person is held to be an original promisor, guarantor or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties at the time the transaction took place. 1. If he put his name in blank on the back of the note at the time it was made and before it was indorsed by the payee, to give the maker credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration of the note, he must be considered as a joint maker of the note. Schneider v. Schiffman, 20 Mo., 571; Irish v. Cutler, 31 Me., 536. 2. Reasonable doubt of the correctness of that rule cannot be entertained; but if his indorsement was subsequent to the making of the note and to the delivery of the same to take effect, and he put his name there at the request of the maker, pursuant to a contract of the maker with the payee for further indulgence or forbearance, he can only be held as guarantor, which can only be done where there is legal proof of consideration for the promise, unless it be shown that he was connected with the inception of the note. 3. But if the note was intended for discount, and he put his name on the back of the note with the understanding of all the parties that his indorsement would be inoperative until the instrument was indorsed by the payee, he would then be liable only as a second indorser in the commercial sense, and as such would clearly be entitled to the privileges which belong to such an indorser.

§ 546. Construction of contract where indorsement is in blank.

Considerable diversity of decision, it must be admitted, is founded in the reported cases where the record presents the case of a blank indorsement by a third party made before the instrument is indorsed by the payee and before it is delivered to take effect, the question being whether the party is to be deemed an original promisor, guarantor or indorser. Irreconcilable conflict exists in that regard; but there is one principle upon the subject almost universally admitted by them all, and that is that the interpretation of the contract ought in every case to be such as will carry into effect the intention of the parties, and in most cases it is admitted that proof of the facts and circumstances which took place at the time of the transaction is admissible to aid in the interpretation of the language employed. Denton v. Peters, Law Rep., 5 Q. B., 475.

Facts and circumstances attendant at the time the contract was made are competent evidence for the purpose of placing the court in the same situation, and giving the court the same advantages for construing the contract which were possessed by the actors. Cavazos v. Trevino, 6 Wall., 773. Courts of justice may acquaint themselves with the facts and circumstances that are the subjects of the statements in the written agreement, and are entitled to place themselves in the same situation as the parties who made the contract, so as to view the circumstances as they viewed them, and so to judge of the meaning of the words and of the correct application of the language to the things described. Shore v. Wilson, 9 Clark & F., 352; Clayton v. Gregson, 4 Nev. & M., 602; Addison, Contr. (6th ed.), 918; 2 Taylor, Ev. (6th ed.), 1035. Evidence to show that the indorsement of the defendant in this case was made before the instrument was indorsed by the payee or delivered to take effect was admitted without objection; but it is not necessary to rest the decision upon that suggestion, as it is clear that the evidence would have been admissible even if seasonable objection had been made to its competency. Hopkins v. Leek, 12 Wend. (N. Y.), 105. Like a deed or other written contract, a promissory note takes effect from delivery; and as the delivery is something that occurs subsequently to the execution of the instrument, it must necessarily be a question of fact when the delivery was made. Parol proof is, therefore, admissible to show when that took place, as it cannot appear in the terms of the note. 2 Taylor, Ev. (6th ed.), 1001; Hall v. Cazenove, 4 East, 477; Cooper v. Robinson, 10 Mees. & W., 694. Opposed to that the suggestion is, that if a holder produces a note having a blank indorsement of one not the payee, the presumption is that it was made at the inception of the instrument. Childs v. Wyman, 44 Me., 433. Grant that, and still it is a mere presumption of fact which may be rebutted and controlled by parol proof that it was not there when the note was delivered, or that it was made at a subsequent date. Essex Company v. Edmunds, 12 Gray (Mass.), 273. Third persons indorsing a negotiable promissory note before the payee, and before it is delivered to take effect, cannot be held as first indorsers for the reason that they are not payees; and no party but the payee of the note can be the first indorser and put the instrument in circulation as a commercial negotiable security. Such a third party may, if he chooses, take upon himself the limited obligation of a second indorser; but if he desire to do so he must employ proper terms to signify that intention, the rule being that a blank indorsement supposes that there are no such terms employed, and that he is liable either as promisor or guarantor.

Blank indorsements may be filled up to express the legal contract; and the true commercial rule is that, when the blank is filled, the instrument shall have the character of a written instrument, and not depend on parol proof to give it effect, nor be subject to be altered or contradicted by parol proof. Indorsements of the kind are or may be valid, as the law presumes that such an indorser intended to be liable in some form. It does not charge him as indorser, unless the terms employed are proper to express such an intent; but if any one, not the payee of a negotiable note, or, in the case of a note not negotiable, if any party writes his name on the back of the note, at or sufficiently near the time it is made, his signature binds him in the same way as if it was written on the face of the note and below that of the maker; that is to say, he is held as a joint maker, or as a joint and several maker, according to the form of the note. Cases also arise where the signature of a third person is subsequent to the making and delivery of the note, and in that case the third person, as to the payee, is not a maker, but a guarantor, and his promise is void if without consideration; but the consideration may be the original consideration if the note was received at his request and upon his promise to guaranty the same, or if the note was made at his request and for his benefit. 1 Parsons, Contr. (6th ed.), 244. Judge Story says that the interpretation ought to be just such as carries into effect the true intention of the parties, which may be made out by parol proof of the facts and circumstances which took place at the time of the transaction. If the party intended at the time to be bound only as guarantor of the maker, he shall not be an original promisor; and, if he intended to be liable only as a second indorser, he shall never be held to the payee as first indorser. Story, Pr., sec. 479. Where the evidence on these points is doubtful, obscure or totally wanting, courts of law adopt rules of interpretation as furnishing presumptions as to the actual intention of the parties. Difficulty in that regard can never arise where the indorsement is special, if it contains words proper to show that the party intended to be liable only as second indorser. Where the indorsement is in blank, if made before the payee, the liability must be either as an original promisor or guarantor, and parol proof is admissible to show whether the indorsement was made before the indorsement of the payee and before the instrument was delivered to take effect, or after the payee had become the holder of the same; and, if before, then the party so indorsing the note may be charged as an original promisor, but if after the payee became the holder, then such a party can only be held as guarantor, unless the terms of the indorsement show that he intended to be liable only as second indorser, in which event he is entitled to the privileges accorded to such an indorser by the commercial law. Whether regarded as a second indorser or an original promisor, it is not necessary to allege or prove any other than the original consideration; but, if it be attempted to charge the party as a guarantor, a distinct consideration must appear. Essex Company v. Edmunds, 12 Gray (Mass.), 272; Brewster v. Silence, 7 N. Y., 207. Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it is clear that the first assignment of error must be overruled.

§ 549. Territorial courts are not governed, as United States courts are, by the act of congress admitting parties as witnesses.

Territorial courts are not courts of the United States, within the meaning of the constitution, as appears by all the authorities. Clinton v. Englebrecht, 13

Wall., 434; Hornbuckle v. Toombs, 18 Wall., 648. A witness in civil cases cannot be excluded in the courts of the United States because he or she is a party to, or interested in, the issue tried; but the provision has no application in the courts of a territory where a different rule prevails. 13 Stat., 351; Bowman v. Noyes, 12 N. H., 302; Bridges v. Armour, 5 How., 91; Bailey v. Knapp, 19 Penn. St., 192; Halz v. Snyder, 26 id., 511. Suppose that is so, then the two defendants called as witnesses were rightly rejected as witnesses. 13 Stat., 351. Special reference is made to the territorial act of the 11th of February, 1870, as inconsistent with the ruling of the court; but that act contains the following proviso: that the act "shall not apply to cases pending at the passage thereof in the district courts, on appeals from justices of the peace, nor to cases at issue at the passage of the same in the district and probate courts." Sufficient appears to show that the case before the court was at issue in the court below one whole year before the passage of that act. Tested by these considerations, it is clear that the second assignment of error must also be overruled, and that there is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

VARY v. NORTON.

(Circuit Court for Michigan: 6 Federal Reporter, 808-814. 1881.)

Opinion by WITHEY, D. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The suit is upon a promissory note. Defendants Norton, Lee and King defend. Judgment by default against all the other defendants. King pleads separately that the consideration of the note is in part usurious; that payments of interest have been usurious, and that he is the surety of Norton, and has been discharged from liability by the time of payment having been extended by plaintiff without his knowledge or consent. Norton and Lee join in their defense, which is the same in substance as set up by King. The note was made by all the defendants, at Lowell, in this state, March 27, 1871, by which they jointly and severally promised to pay to William Vary or order, five years after date, $2,000, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. All the interest that matured prior to September 14, 1873, was paid to the payee; at or soon after which date the note passed to plaintiff, and he, as holder thereof, has since received the interest to March 27, 1876. All payments of interest have been at the rate of ten per cent. on the face of the note. Defendant Norton has, since this suit was commenced, made two payments—one of $200, June 19th, and the same amount October 8, 1877. The consideration of the note was only $1,790, money loaned to all the defendants, while $210 included in the note was usury, to which extent the consideration fails. Plaintiff is chargeable with notice of all the facts. A computation based upon the actual consideration of the note, with interest at ten per cent. thereon, less payments made by way of interest, shows that the amount remaining unpaid at the date of this opinion is $1,994.54. On the 17th of November, 1873, after the note came into the hands of plaintiff, defendant Norton agreed, for a valuable consideration, with defendants Lee and King, to pay the note. Of this arrangement the plaintiff had seasonable notice. On the 4th of April, 1876, plaintiff and defendant Norton made an agreement by which Norton paid to plaintiff $460, which met all interest due on the face of the note to that time, the taxable costs of a suit pending against all the defendants on the note, and an excess of about $15. This latter sum was paid and received as consideration for the agreement of plaintiff then made with Norton to extend the time for the payment of the principal sum to March 27, 1877, without the knowledge of defendants Lee and King. Defendant Lee had, on the 16th of March, 1876, written to plaintiff a letter in which he says: "Mr. Norton's prospects are very good, and just as soon as he can get the money out of his logs he will pay you. I hope you will not make any expense, as it is about impossible to get money here now." The presumption that Norton was pecuniarily responsible and good for this debt in the spring of 1876 has not been rebutted by proof, but that he became insolvent in 1877 appears.

§ 550. Principals may agree that one shall be principal and the others sureties. Parol evidence admissible to show such agreement.

The case presents, first, the question whether one or more joint and several makers of a note, all of whom are at the making of the debt principal debtors, can change their relation without consent of the creditor, so as to deprive him of the right he had to treat all of them as principal debtors in any transaction touching the debt. This does not involve the question whether parol evidence is admissible to show that one who signed as a joint and several maker was only a surety for his co-maker. On that question the authorities are far from uniform. They are cited in Parsons on Bills and Notes (2d ed.), 233-4. See, also, 64 N. Y., 457; 5 Dillon, 140. The relation of principal debtor and surety arose in this case subsequent to the execution and delivery of the note, and after the plaintiff became the holder of it. The evidence which has been introduced does not, therefore, tend to contradict the written contract, but to show the changed relation between the makers Lee and King, and Norton. The question as to the effect produced upon the rights of the parties under such circumstances has arisen most frequently in reference to partnership indebtedness, when one partner retires and the other retains the business and agrees to pay the firm debts. In this state it is held that if a creditor, after being informed of the new arrangement between the partners, enters into a valid agreement by which the time of payment is extended without consent of the retiring member, the latter is discharged, on the ground that he had become a surety, and was entitled to the benefit of a surety's rights. Smith v. Sheldon, 35 Mich., 42. The same view was held in Millerd v. Thorn, 56 N. Y., 402. See cases cited in the opinions. But in Swire v. Redman, Law R., 1 Q. B., 536, it was held quite the other way. By it the previous case of Oakley v. Pasheller, 4 Clark & Fin., 207, decided in the house of lords, and cited by Judge Cooley in Smith v. Sheldon, and by defendants' counsel in this case, to support the rule that an agreement to forbear discharges such retired partner on the ground that he is a surety, is quite explained away, and denied to be an authority for such view. I have not at hand the case of Oakley v. Pasheller.

§ 551. If creditor has notice of the relation of principal and surety by agreement, and gives time to principal, surety is discharged.

It seems to me that when Norton agreed with Lee and King to pay the note there was created between them the relation of principal debtor and surety, by virtue of which Lee and King became entitled to indemnity from Norton, if payment should be made by them on account of his default, and that they had the right to pay at any time after the debt matured, and bring suit at once against Norton for indemnity. The relation of principal and surety is fixed by the debtors without any action of the creditor. They have a right to arrange such relation between themselves at any time. No change is thereby produced on the contract rights of the creditor; all the makers continue jointly and severally liable as when the note was signed. But when the creditor has notice that, by an arrangement between the makers, one or more of them has become entitled to the rights of a surety, he is as much bound, upon principles of justice, to regard those rights, and to do no act to abridge them, as if such makers had originally signed as sureties. In either case the discharge of the surety is always brought about by the act of the creditor, and not by a change of his contract rights under the note. In reference to accommodation makers, indorsers, etc., the law is too well settled to allow of discussion, that a valid agreement by the creditor to extend the day of payment without their consent discharges them. The reason upon which such rule rests, and its application to sureties to whom no injury has resulted, might not, at this day, bear the test of justice and common sense; but it is a doctrine too long sanctioned to be questioned in the courts. I cannot regard Swire v. Redman as resting upon reasons that ought to control this case.

§ 552. Usury a good consideration for extension.

The other question is as to the validity of the agreement to forbear, viz.: whether the payment of usurious interest constitutes a valuable consideration to uphold the agreement of plaintiff to give time. It is claimed that the $15 paid for the extension of time was interest for the use of the money represented by the note, and was so much in excess of the highest rate allowed by law. Treating it as a sum paid for forbearance, it is interest. In Michigan, whenever parties so agree, ten per cent. is collectible; there is no positive prohibition against taking a higher rate, and a higher rate paid cannot be recovered back from the creditor. The statute provides that no contract whereby a greater rate of interest is directly or indirectly reserved or received than is allowed by law, shall thereby be rendered void; but in an action to recover upon such usurious contract, the plaintiff, subject to certain exceptions, shall have judgment for the principal and legal interest only, exclusive of the usury. The courts are nearly uniform in their judgments that a promise to pay usurious interest will not uphold an agreement to forbear, because the promise cannot be enforced, though it was held otherwise in Wheat v. Kendall, 6 N. H., 504. But when the usurious sum has been paid, learned judges differ whether there is a consideration to uphold the agreement or not. In New York and Vermont the statute declares contracts tainted with usury to be void; and if usury has been paid, it can be recovered back, with a penalty against the taker. In the former state it was held by two judges, without dissent from the other two, that payment of usury does not afford a consideration. Vilas v. Jones, 1 N. Y., 274. In Vermont, on the other hand, a united court has repeatedly held the other way. Turrill v. Boynton, 23 Vt., 142; Burgess v. Dawey, 33 Vt., 618. In South Carolina and Missouri such contracts are not void by statute, and in both it has been held that usury paid will not uphold an agreement to forbear. Cornwall v. Holly, 5 Richardson (S. C.), 47; Bank v. Harrison, 57 Mo., 503. Plaintiff's brief also cites 1 J. B. Lee (Tenn.), 360; 48 Me., 35; 12 Kan., 500. In Wisconsin it was decided, in Meswinkle v. Jung, 30 Wis., 361, that usurious interest paid was not a sufficient consideration; but in a recent case the earlier decision has been overruled. Hamilton v. Prouty, 7 N. W. Rep., 659, 3 Wis., 291. In Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois and Ohio, the statute, like that of Michigan, does not make the contract void, and the decisions are uniform that usurious interest paid is a valuable consideration and upholds the agreement to forbear. Kunningham v. Bradford, 1 B. Monroe, 325; 8 B. Monroe, 382;

Cross v. Wood, 30 Ind., 378; 3 Ind., 346; 15 Ind., 115; 17 Ind., 202; Whittemore v. Ellison, 72 Ill., 301; 73 Ill., 170; 78 Ill., 257; McComb v. Kitteridge, 14 Ohio, —. See 1 Pars. on Notes and Bills (2d ed.), 240.

It is not believed that courts of justice, where the statute declares that usury shall not render a contract void, ought to allow the usurer to plead successfully want of consideration to defeat his agreement, when he has received and appropriated the money of his debtor. It is manifest that the money paid by Norton cannot, under the law of this state, be recovered back by him, and none of the other defendants have any claim upon it. Usury is a personal defense to be interposed by the debtor, or by those who, by reason of interest acquired in the subject matter, are entitled to employ his defenses. 1 Mich., 84; 11 Mich., 59. I agree with opinions in some of the cases that he who accepts usury as consideration for his agreement is estopped from claiming want of consideration. It is no offense, and is not wrong per se, to take usury, and there is no justice in saying that money, because received as usury, has no legal value. Usury laws are designed as a protection to the debtor class, and not as a shield for the usurer. After Lee and King have pleaded the validity of the agreement to forbear, their right to have the $15 applied as a payment on the note is waived, if such right ever existed. But the right exists only when the payment is usury, and I do not see why the $15 may not be regarded as so much paid by way of interest in advance, rather than have the agreement fail for want of consideration, though I have treated the payment as usury, as was claimed and argued on both sides. Lee's letter to plaintiff, expressing a hope that he would "not make any expense," does not appear to have been acted on by plaintiff; but I infer from facts in the case, he did make expense by suit subsequent to the date of Lee's letter, which suit was discontinued after the agreement to extend the payment. However that may be, the letter is not consent to an agreement to extend the day of payment for a year, and does not prevent Lee from insisting on the defense that he is discharged. Judgment of no cause of action will be entered in favor of defendants Lee and King, and in favor of plaintiff, and against all other defendants, for $1,994.54 damages, and for costs of suit, to be taxed.

VIOLETT v. PATTON.

(5 Cranch, 142-154. 1809.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes on upon two exceptions; one to the opinion of the circuit court given to the jury, and the other to the refusal of that court to give an opinion which was prayed by the counsel for the defendant below. The declaration contains two counts; one upon the indorsement of a promissory note, and the other for money had and received to the plaintiff's use. The question arising on the first bill of exceptions is whether the court erred in directing the jury respecting the liability of the defendant below on the indorsement which was the foundation of the action. The indorsement was made before the note was written, and it appeared that the body of the note was filled up by Patton. The opinion of the court was that if the jury should be satisfied from the testimony that Violett indorsed this paper for the purpose of giving Brooke a credit with Patton, and that, upon the faith of the note so drawn and indorsed, Patton did credit Brooke to the amount thereof, the circumstances that the note was made subsequent to the indorsement, without any consideration from Brooke to Violet, and was filled up by the plaintiff, did not bar the action; and, further, that the said Brooke was to be considered as authorized by the said Violet to make the note to Patton. This opinion is said to be erroneous; because, 1. The indorsement was made without consideration. 2. It was made on a blank paper. 3. There was no memorandum of the agreement in writing.

§ 553. Loan is a sufficient consideration for an indorsement on a blank sheet of paper.

In support of the first point the counsel for the plaintiff in error have cited several cases, intending to prove that an indorsement made without consideration, though it transfers the paper to the indorsee, creates no liability in the indorser; and that a promise in writing, made without consideration, is void. So far as respects the immediate parties having knowledge of the fact, and so far as relates to an indorsement under the statute of Virginia, this is correct; but the real question in the cause is, does the testimony prove a sufficient consideration for the promise created by the indorsement? This is not intended to comprehend any writing on which an action of debt is given. To constitute a consideration it is not absolutely necessary that a benefit should accrue to the person making the promise. It is sufficient that something valuable flows from the person to whom it is made; and that the promise is the inducement to the transaction. In the common case of a letter of credit given by A. to B., the person who, on the faith of that letter, trusts B., is admitted to have his remedy against A., although no benefit accrued to A. as the consideration of his promise. So in the present case, Patton trusted Brooke on the credit of Violet's name, and Violet wrote his name for the purpose of giving Brooke that credit with Patton. It was, in effect, and in intention, a letter of credit. The case shows that this was both the intention and the effect of Violet's giving his name to Brooke. In conscience, and in substance, then, it is a letter of credit, upon which the money it was intended to secure was advanced; and although in point of form the transaction takes the shape, and was intended to take the shape, of an indorsement, yet, so far as respects consideration, the indorsement has the full operation of an undertaking in the form of a letter of credit. It is common in Virginia for two persons to join in a promissory note, the one being the principal and the other the security. Although the whole benefit is received by the principal, this contract has never been considered as a nudum pactum with regard to the security. So far as respects consideration, no difference is perceived in the cases. Violet has signed his name upon this paper for the purpose of giving Brooke a credit with Patton, and his signature has obtained that credit. The consideration is precisely the same, whether his name be on the back or the face of the paper.

§ 554. Indorsement may precede making of note.

2. The second objection is, that the indorsement preceded the making of the note. This objection certainly comes with a very bad grace from the mouth of Violet. He indorsed the paper with the intent that the promissory note should be written on the other side; and that he should be considered as the indorser of that note. It was the shape he intended to give the transaction; and he is now concluded from saying or proving that it was not filled up when he indorsed it. It would be to protect himself from the effect of his promise, by alleging a fraudulent combination between himself and another to obtain money for that other from a third person. The case of Russell v. Langstaffe, reported in 2 Doug., 514, is conclusive on this point.

§ 555. Agreement as to indorsement on blank piece of paper need not be written.

3. The third objection is, that there was no memorandum of the agreement in writing. The argument on this point is founded on the idea that the statute of frauds in Virginia is copied literally from the statute of Charles II. This is not the fact. The first section of the act of Virginia differs from the fourth section of the statute of Charles II. in one essential respect. The statute of England enacts that no action shall be brought, in the cases specified, "unless the agreement on which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing," etc. The Virginia act enacts that no action shall be brought in the specified cases, "unless the promise or agreement on which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing," etc. The reasoning of the judges, in the cases in which they have decided that the consideration ought to be in writing, turns upon the word agreement, of which the consideration forms an integral part. This reason does not apply to the act of Virginia, in which the word "promise" is introduced. It was thought proper to notice this difference between the act of parliament and the act of Virginia, although the opinion of the court is not determined by it. In this case the assignment does express a consideration. It is made for value received. It is unnecessary to decide, in this case, whether the declaration ought to have alleged that the indorsement was made on consideration. With that question the jury had no concern, and the direction of the court was not affected by it. There being no demurrer, it could only occur in arrest of judgment. But on a motion in arrest of judgment, the defendant below could not have availed himself of this error, if it be one, because there are two counts in the declaration, one of which is unquestionably good, and the court cannot perceive on which the verdict was rendered. By the act of jeofails in Virginia there is no error if any one count will support the judgment.

The second exception is to the refusal of the circuit court to give the opinion prayed for by the counsel for the defendant below. When the error alleged is not that the court has misdirected the jury, but that the court has refused to give a particular opinion, the opinion demanded must be so perfectly stated that it becomes the duty of the court to give it as stated. In this case, the opinion required by the counsel consists of two parts. The first is to instruct the jury "that if they shall be satisfied, from the evidence, that Richard Brooke, the maker of the note in this case, had, at the time the note became due, or at any time previous to the commencement of this suit against the defendant, property sufficient to pay the debt claimed," etc., and the plaintiff brought no suit, then this action is not maintainable. This court conceives that the circuit court ought not to have given this opinion. Had Richard Brooke possessed property before the making of the note, and not afterwards, the opinion, in the terms in which it was required, would have been a direction to find their verdict for the defendant. So, if Richard Brooke had been in possession of property for a single day, and had the next day become insolvent, the court was asked to say that, in such a case, the indorser could only be made liable by suit against the maker. Such a direction, in the opinion of this court, would have been improper.

The second branch of the opinion the circuit court was required to give is in these words: "Or if the jury shall be satisfied that the said plaintiff and the said Brooke have, since the said note became due, both lived in the county of Fairfax, in Virginia, and have continued to reside in the county of Fairfax until the beginning of the present suit, and the plaintiff hath not brought suit against the said Brooke in Virginia, then the defendant is not liable in this action." If the plaintiff had sued Brooke elsewhere than in Virginia, or if Brooke had become insolvent previous to the making of the note, and had continued to be so, the opinion of the court, if given as prayed, would have been that, still, a suit against the maker of the note was necessary to give a right of action against the indorser. This is not understood to be the law of Virginia. It is understood to be the law that the maker of the note must be sued, if he is solvent, but his insolvency dispenses with the necessity of suing him. It is not known that any decision of the state courts requires that this insolvency should be proved by taking the oath of an insolvent debtor, nor is it believed that this is the only admissible testimony of the fact of insolvency. Other testimony may be admitted. It would therefore have been proper to leave it to the jury to determine whether it was, at any time, in the power of the plaintiff to have made the money due on this note, or on any part of it, from the maker by suit; and their verdict ought to have been regulated by the testimony in this respect. This opinion was not required.

This court is of opinion that there is no error, and that the judgment is to be affirmed with costs.

HOW v. KEMBALL.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 2 McLean, 103-111. 1840.)

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought by the plaintiffs as assignees of the following note:

"On the 20th of August, 1838, we jointly and severally promise to pay James Kinza, or order, the sum of three thousand nine hundred dollars, with seven per cent. interest per annum from the date hereof, for value received of him.

"MARK BEAUBIEN, Jr.,

"MARK BEAUBIEN, Sen.

"Chicago, August 20, 1837."

Indorsed: "I assign the within note to Benjamin Harris, without any recourse on me. October 10, 1837. James Kinza."

"I hereby guaranty the payment of the within note, unconditionally. Benjamin Harris."

"We guaranty the payment of the within note at the Chicago branch of the State Bank of Illinois. Kemball & Porter, A. Garrett, George W. Dale."

In the first count in the declaration the plaintiffs, who are the last assignees, set out the note and the assignments, and aver that, when the note became payable, the said Mark Beaubien, Jr., did not reside in Illinois, but in Michigan; and that, the 24th August, 1838, at the city of Chicago, the said plaintiffs instituted a suit on the note against Mark Beaubien, Sen., against whom judgment was entered. That execution on the judgment was issued, which was returned no property. The second count contains the assignments and the note, etc., as the first count. The third count contains the note, the assignments, and avers that the defendants assigned, and then and there guarantied the payment of the said note, on the day it should fall due, and payable at the Chicago branch of the State Bank of Illinois, etc. And that when the note became due suit was brought, etc. The fifth count sets out the note, the assignments, and avers that the defendants promised to guaranty, and did guaranty, the same, as above, etc. The sixth and seventh counts are substantially the same as above. The defendants pleaded the general issue. And, on the trial, an objection was made to the introduction of the note, and the indorsements thereon, on the ground that, in the first and second counts, the assignments of the note, merely, are set out, whilst the indorsement, under which the plaintiffs claim, is a guaranty to pay the note at the Chicago branch of the State Bank of Illinois. And this guaranty, it is contended, is not evidence under the other counts, because the action is not brought on it, and no consideration for the guaranty appears either on its face, or from the averments in the declaration.

The indorsement of the note by the defendants to the plaintiffs is not a mere assignment of the note, but the indorsers guaranty the payment of the amount, when due, at a specific place. This created a liability somewhat different from that which the law implies from an ordinary indorsement. On the face of the note no place of payment is designated. The indorsement, then, changes the place of payment, and binds the indorsers as guarantors for the amount. This, to some extent, at least, must be considered a new contract; a contract which can only be enforced by the plaintiffs with whom it was made. Had they assigned the note, this guaranty, by the defendants, would not have passed to the assignee, as would a guaranty given at the creation of the note. It was a new contract, so far as a different liability from a simple indorsement was incurred, not incorporated in the note, nor transferable by its indorsement. In the case of the Oxford Bank v. Haynes, 8 Pick., 423, it was held that where upon a promissory note, made by S. and A. to the plaintiffs, were written the words, "I guaranty the payment of the within note," which were signed by the defendant, that he was a guarantor, and not a surety. If the indorsement of the defendants be considered a guaranty, the action must be upon it as a special agreement, or upon the consideration which induced the defendants to enter into it. 2 Cox., 172; 2 Bro., 66, 614; 2 Schoales & L., 112; Chitt. on Bills (ed. 1839), 373. The third count in the declaration, and in the counts that followed it, set out the guaranty, and the breach, etc.

And here a question is raised, and elaborately argued, whether this guaranty is binding, as it states no consideration. That this is an undertaking by the defendants to pay the debt of another, which by the statute of frauds must be in writing; and that, as a consideration is essential to the validity of every such agreement, it must be stated in the agreement. The statute of frauds of this state, in regard to this question, is, substantially, copied from the 29 Car. 2, ch. 3, sec. 4. "No action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or of some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." Whether the consideration constitutes an essential part of the agreement, which, by the act, must be in writing, is a question that has been much discussed in England and in this country, and upon which courts have differed in their decisions. Until the decision of the case of Wain v. Warlters, 5 East R., 10, was decided, Lord Ellenborough said, "we had always taken the law to be clear, that if a man agreed, in writing, to pay the debt of another, it was not necessary that the consideration should appear on the face of the writing; and so understanding the law we have no authority or disposition to change it." The action of Wain and another was brought against Warlters, as the assignees and holders of a bill of exchange, drawn by one Gore, and accepted by one Hall, which was due, and for the payment of which the defendant gave the following promise in writing: "Messrs. Wain & Co., I will engage to pay you by half-past four this day, fifty-six pounds and expenses on bill, that amount on Hall." On this promise the plaintiffs alleged that they stayed proceedings, etc.; but the court held that it was not binding, as the consideration, which was a part of the agreement, was not stated in it. That without a consideration the agreement was inoperative, and that they might as well hear parol proof of the promise as the consideration. This decision has been much examined in England, and in several late cases has been confirmed. And particularly in the cases of Saunders v. Wakefield, 4 Barn. & Ald., 595; Jenkins v. Reynolds, 3 Brod. & B., 14; James v. Williams, 5 Barn. & Ad., 1109; Clancy v. Piggott, 2 Ad. & Ell., 473.

The same doctrine has been sanctioned in the cases of Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns., 29; Lanson v. Wyman, 16 Wend., 246. It has been denied in the cases of Hunt v. Adams, 5 Mass., 358; Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass., 122; Levy v. Merrill, 4 Greenl., 180; id., 387; Sage v. Wilcox, 6 Conn., 81; Miller v. Irvine, 1 Dev. & B., 103; 5 Cranch, 151-2. In Ex parte Minet, 14 Ves. Jr., 189, Lord Eldon said there was a variety of authorities directly contradicting Wain v. Warlters; and in Ex parte Gardom, 15 Ves. Jr., 286, he says, "until that case was decided I had always supposed the law to be clear, that if a man agreed, in writing, to pay the debt of another, it was not necessary that the consideration should appear in the writing." On reading the late English decisions on this subject, I cannot perceive the conclusiveness of the reasoning of the judges. Nor can I perceive the danger of subverting the object of the statute, by adhering to what Lords Eldon and Ellenborough considered, before the decision of Wain v. Warlters, its settled construction. And it will be found that in some of the latest decisions in the queen's bench, if the above case has not been departed from, its principles have not been very strictly adhered to. An individual agrees, in writing, to pay the debt of another. It is admitted that without a consideration such an agreement is not binding. But why may not the consideration be proved by parol? This, the court say, would open the door to fraud, which the statute of frauds intended to close. That as no agreement is valid without consideration, therefore the consideration is an essential part of the agreement, and must be in writing. So a consideration is essential to the validity of a deed; and yet, where the deed upon its face expresses no consideration, one may be proved by parol. Peacock v. Monk, 1 Ves., 128; White v. Weeks, 1 Penn., 486; Davenport v. Mason, 15 Mass., 85; Hartley v. M'Anulty, 4 Yeates, 95. "No court of common law has ever said that there should be a consideration directly between the persons giving and receiving the guaranty. It is enough that the person for whom the guarantor becomes surety has benefit, or the person to whom the guaranty is given suffers inconvenience, as an inducement to the surety to become guaranty for the debtor." Com. on Contracts, 242.

In the case of Newbury v. Armstrong, 6 Bing., 201, the court held that the consideration sufficiently appeared on the following guaranty: "I agree to be security to you for J. C., late in the employ of J. P., for whatever you may intrust him with while in your employ to the amount of £50." Mr. Justice Burrough observed, "whatever is necessarily implied may be taken to be in the instrument." And Chief Justice Tindall remarked, "we ought not to be too strict in the construction of these instruments; for if every agreement entered into by a tradesman be so minutely criticised, it will be necessary to resort to an attorney in the most common intercourse of life." In the case of Davies v. Wilkinson, decided in the queen's bench, May, 1839, and reported 1 Jurist (Am. ed.), 372, the court held the following instrument valid: "I agree to pay to Mr. C. Davies, or his order, £695 at four instalments, viz., £200 on June 10, 1833; £150 on the settling-day, after the St. Leger, at Doncaster; £150 on the settling-day, at Epsom, in 1834; £100 on the settling-day, after the St. Leger, in 1834; the remaining £95 to go as a set-off for an order of Reynolds to Mr. Thompson, and the remainder of his debt owing from Mr. C. Davies to him." Lord Denman observes, "this instrument is a note, up to a certain point, but the addition makes it an agreement. As to the second objection, that, if it be an agreement, there is no consideration on the face of it, I think the promise in this case conveyed by the words, 'I agree to pay,' imports consideration." How these words import a consideration more than the words, I promise to pay, is not perceived. The court seem to feel the practical inconvenience of their former decisions on this subject, and, without overruling them expressly, are desirous of escaping from their consequences.

§ 558. The consideration may be the taking of the paper guarantied.

But in deciding the question now before the court, it appears to me there need be no conflict with the English decisions. The guaranty here is by the defendants as indorsers of the note to the plaintiffs. The defendants are the assignees of the note, and they assign it to the plaintiffs. Now an ordinary indorsement, as between the indorser and the indorsee, is evidence under the general count for money had and received. And this effect is given to the indorsement although in fact money may not have been the consideration passing between the parties. Now, is not the transfer of this note by the defendants to the plaintiffs, at the time of the guaranty, sufficient evidence of consideration? In the act of making the guaranty the property in the note is assigned. And does not this import a consideration? The guarantors are not only parties to the note, but the responsibility they assume is the ground on which the plaintiffs purchase the note. There is, says Com. on Contracts, an important distinction between a collateral guaranty on a separate paper, or without indorsement, that a bill shall be duly paid by the parties thereto, and the act of indorsing the instrument. The collateral guaranty is void unless it be in writing and signed, and be given upon a sufficient consideration. Where the guaranty or promise to pay the debt of another is made at the same time with the contract to which it is collateral, is incorporated into it, and becomes part of it, the whole is one contract, and the want of consideration, as between the plaintiff and the guarantor, cannot be alleged. Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns., 29. And much less can a want of consideration be alleged by an assignor who in assigning a note guaranties the payment of it. This case is much stronger than the one cited from Johnson. The guarantor in that case, at the time the note is executed, guaranties its payment. He had no beneficial interest in the note, but was the mere surety of the maker. And as this was done at the time the note was given, the act of guaranty became incorporated in the note and constituted a part of it. The note may have been received on his credit, and he shall not set up a want of consideration. The same reason applies with greater force against the defendants. Their guaranty was not only an inducement to the plaintiffs to receive the note, but they were the holders and owners of the note, and as such were interested in selling and transferring it to the plaintiffs. They, it is true, undertake to pay the debt of the drawers of the note, but they do so that they may pass the note to the plaintiffs more readily, and at its full nominal value. If this be not the clear import of the transaction, both from the language of the guaranty, connected with the note, and the assignment of it, and the averments in the declaration, I have failed to comprehend the subject. Where the party himself is benefited by the transfer, says Chitty on Bills (ed. 1839), 272, it should seem that even his verbal promise would be valid. I cannot doubt that the defendants, under the circumstances of this case, cannot allege a want of consideration, and I think the guaranty is sufficiently set out in the third and other following counts. The district judge, however, entertaining some doubts as to the sufficiency of the averments of the declaration to admit the evidence, a proposition was made to certify the point to the supreme court, under the act of congress. But the plaintiff's attorneys, to avoid delay, asked leave to amend the declaration, which was granted.

RUSSELL v. PERKINS.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 1 Mason, 363-371. 1818.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Assumpsit on an agreement made in 1802 to guaranty the notes of Sturgis, who gave notes exceeding $10,000 in 1803, and in 1804 formed a partnership with Lovell, which continued until 1816, during which time S.'s individual notes were taken up and firm notes were given in renewal of them. These notes were renewed from time to time until the dissolution, upon which they were taken up and replaced by S.'s individual notes. These were paid by the plaintiff, who sues defendant on his guaranty.

Opinion by STORY, J.

§ 559. A guaranty of the notes of A. cannot be applied to the notes of A. and B.

I am of the opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. Independently of every other objection, it is decisive against the plaintiff that the case is not brought within the terms of the guaranty. The guaranty cannot in reason be construed beyond the plain and obvious import of its language. The letter imports that the defendants will guaranty any notes indorsed by the plaintiff for Mr. Sturgis, to the amount of $10,000. It does not cover any notes indorsed for the firm of Sturgis & Lovell. Nothing can be clearer than that a guaranty of the notes of A. cannot be applied to the notes of A. and B. It is wholly unimportant to the defendants whether the notes would have been more or less safe under such circumstances. They have a right to stand upon the terms of their contract, and declare non in hac fœdera venimus.

§ 560. Notes are extinguished if taken up when due and replaced by new ones.

The original notes of Sturgis, indorsed by the plaintiff under the guaranty in 1803, were taken up and extinguished by the new partnership notes, indorsed by the plaintiff. When once extinguished, the title under the guaranty was gone, and a continuing liability could not be afterwards created without the express or implied consent of the defendants. The notes on which the present action is brought were indeed made by Sturgis, and indorsed and paid by the plaintiff. But there is no pretense that they were made upon the faith of the guaranty.

Supposing they were now for the first time made, after so great a lapse of time, upon a new consideration, the defendants would not be liable on their guaranty; for the guaranty could not be applied to indorsements made for the first time at such a distance of time. Much less could these notes be sustained under the guaranty, when they were made for the express purpose of changing partnership transactions into individual negotiations, so as to shape a case within the terms of the guaranty. If, indeed, these notes could be referred back (as they certainly cannot be) to the original transactions in 1803, the facts would be equally fatal to the plaintiff, for he would be guilty of gross laches in not giving notice of the indorsements to the defendants during the space of twelve years, and in giving credit to the firm during all that time, without any communication with the defendants, on account of debts incurred under the guaranty. It is not, however, necessary to dwell on this view of the cause, because it is plain that the original notes of Sturgis, in 1803, to which alone the guaranty ever attached, were duly paid and extinguished, as they became due, at the several banks, by the substitution of new notes in the partnership name, which the defendants never undertook to guaranty.

Verdict for the defendants.

LEWIS v. BREWSTER.

(Circuit Court for Michigan: 2 McLean, 21-27. 1839.)

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—To the four special counts in the declaration the defendant demurs, and takes issue on the common counts. The questions in the case arise on the demurrer, and there are some objections as to the manner in which the instrument is set out; but as the main point appears in the declaration, it is proper to advert to the obligation on which the action is founded. It is as follows: "July 27, 1838. I do hereby guaranty the eventual payment to George W. Lewis, of Boston, Mass., of the following named notes or obligations, given by Mead, Kellogg & Co., to the order of said Lewis, and payable at the Commercial Bank in the city of New York, viz.: One note for $1,666.55, due two months from date; one note for $1,666.39, due three months from date; one note for $1,686.34, due four months from date; one note for $1,689.37, due five months after date; one note for $1,722.30, due six months from date, which said notes are given by said Mead, Kellogg & Co., to said Lewis, in payment for his account against them, which account is this day settled in full, as above. The above is done for a valuable consideration." Signed, "William Brewster."

§ 561. Consideration essential to sustain a guaranty; but it may be credit given to the guarantor's principal.

It is objected to the first count that it does not set forth a consideration for the undertaking of the defendant. But this objection seems not to be well founded. In the first count it is alleged that, in consideration the plaintiff, at the special request of the defendant, would sell and deliver to Mead, Kellogg & Co., merchandise to the amount of $8,040.95, the defendant promised, whether in writing or not does not appear, to guaranty the payment of certain notes to be given by the purchasers for the same. And the plaintiff avers that the merchandise was sold, the notes taken on the 27th July, 1838, and that on the same day the defendant, in writing, guarantied the eventual payment of the same. Now it sufficiently appears in the declaration that the merchandise was sold on the promise to guaranty the payment of the notes to be given, and that the guaranty was executed in pursuance of this promise. Here was a confidence and trust reposed in the defendant, which induced the plaintiff to sell the goods, and this constitutes a consideration for the guaranty.

§ 562. Notice of acceptance of promise to guaranty not necessary, when.

But it is alleged that the promise to guaranty the notes, not being in writing, was void, and that the declaration does not show that the defendant had notice of the acceptance of his guaranty. And the cases in 7 Pet., 113, and 12 Pet., 497, are referred to. These cases, however, as it regards the notice of the acceptance of the guaranty, are not analogous to the present one. This is a guaranty of the payment of certain notes specified, and, of course, is a recognition of the obligation of the original promise. It admits every legal requisite necessary to give effect to the obligation. Under the written guaranty now before us, there could be no notice of acceptance, for the execution of the instrument shows an acceptance.

§ 563. Doctrine of consideration.

That there must be a consideration to make a guaranty obligatory is admitted. But this consideration is generally found in the credit given to the guarantor, which induced the vendor to part with his property. If it be admitted that the guarantor was not discharged from his promise, it is contended the count is defective in not averring that the guaranty was in consideration of this liability. 4 John., 280. That the guaranty was given in consideration of the sale of the goods on the promise of the guarantor to be responsible, though not in terms averred, sufficiently appears from the facts stated in the first count. A special averment of this fact would have been more technical, and more, perhaps, in conformity to the correct rules of pleading; but it would not have given greater point or certainty to the count.

§ 564. Guarantor is entitled to notice of default.

That the holder of the notes was bound to use diligence is a doctrine well established; but it is not necessary to consider this point in reference to the commencement of suits on the notes and the proper averments in relation to the same, which it is contended are not to be found either in the first or the second, third and fourth counts. We will come at once to the great question in the case, which is, whether the holder of the notes was bound to give notice to the guarantor of their dishonor; and if this shall be resolved in the affirmative, whether the declaration should contain an averment that notice was given. This description of obligation is common in commercial transactions, and the principles which govern it have often come under judicial cognizance. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that no notice was necessary, and that it is matter of defense for the defendant to show the damages he has sustained for want of notice. And to sustain this position 2 Hall's Rep., 199; 9 East, 348; 1 Holt's N. P., 153; 3 Moore, 15; 6 Moore, 521; 3 Brod. & Bing., 211; 1 Bing., 216; 2 Camp., 436; 10 Pet., 482, are cited. These are cases in which a notice to the guarantor need not be given, as where the drawer of the note guarantied is insolvent when it becomes payable; and in such a case it is matter of defense for the defendant to show that he has suffered damage for want of notice. It is a well established rule that the same degree of strictness in regard to giving notice to a guarantor is not necessary to charge him as to charge an indorser; and there are English authorities which favor the position taken by the plaintiff that the inquiry is whether the guarantor has been injured by want of notice. But the weight of authority in the English books is against the position assumed, and in this view the American authorities are still stronger.

The undertaking of the guarantor is collateral, as much so as that of the indorser of a bill; and the reason for a notice to him is as strong as to an indorser. And if commercial convenience has dispensed with the same strictness in the former as in the latter, it still requires a reasonable notice. It is as necessary that the guarantor should endeavor to obtain an indemnity from his principal as an indorser; and it is on this ground that a notice is as indispensable in the one case as the other. In the case of Reynolds v. Douglass, 12 Pet., 498, the court say: "In this part of the record the question is fairly raised whether the insolvency of Haring, prior to or at the time of payment, will excuse the plaintiffs from making a demand on him and giving notice to the guarantors." And after referring to 9 Serg. & Rawle, 198; 1 Barn. & Cress., 10; 8 East, 242; 3 Kent's Com., 123; 2 Taunt., 206; 5 M. & S., 62; 3 Barn. & Cress., 439, the court remark: "The rule is well settled that the guarantor of a promissory note whose name does not appear on the note is bound without notice where the maker of the note was insolvent at its maturity." And again, in their opinion, the court say, in reference to the charge of the circuit court to the jury, "in their fifth and last instruction, the court charge the jury, that, to enable the plaintiffs to recover on said letter of credit, they must prove that a demand of payment had been made of Chester Haring, the principal debtor, of the debt sued for; and in case of non-payment, notice should have been given in a reasonable time to the defendants; and on failure of such proof the defendants are in law discharged." "This instruction, the court remark, rests upon the necessity of a personal demand of Haring by the plaintiffs. It has been already shown that this demand was unnecessary in case of Haring's insolvency." From this opinion it is clear that the court considered a notice to the guarantor of the dishonor of the note guaranteed indispensable, except in case of insolvency. But that where an insolvency at the maturity of a note is established, neither a demand nor notice is necessary. The same doctrine is laid down in the cases of The Oxford Bank v. Haynes, 8 Pick., 423; Garrow v. Gills, 9 Serg. & R., 202; Greene v. Dodge, 2 Ohio, 498; Grice v. Ricks, 3 Dev. Ala., R. E., 2; Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet., 113.

There are some apparently contradictory decisions to those in the New York and other reports; but on a strict examination, they will be found, in general, to affirm the same principle. Where the guarantor has been held liable, without notice, it has been where the maker of the note guaranteed was insolvent when it became payable, or on account of a liability growing out of the original transaction. The undertaking of the guarantor in the present case was, not to pay absolutely or unconditionally, but to pay eventually; that is, if payment could not be obtained of the drawers. His undertaking was then conditional, and a notice of the happening of the condition which was to make his obligation absolute was necessary; and this we consider is the well established doctrine sanctioned by the supreme court. If the parties who ought primarily to have paid the bill or note were solvent at the time the same became due, and for some time afterwards, and only subsequently became insolvent, before notice or inference of actual damage from the want of notice to the party guarantying, or otherwise collaterally liable, will prevail until rebutted by actual proof, that if notice had been given payment would not have been obtained. Chitt. on Bills (ed. 1839), 474; Philips v. Astling, 2 Taunt., 206; Holbrow v. Wilkins, 1 Barn. & Cress., 10; Bridge v. Berry, 3 Taunt., 130;

Bishop v. Rowe, 3 Maule & Selw., 362; Cory v. Scott, 3 Barn. & Ald., 619. If this notice was essential to fix the responsibility of the guarantor, was it necessary to aver it in the declaration specially; or, is the general averment in the counts demurred to sufficient?

§ 565. Necessary averments in pleading to excuse defective notice.

Everything necessary to give the plaintiff a right of action must appear in the declaration; and a notice being indispensable to this right must, of course, be averred. The omission of an averment of notice, when necessary, will be fatal on demurrer or judgment by default. Cro. Jac., 432. This defect may be avoided by a verdict, except against the drawer of a bill. 1 Strange, 214; 1 Saund., 228, a; 4 Binn., 108; 7 Serg. & R., 310. But a general averment in a declaration on a bill of exchange "of all which the said promises the defendants had afterwards, etc., had notice," is sufficient. 3 John., 207. The general averment in this case is the same in all the counts, and is, "of all which the said defendant, on the 2d of September, 1839, at Detroit, had notice." This notice, as averred, was more than seven months after the last note became payable, and was, in fact, about the time this suit was commenced. Had the averment been "of which premises the defendant had due notice," it might have been held insufficient, as, under such an averment, the fact of the notice, and the circumstances under which it was given, would be matter of evidence. But the notice averred is special, as to the time it was given, which was near a year after the first note became due, and, as before remarked, more than seven months after the last one was payable; and no excuse is alleged why it was not given before. There are circumstances which will excuse the want of notice, and these should always be stated in the declaration. Chitt. on Bills, 212, 319; 1 Salk., 214; Vin. Ab., title Notice, A. 2. If a notice be necessary it must appear in the declaration to have been given in due time, or the excuse for not giving it must be stated. The averment of a notice after the lapse of so long a period, unaccompanied by an excuse for the delay, does not show the diligence which the law requires. It is, in fact, nothing more than the general averment of notice, which refers to the commencement of the suit, and is used in some cases more as a matter of form than substance.

In this respect we think the declaration is defective; and without examining the other points made in the argument in support of the demurrer, we sustain it on this ground. Leave given to amend declaration.

DENNIS v. RIDER.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 2 McLean, 451-453. 1841.)

Opinion by the Court.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought on a promissory note. The defendants pleaded non-assumpsit and four special pleas, substantially, that Pierson was the security of the other defendants. That he gave notice to the agent of the plaintiffs that the principals were in doubtful circumstances, and requested him to commence suit. That his co-defendants were then solvent, and able to pay the amount, but the plaintiffs neglected to bring suit until, etc., at which time their co-defendants became insolvent. To these pleas the plaintiffs' counsel demurred. In this state there is an act entitled "An act for the relief of sureties, in a summary way, in certain cases," approved 24th March, 1819, which provides that the surety may give notice to the promisee or holder of the note, in writing, forthwith to sue, etc., and if he shall fail to do so he shall forfeit the right to recover from the surety.

§ 566. At common law creditor need not sue maker upon being requested so to do by surety.

The pleas are not filed under this statute, but at common law. It is not pretended that the notice to the holder of the note was given in the manner required by the statute. To sustain these pleas the case of Paine v. Packard, 13 John., 173, is relied on. In that case it was said, if an obligee, or holder of a note, who is requested by the surety to proceed without delay and collect the money of the principal, who is then solvent, neglects to proceed against the principal, who afterwards becomes insolvent, the surety will be exonerated. That case was decided without argument, and no authority was referred to except a decision in 10 East Rep., 34. In the case in East there was a plea filed similar to the pleas in this case, which was not demurred to. Lord Ellenborough said: The only question is, whether the laches of the obligees, in not calling upon the principal so soon as they ought to have done, if the accounts had been properly examined from time to time, be an estoppel at law against the sureties. I know of no such estoppel at law, whatever remedy there may be in equity. The defendants' counsel, also, relies on the case of King v. Baldwin, 17 John., 384. That was an appeal from the decision of the chancellor, before whom relief was asked by a defendant, against whom judgment, as surety, had been obtained. He pleaded to the suit, at law, that the plaintiff neglected to bring suit, although specially requested, on the ground that his principal was about to become insolvent. The court overruled the evidence under the plea. A motion was made for a new trial, but not prosecuted. And on the ground that the promisee might have recovered from the promisor, had the suit been prosecuted as requested, the bill was filed praying relief. Chancellor Kent dismissed the bill on the ground that the complainant was entitled to no relief. He examined the doctrine at large, and maintained that there could be no relief at law, and that the circumstances of the case entitled him to none in equity. In the court of errors Judge Spencer reviews the opinion of Chancellor Kent, and reaffirms the doctrine in the case of Paine v. Packard. The judges who decided that case were Thompson, Ch. Justice, Spencer, Vanness, Yates and Platt. The court of errors being equally divided, the presiding officer reversed the decision of the chancellor. Platt, Justice, changed his opinion, being convinced that the decision in Paine v. Packard was erroneous. Yates concurred with him, and, if I mistake not, Vanness.

In the case of The Bank of Steubenville v. Administrators of Carroll, 5 Ham., 207, the defendant pleaded that he signed as surety, etc., to which the plaintiff demurred, and the court decided that, if any change be made between the creditor and the surety, it discharges the surety, and that his defense may be set up at law as well as in equity. A case is cited in 14 Wend., 165, in which it was held that a notice to the agent of the promisee to prosecute the principal, by the surety, was sufficient. The rule in New York may be considered, perhaps, as settled by the decision above cited in the court of errors. A decision in that court establishes the law for the state of New York; but it is believed that, beyond the jurisdiction of that state, the decisions of the supreme court are chiefly consulted as authority.

The rule is well established that where an indorser has become fixed by demand and notice, if the holder of the bill shall, for a valuable consideration, agree with the drawer or acceptor to give him more time, it discharges the indorser. McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat., 554; Bank of United States v. Hatch,

1 McL., 90; Same Case, 6 Pet., 250. This is upon the ground that the surety has a right, at any time after the bill becomes payable, to pay the holder, and be substituted to all his rights. Not that he is entitled, as has been ruled by several courts, to an assignment of the bill, because that is discharged by the surety, but he is entitled to all the collateral securities, such as mortgages, pledges of personal property, etc., which the creditor may hold. But if the creditor make a contract to extend the time of payment, this suspends this right of the surety, and he is consequently released. And so if the creditor, without the consent of the surety, changes the nature of the obligation of the principal in any respect. In these cases relief may be had at law. The question is not whether the surety has, in fact, been injured, but whether his right to pay the bill or note has not been suspended; or whether the contract has not been materially altered by the creditor and principal. But until the case of Paine v. Packard, in 13 Johns., and The Bank of Steubenville v. Administrators of Carroll, 5 Ham., no case has been found where relief to a surety beyond this has been given at law. The case of Paine v. Packard introduced a new rule. It was so considered by many of the most learned and able men who gave opinions in the case of King v. Baldwin, in 17 Johns. And this rule is essentially different from the one which, prior to that time, had been recognized at law. That was founded upon an essential change of the contract, either as to the time of payment or the acts to be done, without the assent of the surety. But the case of Paine v. Packard held, if the creditor neglected to prosecute the principal, on being required to do so by the surety, and the principal proved to be insolvent, the surety was discharged. And this without any indemnity offered by the surety, as to the costs incurred.

§ 568. Diligence by creditor to bind surety.

Now the rule has been, at law, that the creditor, beyond demand and notice, is not bound to active diligence; and there seems to be reason in this, for the surety confided more in the principal debtor than the creditor. The creditor, until the surety became bound, was unwilling to trust the principal. Now, if the creditor or the surety must be subjected to inconvenience and expense on account of this confidence, should it not fall upon the surety? He was the active agent in inducing the contract, and justice would seem to require that, to save himself from loss, he should again become active. And this is an established principle. In pursuance of former decisions he could pay the money and claim all the rights of the creditor, or he could file a bill, and, on the special circumstances of the case, ask the court to compel the creditor to bring suit. The New York rule, however, gives, at law, the same effect to a notice as results from a decree under the former rule. Now, the law having established the rule that a suit in chancery is necessary, it would seem not to be advisable to change it on mere notions of policy or convenience. But if this question were now open it might be considered a matter of doubtful policy to adopt the New York rule. There are many matters which, under that rule, it might become necessary to investigate, and which more safely and properly might be examined in chancery than at law. Complicated matters of fraud connected with the circumstances of the principal debtor might arise; the time of his insolvency, etc., which could not be well inquired into or understood without his answer, and his answer can only be required in chancery. In a plain case where the principal debtor was solvent when the notice was given, and afterwards became insolvent, it would seem the New York rule would be salutary. But such a case, it is presumed, would seldom occur. The former rule rested upon the change of the contract. This was a matter of fact and of law which the jury, under the instructions of the court, could determine. But whether the surety had been injured by the neglect of the creditor to prosecute the principal debtor must often give rise to questions which can only be investigated in chancery. The old rule, therefore, seems to be safer and better than the new one; and this is, no doubt, the reason why the new rule has had so limited an influence.

Mr. Justice Story, in his Equity Jurisprudence, 1 vol., 592, sec. 639, says: If the debt is due and the creditor does not choose to call upon the debtor for payment, the surety may come into equity by a bill against the creditor and the debtor and compel the latter to make payment of the debt, so as to exonerate the surety from his responsibility. In cases of this sort, he says, there is not, however, any duty of active diligence incumbent upon the creditor. It is for the surety to move in the matter. But if the surety requires the exercise of such diligence, and there is no risk, delay or expense to the creditor, or a suitable indemnity is offered against the consequences of risk, delay and expense, it seems that the surety has a right to call upon the creditor to do the most he can for his benefit, and if he will not, a court of equity will compel him. Nesbit v. Smith, 2 Bro. Ch., 579; Hays v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch., 123. In the 322d page, sec. 327 of the same volume, Mr. Justice Story says: Whether the surety can thus compel the creditor to sue the principal or not, he has a clear right, upon paying the debt to the principal, to be substituted in the place of the creditor as to all securities held by the latter for the debt, and to have the same benefit that he would have therein. Longthorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves., 162; Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. Jr., 12, 22. In the case of Wright v. Simpson, 6 Ves. Jr., 734, Lord Eldon admits that the surety might have a right to compel the creditor to proceed against the debtor under some circumstances. But then, in such a case, the surety is compellable to deposit the money in court for the payment of the creditor. So that in fact it is but the case of an indirect subrogation to the rights of the creditor, upon a virtual payment of the debt by such a deposit.

§ 569. What indulgence to principal will release surety.

A surety in a bond will be released when the obligee does some act which varies the terms of the original contract; but forbearance to sue is not such an act, and if the surety think otherwise, he should apply to the court of equity and compel the obligee to sue. Burn v. Poang, 3 Desaus., 604. The indulgence granted to a principal, which is to discharge from his engagement, must be of that kind whereby the value of the contract is changed, or whereby the creditor, without the consent of the surety and by his own act, puts it out of his own power to enforce the payment of the debt by the principal. It does not mean a mere forbearance to sue the principal, which a court of equity, on application of the surety, might direct him to do, on pain of foregoing his claim against the surety. Buchanan v. Bordley, 4 Har. & McH., 41. A surety, apprehending danger from the delay of the creditor, may come into this court and compel the creditor to sue the principal debtor on giving an indemnity against the consequences of risk, delay and expense. Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch., 129. To require the creditor to sue the principal on a mere notice of the surety, without an indemnity, when the surety could not be included in the suit, would seem to be unreasonable. Upon the whole, we think that the case of Paine v. Packard is not sustained by authority, and, on principle, it is not recommended by such considerations of policy as should lead to the adoption of the rule sanctioned by it. We think it safer to follow the old rule, which is well established in practice. The demurrer to the pleas is sustained. Judgment for the plaintiff, with stay of execution until the next term, by consent, etc.

ROSS v. JONES.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Eastern District of Arkansas.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—On the 31st of January, 1860, Rives gave to Bull his note, due November 1, 1861. Both of these parties were citizens of Arkansas. Bull indorsed it to Jones, of Tennessee. At maturity the note was duly protested, and notice given to Bull of its dishonor. In 1869 Bull died, and Ross became his administrator. In October, 1871, Jones sued Ross in assumpsit on his intestate's indorsement, and Ross pleaded the statute of limitations of five years, to which Ross replied that the statute of limitations did not run from June 1, 1861, to April 2, 1866, on account of the civil war, and that the suit was brought within five years, etc. Defendant's rejoinder was that the courts were closed from the month of May, 1861, to the month of March, 1865; without this, that they were so closed from June 1, 1861, to August 6, 1865. To this rejoinder plaintiff demurred, because it put in issue a matter of public law pleaded in the replication. The demurrer was sustained. The second plea was in effect a statute of Arkansas (Gould's Digest, 1015), which provides that any person bound for another as security in any . . . note . . . may require suit to be brought within thirty days from the time of notice, and if suit be not so brought by the holder and duly prosecuted, etc., the security shall be exonerated, etc. The plaintiff demurred also to this plea, and this demurrer being also sustained, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Two errors are assigned, as follows: 1st. That the court erred in sustaining the demurrer of the plaintiffs to the rejoinder filed by the defendant to the plaintiffs' replication to the first special plea of the defendant. 2d. That the court erred in sustaining the demurrer of the plaintiffs to the third plea of the defendant.

§ 570. Statute of limitations of Arkansas—unsealed written contracts barred in five years from maturity.

I. Unsealed written contracts are barred by the statute of limitations of that state in five years from maturity, and it appears that the note described in the declaration matured on the 1st of November next after its date, but the record shows that the indorser deceased on the 15th of November, 1869, leaving the note unpaid and outstanding. Under the laws of the state the general statute of limitations runs from the maturity of the contract to the granting of administration upon the estate of the decedent, when the general statute ceases to run and the statute of limitations applicable to the estates of deceased persons begins to run. Brown v. Merrick, 16 Ark., 612; Biscoe v. Madden, 17 id., 533. Hence the defendant pleaded that the cause of action did not accrue to the plaintiffs at any time within five years next before the grant of letters of administration upon the estate of the deceased indorser.

War, when duly declared or recognized as such by the war-making power, imports a prohibition to the subjects or citizens of all commercial intercourse and all correspondence with citizens or persons domiciled in the enemy country. Total inability, therefore, on the part of an enemy creditor to sustain any contract in the tribunals of the other belligerent, exists by the law of nations during the continuance of the war, but the restoration of peace removes the disability and opens the doors of the courts. Unquestioned right to sue is the status of the creditor if the contract was made during peace, but the effect of war is to suspend the right, not only without any fault on the part of the creditor, but under circumstances which make it his duty to abstain from any such attempt. His remedy is suspended by the acts of the two governments and by the law of nations, not applicable to the contract at its date, but which comes into operation in consequence of an event over which he has no control. Hanger v. Abbott, 6 Wall., 539. Peace, it is said, restores the right and the remedy, but as that cannot be if the statute of limitations continues to run during the period the creditor is rendered incapable of suing, it necessarily follows that the operation of the statute is also suspended during the same period. Attempt is made to distinguish the case before the court from the case in which that rule of decision was first promulgated by this court, but it is clear that the attempt must be unsuccessful, as the same doctrines have since been applied in a case where a mortgagee, who was a citizen and resident of one of the Confederate States, brought a suit after the close of the war upon a bond and mortgage executed prior to the war by citizens of one of the loyal states, and the court held that the period from the proclamation of the blockade to the proclamation that the war was closed, must be deducted in the computation of the time which the statute of limitations of the loyal state had run against the right of action. Brown v. Hiatts, 15 Wall., 177.

§ 572. The civil war was flagrant in Arkansas from June 1, 1861, to April 2, 1866.

Extended discussion of that topic is quite unnecessary, as the oft-repeated decisions of this court have established the rule that the statute of limitations was suspended in the rebellious states during the existence of the late rebellion, and the express decision of this court is that the war was flagrant in that state for the whole period specified in the replication filed by the plaintiffs. Batesville Institute v. Kauffman, 18 id., 155. Viewed in the light of that decision, it is clear that the rejoinder filed by the defendant is sufficient, and that the ruling of the circuit court adjudging it bad was correct. The Protector, 12 Wall., 700; Adger v. Alston, 15 id., 555; Semmes v. Insurance Co., 13 id., 158; Levy v. Stewart, 11 id., 253.

§ 573. An indorser is not a surety, and his indorsee does not release him by giving time to maker.

II. Due demand of the maker, protest and notice to the indorser of non-payment are admitted, and it is alleged that the indorser subsequently, by a certain notice in writing, required the plaintiffs, as holders of the note, to sue the maker and the indorser at a time when the maker was solvent and able to pay the same, and that the plaintiffs omitted for more than thirty days to comply with the terms of the notice, during which time the maker became insolvent. Based on these facts, the second defense set up is that the indorser was discharged by the neglect of the holders of the note to comply with the terms of that notice, which must depend in a great measure upon the nature of the obligation that the indorser assumed by his contract of indorsement. If the holder of a negotiable promissory note does anything, the effect of which is to suspend, impair or destroy the right of the prior parties to indemnity from those otherwise liable over to them, he cannot resort to the parties affected by his conduct to make good the default of the maker of the instrument. Bank v. Hatch, 6 Pet., 258 (§§ 589-591, infra); McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat., 556; Wood v. Bank, 9 Cow., 194; Bank v. Hanrick, 2 Story, 416; Newcomb v. Raynor, 21 Wend., 108; Byles on Bills (11th ed.), 247, n. 1; 3 Story on Notes (5th ed.), § 413. Simple indulgence, however, or mere delay to enforce payment, without a binding contract to give time, will not, under the general rules of commercial law, have that effect, even in the case of a party occupying strictly the contract relation of a surety. Philpot v. Briant, 4 Bing., 721; Story on Notes (5th ed.), § 415.

Indorsers, it is sometimes said, are sureties, but their contract, which is a new one as compared with the maker of the note, differs in some important respects from that of the surety, who is a joint promisor with the principal, as the holder of such an instrument is under no obligation to use diligence to enforce payment against the maker in order to hold the indorser. Bank v. Myers, 1 Bailey, 418; Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns., 179; Stafford v. Yates, 18 id., 329; Bank v. Rollins, 13 Me., 205; Page v. Webster, 15 id., 256; Bank v. Ives, 17 Wend., 502; Sterling v. Marietta and S. T. Co., 11 Serg. & R., 182; Kennard v. Knott, 4 Mann. & G., 474. Even in the case where the holder of a promissory note was, after the note fell due, called upon by the indorser to prosecute the maker, of whom the amount might then have been collected, but who afterwards became insolvent, and the holder neglected to do as requested, still it is held that such neglect will not discharge the indorser. Trimble v. Thorne, 16 Johns., 159; Beebe v. Bank, 7 Watts & S., 375. Judicial decisions of high authority deny that the indorser is to be regarded as a surety after his liability is fixed by due presentment, demand and notice of the dishonor of the note, and insist that when his liability is fixed by those acts of the holder, that he, the indorser, becomes a principal debtor himself, subject only to the condition that the holder shall do no act to suspend, impair or destroy his remedy over against prior parties to whom he has a right to resort for a remedy; and support to that law is certainly derived from the conceded fact that the indorser is answerable upon an independent contract, which makes it his legal duty to pay the note when duly presented and demanded and due notice is given to him of its dishonor; and also from the fact, which is also conceded, that he has not the same reason as may exist in common cases of suretyship to compel the creditor to active diligence against the maker, as he has in general the complete power, by paying the note, to reinstate himself in the possession and ownership of the same, and thus to entitle himself to a personal remedy against the maker. McLemore v. Powell, 12 Wheat., 556; 2 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 243-245; 3 Kent (12th ed.), 114.*

§ 574. The contract of an indorser stated.

Doubtless the indorser is in some respects a surety, but his principal relation to the instrument is that expressed by the commercial term applied to every party who contracts that obligation. Such a party to such an instrument contracts with the indorsee and every subsequent holder to whom the note is transferred, as follows: 1. That the instrument and antecedent signatures are genuine. 2. That he, the indorser, has a good title to the instrument. 3. That he is competent to bind himself in such a contract. 4. That the maker is competent to bind himself to the payment, and that he will, upon due presentment of the note, pay it at maturity. 5. That if, when duly presented, it is not paid by the maker, he, the indorser, will, upon due and reasonable notice being given him of the dishonor, pay the same to the indorsee or other holder. Story on Notes (5th ed.), § 135; Story on Bills, § 108; 2 Parsons on Bills and Notes, 23; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat., 341; 3 Kent (12th ed.), 88; Bateman on Commercial Law, § 319. Confirmation that the indorser is not a surety in the general sense is also derived from the fact that he stands in the attitude of the drawer of a new bill, and that he is not primarily liable to make the payment, but only in case of the default of the maker and proof of due presentment, protest, and notice of dishonor, and that even then he cannot be joined with the maker, as the surety proper may be, because the maker and indorser are liable on different contracts. 2 Parsons on Bills and Notes, 25. Suppose that is so, when the theory is tested by the rules of commercial law, still it is insisted by the defendant that the contract of the indorser in this case was made in the state where he resides, and that the indorser, by the law of that state, is discharged, for the reason that the holder of the note omitted to seek his remedy against the maker, as thereto requested by the indorser.

§ 575. A statute that says "surety" not construed to mean "indorser."

Support to that defense as exhibited in the second assignment of errors is attempted to be drawn from the statute of the state where the indorser resides, which provides in effect that a surety in any bond, bill or note may give the holder notice to sue the principal in writing, and if the holder fails to do so within thirty days the surety shall be discharged. Gould's Digest of Statutes, 1015. Founded on that statute the defendant alleges that the indorsement was made in that state, and the allegation also is that the consideration of the note was a debt due from the maker to the plaintiffs, and that it was made payable to the decedent, and was by him indorsed merely as a means of procuring his liability for the payment of the said debt due to the plaintiffs. Grant that the contract of indorsement was actually executed in that state, still it is the better opinion that the case is not governed by the statute of that state already referred to, for the reason that the statute of the state does not include the contract of an indorser. Sureties in a note who become joint promisors with the maker, it may be conceded, are within the terms of that statute, as they stand in the same relation to the principal as in a bond given for the payment of money or the delivery of property. Authority to give the described notice arises immediately after the bond, bill or note falls due, which evidently refers to the lapse of time specified in the contract; but the absolute obligation to pay does not arise in the case of an indorser before notice of dishonor, which can never be given to the indorser till after the note is presented to the maker, and he has refused or neglected to fulfil his promise to pay, so that the notice in writing requiring the holder to sue the indorser with the maker would seem to be inapplicable before the liability of the indorser is fixed by demand of payment of the maker and his refusal to comply, and notice is given to the indorser of the dishonor of the note. Evidently the statute contemplates that the cause of action will accrue against the principal and surety at the same time, which is never the case with the indorser and maker. Such a notice may unquestionably be given by a surety proper, whether his contract is expressed in a bond, bill or note, as soon as the instrument falls due; but it would be unreasonable to suppose that an indorser would give such a notice before his liability had become fixed, as it may be that such a demand to sue would operate as waiver of the right to notice of the dishonor of the note. Nor is it necessary to extend the operation of the statute so as to include an indorser, in order to satisfy the literal scope of the language employed. "Persons, bound as security for another," are the words of the statute, which undoubtedly includes sureties proper in a bond, bill or note; but it would be extending the words of the statute beyond their reasonable meaning, to hold that it includes an indorser whose liability is fixed by the required notice of the dishonor of the bill or note. Beyond all doubt the statute is one passed in derogation of the common law, even if restricted to sureties in the general sense; but it would be even more so, if, by a broad construction, it could be extended to include indorsers upon bills of exchange and negotiable promissory notes.

§ 576. Statutes in derogation of the common law construed strictly.

Statutes passed in derogation of the common law, it is everywhere held, should be construed strictly; nor is there any subject matter to which that rule should be applied with greater intensity than where the attempt is made to change by local legislation the rules of commercial law applicable to that class of commercial instruments. Remedies of a statutory character, where the right to be enforced was unknown at common law, are to be followed with strictness, both as to the methods to be pursued and the cases to which they are to be applied. Lease v. Vance, 28 Ia., 509. When a statute alters the common law the meaning shall not be strained beyond the meaning of the words, except in cases of public utility, as when the end in view appears to be more comprehensive than the enacting words. Potter's Dwarries on Statutes, 186. Where the expression is in general terms, statutes are to receive such a construction as may be agreeable to the rules of the common law in cases of that nature, for statutes are not presumed to make any alteration in the common law, beyond what is expressed in the statute. 9 Bacon's Abridgment, by Bouvier, 245; Sedgwick on Statutes, 2d ed., 267; 1 Kent, 12th ed., 461; Broom's Legal Maxims, 4th ed., 552.

Argument to show that the statute in question, if it be construed to include the indorser of a bill or note, is in derogation of the rule of the commercial law, is scarcely necessary, as it appears to be well settled that it is no part of the duty of the holder of a note which has been dishonored and due notice thereof given to the indorser, to sue the maker merely because the indorser requests him so to do. On the contrary the holder has his choice to sue any one of the parties to the note who is in default, and it is the duty of the indorser, if he desires to secure the amount against the maker, to pay the note himself and thus to entitle himself to bring a suit against that party. Story on Notes, 5th ed., § 115, a. Such a holder, says Judge Story, is perfectly at liberty to sue any or all the parties at his pleasure, and he is not bound to any diligence in seeking his reimbursement. Nor can the indorser insist that the holder should, upon his request, use any such diligence. His remedy is to pay the note and then to seek recourse against the maker or any other party liable over to him. Id., § 419; Beebe v. Banks, 7 Watts & S., 375. Such an indorser, that is, one whose liability is fixed by due notice of the maker's default, is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity as a surety, as he has the right to pay the amount of the note to the holder, and to be subrogated to all his rights as against the maker. Lenox v. Prout, 3 Wheat., 525; Trimble v. Thorne, 16 Johns., 153; Warner v. Beardsley, 8 Wend., 199; Same v. Same, 6 id., 610; Frye v. Barker, 4 Pick., 382; Hunt v. Bridgham, 2 id., 581. None of these suggestions are intended to deny the well-known rule that the maker of the note is in general the principal debtor, nor that all the other parties are in a special sense sureties for him; they, if indorsers, being liable only in case of his default unless they have waived demand and notice. Though all the other parties are sureties in respect to the maker, still they are not co-sureties, but each prior party is a principal in respect to each subsequent party. An indorser of a promissory note, though in the nature of a surety, is not for all purposes entitled to the privileges of that character, as he is answerable upon an independent contract, and it is his duty to take up the note when it is dishonored. Ellsworth v. Brewer, 11 Pick., 320. Unquestionably there is in some respects a resemblance between the indorser and a surety, but in others there is none, as he does not in any case lose his character of indorser, nor can he be made liable on the note without proof of due demand and notice. Bradford v. Corey, 5 Barb., 462. Proof of the kind, if the demand and notice are seasonable and in due form, removes every condition from his liability except that the holder will do no act to suspend, impair or destroy his right to indemnity from such other parties to the instrument as are bound to save him harmless. Woodman v. Eastman, 10 N. H., 359; Warner v. Beardsley, 8 Wend., 2d ed., 195 and note.

Negotiable promissory notes, like bills of exchange, are commercial paper in the strictest sense, and as such must ever be regarded as favored instruments, as well on account of their negotiable quality as for their universal convenience in mercantile transactions. Hence the law encourages their use as a safe and convenient medium for the settlement of balances among mercantile men, and any course of judicial decision calculated to restrain or impede their unembarrassed circulation would be contrary to the soundest principles of public policy. Mercantile law is a system of jurisprudence recognized by all commercial nations, and upon no subject is it of more importance that there should be, as far as practicable, uniformity of decision throughout the world. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 364 (§§ 420-425, supra). Apply these several suggestions to the case, and it follows that the statute, when properly construed, does not include the indorser of a negotiable promissory note whose liability has become absolute by due notice of the dishonor of the note.

WILLS v. CLAFLIN.

(2 Otto, 135-142. 1875.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois.

§ 579. Liability of assignor of note in Illinois.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DAVIS.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Clafin & Co., assignees of certain promissory notes, sued Wills, Gregg & Co., assignors of said notes, on their contract of assignment made in the state of Illinois. The inquiry is, whether a case of liability was made out on the trial, under the peculiar provisions of the statute of Illinois on the subject. This statute makes promissory notes assignable by indorsement in writing, so as to vest the legal interest in the assignee; but the liability of the assignor is not absolute, but conditional. He agrees to pay the note, if the assignee, by the exercise of due diligence, prosecutes the maker to insolvency; but if the institution of a suit against the maker would be unavailing, or if the maker, when the note falls due, is out of the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore beyond the reach of legal process, the assignor is equally as liable as if due diligence by suit had been used. Gross' Comp., 1869, p. 462.

There was no attempt to coerce payment of the makers by suit; and the assignees assume that they were excused, under the circumstances, from instituting it. The declaration avers insolvency, non-residence, and that a suit would have been unavailing. On the trial, the circuit court, against the objection of the defendants, admitted evidence that a petition in bankruptcy was filed January 20, 1870, in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin, against Kimball and Butterfield, the makers of the notes sued on; and that a judgment was rendered against them January 29, 1870. The admission of this evidence is assigned for error on the ground that there was no allegation in either count of the declaration which justified it, or the charge of the court that the adjudication in bankruptcy excused the assignees from instituting suit against the makers.

§ 580. Proof of adjudication in bankruptcy sustains allegation of insolvency of maker.

There are two averments in the second count of the declaration, as follows: First, "And the plaintiffs aver that at the time when each of said promissory notes became, by its terms, due and payable, the said Simeon Pickard, and the said Kimball, and the said Butterfield, were each and all insolvent, and unable to pay the amount of the notes by them respectively subscribed as aforesaid, or any part thereof, and hitherto from thence have continued insolvent, and unable to pay the amount of the notes by them respectively subscribed as aforesaid, or any portion thereof." Second, "And the said plaintiffs aver that the institution of a suit against the said Simeon Pickard, or against the said Kimball, or the said Butterfield, at the time the notes so by them as aforesaid respectively subscribed became due and payable, or at any time since, or now, would have been and would be wholly unavailing." It is contended that these two averments must be treated as one, and that they mean that a suit against the makers would have been unavailing by reason of their insolvency. If this were so, it would by no means follow that the record was inadmissible to sustain that issue; but, be this as it may, these averments, as we construe them, are distinct and independent of each other. The first is complete in itself, because, if the makers were insolvent, it would have been idle to bring a suit against them. But there are other things besides insolvency which might render a suit unavailing; as, for instance, want of consideration in the note, or, as in this case, an adjudication in bankruptcy.

§ 581. General averment that suit on note against maker would have been unavailing sufficient after verdict.

The second averment was not limited to any particular cause, but was general in its character, and left the pleader free to show on the trial any reason why a suit would be unavailing. It does not contain specifications enough to enable the party to defend himself (Crouch v. Hall, 15 Ill., 264), and an objection by way of demurrer would have prevailed. But the question here is, not whether it is bad on demurrer, but whether it is good after verdict. "At common law, after verdict, if the issue joined be such as necessarily to require on the trial proof of the facts defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that the judge would direct the jury to give, or the jury would have given, the verdict, such defect, imperfection or omission is cured by the verdict." 1 Chitty's Plead. (10th Am. ed.), 673, and cases cited in note. And this rule is adopted in Illinois. In Greathouse v. Robinson, 3 Scam., 8, it was held that the defendant, to avail himself of a defective averment in a declaration, must demur to it. "If he elects to plead to the declaration, and go to trial, he has no right to insist upon the exclusion of evidence because some necessary averment is omitted or defectively set forth." There was, therefore, no valid reason why the record of the adjudication of bankruptcy should have been excluded. It was not only competent but conclusive evidence in support of the allegation that a suit against the makers would have been unavailing; for the bankrupt act prevents the institution and prosecution of suits against parties in bankruptcy. The first note was due January 18, 1870, two days before the petition in bankruptcy was filed; and the first term of court held at Chicago, after the note became due, was on the first Monday of the following month. At this time the adjudication in bankruptcy was in force and a suit against the bankrupts forbidden. There was parol testimony (received without objection) to show that the debts of the petitioners were settled, and the proceedings in bankruptcy dismissed; but there was nothing to fix the time when the order of dismissal was made. The burden of doing this rested on the defendants, and so the jury were told. As this view of the case is decisive of it, it is unnecessary to notice the other assignments of error.

Judgment affirmed.

MOTT v. WRIGHT.

(Circuit Court for Indiana: 1 Bissell, 53-58. 1865.)

Opinion by McDONALD, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action of assumpsit on ten promissory notes, all dated in May, 1861. Four of them are payable six months after date, and six of them seven months after date. Their aggregate is $5,219.90. They are all dated at the city of New York, and are made payable at the Bank of North America in that city. These notes were executed by John Wright to the defendant, Williamson W. Wright, and were by him indorsed in blank. Non-assumpsit is pleaded; and the trial of this issue is, by agreement, submitted to the court without a jury. It would be tedious to detail all the testimony. The following is the substance of the evidence: The notes and their indorsements were produced in evidence. For some time before they were made, John W. Wright was largely indebted to Robert Ellis, of New York. The debt evidenced by these notes had been kept afloat by what are called "renewal notes" made to Ellis. Of these, the notes sued on are the last series. To procure them Ellis sent his agent from New York to the residence of the maker and indorser in Indiana, with the notes then blank, to get them executed and indorsed. John W. Wright being then abroad, the agent called on Williamson W. Wright, the defendant, who, at the agent's request, indorsed the notes. Thereupon the agent left the notes in this condition with D. D. Pratt, an attorney of Indiana, with the request to him that he should ask the said John W. Wright to sign them and forward them to Ellis, in New York. Pratt did so. John W. Wright thereupon signed the notes in Indiana, and forwarded them by mail to Ellis, in New York. When the notes respectively fell due a demand for payment was properly made, and notices of their non-payment were duly given, according to the law merchant.

By the law of Indiana, the indorser of such notes as these is not liable, in consequence of their non-payment and notice thereof, to pay them. Due diligence to collect them from the maker by a suit against him must generally be used in order to fix the liability of the indorser. 1 G. & H. Stats., 448; Kelsey v. Ross, 6 Blackf., 536. By the laws of New York, it is otherwise. There, such notes are governed by the rules of the law merchant; and the indorser is liable, as on an inland bill. It becomes important, therefore, to ascertain whether the indorsements in question are governed by the laws of Indiana or the laws of New York. According to the evidence, if the Indiana law prevails, the plaintiff cannot recover, because he does not appear to have exercised the diligence which that law requires. But if the law of New York is to govern in this matter, then it is plain that the finding must be for the plaintiff.

It is settled in Indiana that the indorsement of a note is a new, distinct contract, and is governed by the law of the state in which the indorsement is made, and not by the law of the place where the note was executed. Hunt v. Standart, 15 Ind., 33; Rose v. Parke Bank, 20 id., 94.

§ 584. Indorsement made in one state and delivered in another — law of latter state governs.

The only question then is, Were these indorsements executed in Indiana or New York? The execution of an indorsement — and indeed of every written contract — includes in legal contemplation two essential things: the actual writing and signing of the instrument, and the delivery of it thus written and signed. In the case at bar it is very clear that the writings on the back of the notes were made by the defendant in Indiana. But to make those writings of any validity as a contract between the parties, they must have been delivered. Upon the evidence, were these notes, thus indorsed, delivered to Ellis in Indiana or in New York? It is a well settled rule of law that “a note has no binding effect until it is delivered. So, when indorsed by the payee. . . . No matter when or where notes are signed, they are made at the time and place and by the act of delivery accompanied by acceptance.” Edwards on Bills, 187; Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 Comst., 266. The same rule must apply to the indorsement of notes, because the reason is the same. Well may we therefore say, that no matter when or where an indorsement of a note is made, in legal contemplation the indorsement is executed by the act of delivery to and the acceptance of the indorsee. In this view the discussion seems to be narrowed down to the following inquiry: Was the act of John W. Wright in inclosing the notes, filled up, signed by him and indorsed by the defendant, in a letter directed to Ellis in New York and in placing the same in an Indiana postoffice, a delivery of the notes and indorsements to Ellis, and an acceptance of them by him? In view of the evidence I cannot think that in legal contemplation it was. The notes, as indorsed, were “renewal notes.” The acceptance of them would, I think, under the circumstances proved, have operated to extinguish the old notes in the place of which they were given? When they were received by Ellis in New York he might, so far as I can see, have refused to accept them and held on to the old notes. But when they came to his hands and he determined to take them in satisfaction of the old notes, the new notes with the indorsements on them were, I think, then and there, in legal contemplation, delivered and accepted. And I am inclined to the opinion that neither the notes nor the indorsements on them had any legal existence till that moment. It has been suggested by counsel for the defendant that if these notes had been lost on their way to New York, the plaintiff might have sued on them as lost instruments. But this, I rather think, is begging the question. He might have sued on them, under such circumstances, if there had previously been a legal, valid delivery and acceptance of them; otherwise not.

From the evidence I conclude that the arrangement between Ellis and John W. Wright was substantially this: that if the latter would send to the former certain notes well indorsed, he would receive them in lieu of the notes he then held of John W. Wright; and that till he did so receive them the arrangement was not consummated. Moreover, till Ellis had actually received these notes, he could not have negotiated them as he did to the plaintiff. The notes, as we have seen, were indorsed in blank, and were negotiated to the plaintiff by actual delivery. Indeed, they could not have been transferred to him in any other manner. Besides, it may well be asked whether, if these notes had been lost on their way to New York, Ellis would have been bound to deliver up the old notes as satisfied by the receipt of the new. I think that, in such a case, he might have maintained an action on the old notes. It should seem unreasonable to hold that the old notes were extinguished before the new were actually received and accepted. The case of Cook v. Litchfield, 9 N. Y., 279, appears fully to sustain the foregoing view. That case was much like the present. In both, the defendants were accommodation indorsers, and indorsed, out of the state of New York, notes payable in it. In the case referred to, the court say, "the defendant indorsed the notes for the accommodation of the maker. This appears from the fact that the notes came from the possession of the maker and not of the indorser, and were first negotiated in New York, and apparently for the benefit of Carew, the maker. So long as they remained in Carew's hands, there was no liability on the part of the indorser. The indorser's contract, therefore, must be regarded as having been made in New York, where the notes were delivered to Ryckman [the first indorsee] and the indorsement first became effective. The law of Michigan [where the indorsement was made] has no application to the case. The contract having been made in New York, the law of New York governs the case with respect to the sufficiency of the notice." With some doubt as to the justness of the views above expressed, I am inclined to think that, on the evidence, the law is with the plaintiff. Finding for the plaintiff accordingly. •

CAMDEN v. DOREMUS.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Missouri.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The agreement referred to by the court was to the effect following: That the Camdens had sold and assigned to Doremus, Suydams & Nixon, a note for $4,219.90, negotiable and payable at the Commercial Bank of Columbus, Miss.; that the note was executed by Calhoun to Barrett, and indorsed by Barrett and Tarpley and the Camdens; that Doremus, Suydams & Nixon were to send the note to the Commercial Bank for collection, and if it was not paid they should use due diligence to collect it of the drawer and indorsers before calling upon the Camdens; and if it could not be made out of the drawer and indorsers, the Camdens, on being so informed, would pay it, principal, interest and costs. Signed by the Camdens, and by Doremus, Suydams & Nixon.

§ 585. Objections must be specific.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DANIEL.

No question has been raised on this record in reference to the original character of the instrument on which the action was founded as a negotiable and commercial paper, nor in reference to the duties and obligations of the parties.

arising purely from their positions as parties to such a paper. And for aught that the record discloses, every requirement of the law merchant, with respect to the note, or with respect to the rights of the indorsers thereof, appears to have been fulfilled. Presentment at maturity and within due time was made at the Bank of Columbus, Mississippi, and payment there demanded; the failure to make payment was followed by regular protest, and by like notice to all the indorsers. The exceptions specifically urged by the defendant in the court below, and pressed in his behalf before this court, grow out of an agreement signed by the firm of the Camdens and by the defendants in error at the time that the note of Calhoun was indorsed by the former to the latter, and which agreement, it is contended, bound the defendants in error to undertakings and acts beyond the usual duties incumbent upon indorsers and holders of negotiable paper, and without the fulfilment of which no right of recovery against the plaintiffs in error could arise. Before entering upon an examination of this agreement and of the questions which it has given rise to, it is proper to dispose of an objection by the defendant in the court below, which seems to have been aimed at the entire testimony adduced by the plaintiffs, but whether at its competency or relevancy, or at its regularity merely, that objection nowhere discloses. After each deposition offered in evidence by the plaintiffs to the jury, it is stated that to the reading of such deposition the defendant, by his counsel, objected, and that his objection was overruled. A similar statement is made with regard to the record of the suit instituted in the court of Hinds county against Calhoun, the maker of the note, and offered in this cause as proof of due diligence. With regard to the manner and the import of this objection, we would remark that they were of a kind that should not have been tolerated in the court below pending the trial of the issue before the jury. Upon the offer of testimony, oral or written, extended and complicated as it may often prove, it could not be expected, upon the mere suggestion of an exception which did not obviously cover the competency of the evidence, nor point to some definite or specific defect in its character, that the court should explore the entire mass for the ascertainment of defects which the objector himself either would not or could not point to their view. It would be more extraordinary still if, under the mask of such an objection, or mere hint at objection, a party should be permitted in an appellate court to spring upon his adversary defects which it did not appear he ever relied on, and which, if they had been openly and specifically alleged, might have been easily cured. 'Tis impossible that this court can determine, or do more than conjecture, as the objection is stated on this record, whether it applied to form or substance, or how far, in the view of it presented to the court below, if any particular view was so presented, the court may have been warranted in overruling it. We must consider objections of this character as vague and nugatory, and, if entitled to weight anywhere, certainly as without weight before an appellate court.

Recurring to the agreement signed by the parties at the time of the transfer of the note, and to the instructions given and refused at the trial, with respect both to that agreement and the proceedings had in fulfilment thereof, we will remark, as to the agreement itself, it is clear that it bound the indorsees to conditions beyond those which are implied in the ordinary transfer and receipt of commercial instruments. Their obligations, therefore, to these indorsers, could by no means be fulfilled by a compliance with such usual conditions. The language of the agreement is explicit. The said Doremus, Suydams & Nixon were to send the note passed to them to the Commercial Bank of Columbus, Mississippi, for collection, and in the event of its not being paid at maturity, they were to use reasonable and due diligence to collect it of the drawer and two previous indorsers before they were to call upon the said Camdens, etc., etc. The obligation of the plaintiffs, as indorsees and holders, would have been fulfilled by regular demand, protest, and notice; from these a right of action would immediately have accrued. But the condition stipulated in the agreement is, that before they can have any right to make demand upon their indorsers, they shall diligently endeavor to collect of the maker and previous indorsers. With the view of showing a failure in the plaintiffs in fulfilling their contract, and of deducing therefrom their own exemption from responsibility, the defendants first offered a witness to prove a difference in the practice prevailing in eastern and western banks with respect to the management of paper deposited with them for collection; and inquired of the witness whether a note presented at a bank for payment on the last day of grace by a notary public, would be considered as having been sent to the bank for collection, within the meaning of the contract. This question, on motion of the plaintiffs' counsel, the court refused to allow, and rejected all testimony by the witness in relation to the practice of banks as to notes deposited for collection, unless the witness could testify as to the practice or usage of the Commercial Bank of Columbus. The ruling of the court on this point we think was proper. The note was made payable at the Commercial Bank of Columbus; by the agreement between the parties, it was moreover expressly stipulated that it should be sent to that bank for collection; if, then, any custom or practice other than general commercial usage were to control the management of the note, it was the usage of the Bank of Columbus, certainly not the particular usage of other banks not mentioned in the contract, and perhaps never within the contemplation of the parties to that contract. The next exception is taken upon an instruction asked of the court to the jury, that, unless it was proved to their satisfaction that the note was sent to the Bank of Columbus for collection by the plaintiffs, they must find for the defendant. The court responded affirmatively to the proposition that the note should have been sent to the Bank of Columbus for collection, but declared its opinion that by presentment and demand of payment of the note at maturity by the plaintiffs at the said bank, within banking hours, so as to make a legal demand on the makers, the requirement of the contract in this particular would be complied with. A nice distinction might be made between the language of the agreement and that of the instruction given upon this point. The distinction, however, we should deem to be more apparent and verbal than substantial, and not to be applicable either to the intention of the parties, or to the real merits of the case. The note was payable at the Commercial Bank of Mississippi. The maker of the note resided in the county in which the bank was situated; the indorsers, Barrett and Tarpley, who were to be looked to for payment before proceeding against the Camdens, were also residents of the state of Mississippi. Every party upon the note must be presumed to have been cognizant of its character, and to have known when and where it was payable, and was bound to prepare for his respective responsibility arising from his undertaking. Other notice than that to which the law entitled him from his peculiar position upon the note, he had no right to claim. It would be going too far, then, to imply any other right, or to admit it upon ground less strong than that of express and unequivocal contract. The language of the agreement we hold not to amount to this, and as being satisfied with the interpretation that the note should be regularly presented and payment thereof demanded at the Commercial Bank of Columbus, simply as one of the means of collection to be adopted before recourse should be had to the last indorsers.

But it has been contended that, had the note been placed under the management of the bank itself, notice might have been given by the bank to the maker and prior indorsers, before the maturity of the note, and that thereby provision might have been made to meet it when due. In reply to this argument, it may be said that the agreement itself expresses no such purpose or object, in requiring the note to be sent to the bank, and we do not think that such an object is necessarily implied in the requisition. In the next place, there is no proof that the bank would have given notice to the maker and indorsers, previously to the maturity of the note; nor is there anything in the record to show that this would have been in accordance with its practice in similar cases. Under the silence of the contract itself, and in the absence of proof dehors the agreement, we are not at liberty to set up a presumption, which neither the language of the agreement nor justice to the parties imperatively calls for.

The defendants also excepted to the opinion of the court given upon a prayer to instruct the jury that the record of the suit by the plaintiffs, against the maker and prior indorsers of the note, did not show due diligence as to those parties. This instruction the court refused, but, in lieu thereof, instructed the jury that the record was proper evidence to show due diligence on the part of the plaintiff, and that if they believed, from the evidence submitted in addition to the record, that the indorsers, Barrett and Tarpley, had left the state of Mississippi, were insolvent, and had left no property in the state at the time of the judgment in the said record, the plaintiffs were not bound to send executions to the counties in which those indorsers respectively resided at the time when the suit was instituted against them. This court can conceive no just foundation for this exception to the ruling of the circuit court. The condition to which the plaintiff was pledged was the practice of due, that is, proper, just, reasonable diligence; not to the performance of acts which were obviously useless, and from which expense and injury might arise, but from which advantage certainly could not. The diligent and honest prosecution of a suit to judgment, with a return of nulla bona, has always been regarded as one of the extreme tests of due diligence. This phrase, and the obligation it imports, may be satisfied, however, by other means. The ascertainment, upon correct and sufficient proofs, of entire or notorious insolvency, is recognized by the law as answering the demand of due diligence, and as dispensing, under such circumstances, with the more dilatory evidence of a suit, evidence which, in instances that it may be easy to imagine, might prove prejudicial alike to him who should exact, and to him who would supply it. Dulany v. Hodgkin, 5 Cranch, 333; Violett v. Patton, id., 142 (§§ 553-555, supra); Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, id., 49. We hold, therefore, that, both as to the instruction refused and as to that which was given upon this prayer, the decision of the circuit court was correct.

We come now to the last exception taken to the opinion of the circuit court upon the points presented to it. The defendant in that court insisted that, by the law of Mississippi, the plaintiffs were entitled to a recovery of the full amount of the note, against the maker and indorsers, subject to no set-off between the maker and indorsers; and that, if the plaintiffs had, by their neglect, permitted a judgment for a smaller amount, the defendant was discharged from all accountability for the sum thus lost. The court refused so to lay down the law, because the record from the court in Mississippi furnished the only evidence to which the instruction prayed for referred, and no negligence appeared from the record in the prosecution of the suit against the defendants thereto. This refusal of the court was clearly right, and the reason assigned for it is quite satisfactory. The question to which the instruction asked was designed to apply was that of due diligence. The timely and bona fide prosecution of a suit is, perhaps, the highest evidence of due diligence. If, in the conduct of that suit, the party should be impeded or wronged by an erroneous decision of the tribunal having cognizance of his case, that wrong could on no just principle be imputed to him as a fault. It certainly does not tend to show him to have been the less diligent in the pursuit of his claim; and least of all should he be prejudiced thereby, when the error insisted on has been induced by the person who seeks to avail himself of its existence.

Upon the whole, we consider the rulings of the circuit court upon the several points before it to be correct. The judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. HATCH.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a writ of error to the circuit court of Ohio. The Bank of the United States, as holders, brought an action upon a bill of exchange jointly against Elijah Pearson, as drawer, and against William S. Hatch, as indorser, under a statute of Ohio authorizing such a proceeding. The marshal having returned the writ “not found” as to Hatch, the bank proceeded to take judgment against Pearson alone. The present suit is a scire facias against Hatch to make him a party to the same judgment, so that execution may also issue against him, according to the provisions of the same statute. The declaration and bill of exchange in the original proceedings have not been, as they ought to have been, sent up in the record, as they constitute a part of it; and for this imperfection a certiorari ought to have been awarded if anything material in it were now controverted by the parties. It appears from some exhibits in the proceedings that the bill of exchange was dated at Cincinnati on the 23d of May, 1820, and was as follows: “Sixty days after date hereof pay to the order of William S. Hatch, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Cincinnati, $6,600, which charge to the account of yours respectfully, E. Pearson.” Addressed, “Mr. Thomas Graham, Cincinnati, Ohio.” It was indorsed by Hatch and accepted by Graham. Hatch pleaded the general issue non-assumpsit; and at the trial the jury found a special verdict as follows:

“And afterwards, to wit, at the December term of said court, in the year last aforesaid, came the parties by their said attorneys; and thereupon, for trying the issue joined, came a jury, to wit: William B. Van Hook, David Todd, John Larwell, Randall Stiver, Isaac N. Norton, A. R. Chase, Truman Beecher, J. R. Geddings, William Rayne, William A. Needham, Ira Paige and William A. Johnson, who, being impaneled, elected, tried, sworn and affirmed to try the issue between the parties, upon their oath do say that E. Pearson made the bill of exchange, a copy of which is attached to the declaration of the said plaintiffs in the original suit against said Pearson, the drawer of said bill, and that the said bill was regularly indorsed by the present defendant, Hatch. They also find that on the 25th day of July, in the year 1820, said bill of exchange was duly protested for non-payment, and that, on said day last mentioned, and on the succeeding day, the said defendant Hatch was boarding at the house of Henry Bainbridge, in the city of Cincinnati; that on the 26th day of July, in the year 1820, the notary public by whom said bill was protested called at the house of said Bainbridge and inquired for said Hatch, and was informed by a Mr. Young that said Hatch was not within; the said notary then left a written notice of said protest with said Young, who was at that time in the house aforesaid, and requested him to deliver said notice to said Hatch, and that, in the summer of the said year 1820, said Young was a boarder at said house. They also find that a suit was commenced against said Pearson, the drawer of said bill of exchange, which suit stood for trial at the September term in the year 1822, of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Ohio. They also find that, previous to the year 1822, one Griffin Yeatman was confined on the jail limits of Hamilton county, in said state, on a ca. sa., issued at the instance of, and on a judgment in favor of, said Pearson. That said Yeatman was a material witness for the plaintiff in a number of suits then pending in said court; that one George W. Jones, who was the then agent for plaintiffs, and one William M. Worthington, the then attorney for the plaintiffs, agreed with the said Pearson that, in consideration he, the said Pearson, would permit the said Yeatman to leave the said jail limits and attend said court during the term aforesaid, then the suit then pending in said court against said Pearson on said bill of exchange should be continued without judgment until the term of said court next ensuing said September term, A. D. 1822. That, in pursuance of this agreement, the said Pearson permitted the said Yeatman to leave said jail limits and attend said court, and that said suit against said Pearson was continued, agreeably to said agreement. Now, therefore, if upon this finding the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, then the jury find for the plaintiff to recover of the defendant the amount of said bill, together with the interest thereon; but if the court shall be of opinion, upon the said finding, that the defendant is entitled to a judgment, then, and in that case, the jury find for the defendant."

Upon this special verdict the court below gave judgment for the defendant. Two questions, arising out of the special verdict, have been argued at the bar: First, whether the notice to Hatch of the dishonor of the bill was sufficient. Secondly, if it was, whether the agreement between the bank and Pearson was a discharge of the indorser.

Upon the first point we are of opinion that the notice was sufficient. In cases of this nature the law does not require the highest and strictest degree of diligence in giving notice, but such a degree of reasonable diligence as will ordinarily bring home notice to the party. It is a rule founded upon public convenience and the general course of business; and only requires that, in common intendment and presumption, the notice is by such means as will be effectual. In the present case the notice was left at a private boarding house where Hatch lodged, which must be considered, to all intents and purposes, his dwelling-house. It was left, then, at the proper place, and if the delivery had been to the master of the house or to a servant of the house, there could be no doubt that it would have been sufficient. Stedman v. Gooch, 1 Esp., 3. The notary called at the house, and, upon inquiry of a fellow-boarder and inmate of the house, he was informed that Hatch was not within. He then left the notice with the fellow-boarder, requesting him to deliver it to Hatch. The latter must necessarily be understood, by receiving the notice under such circumstances, impliedly to engage to make the delivery. The question, then, is, whether such a notice, so delivered, does not afford as reasonable a presumption of its being received as if delivered to a tenant of the house. This is not like the case of a public inn, and a delivery to a mere stranger who happens to be there in transitu, and cannot be presumed to have any knowledge or intercourse with the party. Boarders at the same house may be presumed to meet daily, and to feel some interest in the concerns of each other, and to perform punctually such common duties of civility as this. In our large cities, many persons engaged in business live at boarding-houses in this manner. It is not always easy to obtain access to the master of the house, or to servants who may be safely intrusted with the delivery of notices of this sort. A person who resides in the house, upon a footing of equality with all the guests, may well be supposed to feel a deeper interest in such matters than a mere servant, whose occupations are pressing and various, and whose pursuits do not lead him to place so high a value upon a scrupulous discharge of duty. We think that a stricter rule would be found inconvenient, and tend to subvert rather than to subserve the purposes of justice. No case exactly in point has been cited at the bar. That of Stedman v. Gooch, 1 Esp., 3, approaches near to it; but there the notice was left with the woman who kept the house at which the party was a lodger. No stress, however, seems to have been laid upon this circumstance, to distinguish it from the case of a delivery to any other inmate of the house, either servant or fellow-boarder.

The other question is one of more nicety and not less important. It appears from the special verdict that the contract with Pearson, for the continuance of the suit on this very bill, without judgment, until the next term of the circuit court, was for a valuable consideration, and not a mere voluntary and discretionary exercise of authority on the part of the agents of the bank. What, then, is to be deemed the true construction of it? Did it amount to no more than an agreement that that particular suit should stand continued, leaving the bank at full liberty to discontinue that on the morrow, at their discretion, and to commence a new suit and new proceedings for the same debt? Or was it intended by the parties to suspend the enforcement of any remedy for the debt for the stipulated period, and rely solely on that suit for a recovery? We are of opinion that the intention of the parties, apparent on the contract, was to suspend the right to recover the debt until the next term of the court. It is scarcely possible that Pearson should have been willing to give a valuable consideration for the delay of a term, and yet have intentionally left avenues open to be harassed by a new suit in the interval. Indeed, no other remedy, except in that particular suit, seems to have been within the contemplation of either party. If the bank had engaged, for a like consideration, not to sue Pearson on the bill for the same period, there could have been no doubt that it would be a contract suspending all remedy. What substantial difference is there between such a contract and a contract to suspend a suit already commenced, which is the only apparent remedy for the recovery of the bill during the same period? Is it not the natural, nay, necessary intendment, that the defendant shall have the full benefit of the whole period as a delay of payment of the debt? It is no answer that a new suit would be attended with more delay. That might or might not be the case, according to the different course of practice in different states; and, at all events, it would harass the party with new expenses of litigation. But the true inquiry is, whether the parties did or did not intend a surceasing of all legal proceedings during the period. We think that the just and natural exposition of the contract is, that they did.

§ 591. Discharge of indorser after his liability is fixed.

If this, then, be the correct exposition of the contract, the case clearly falls within the principle laid down by this court in M'LeMORE v. Powell, 12 Wheat., 554. That was the case of a voluntary agreement, without consideration, by the holder with the drawer of the bill, for delay, after the parties had been fixed by due notice of the dishonor of the bill. The court held that the agreement was not binding in point of law, and, therefore, it did not exonerate the indorser. On that occasion, the court said: "We admit the doctrine that, although the indorser has received due notice of the dishonor of the bill, yet, if the holder afterwards enters into any new agreement with the drawer for delay, in any manner changing the nature of the original contract, or affecting the rights of the indorser, or to the prejudice of the latter, it will discharge him. But, in order to produce such a result, the agreement must be one binding in law upon the parties, and have a sufficient consideration to support it," etc. "If the holder enters into a valid contract for delay, he thereby suspends his own remedy on the bill for the stipulated period; and if the indorser were to pay the bill, he could only be subrogated to the rights of the holder, and the drawer could or might have the same equities against him as against the holder himself. If, therefore, such a contract be entered into without his assent, it is to his prejudice, and discharges him." The same reasoning applies with full force to the present case. If the bank could not have any remedy on the bill to recover payments, but was bound to wait until the next term of the circuit court, the defendant Hatch, as indorser, could not, by paying the bill, place himself in a better situation. He would be liable to the same equities, under the agreement suspending the remedy, as the bank. The same principles which this court adopted in the case of M'LeMORE v. Powell, 12 Wheat., 554, will be found illustrated and confirmed in an able opinion of Mr. Chancellor Kent in King v. Baldwin, 2 Johns. Ch., 554, and applied to a case between principal and surety. There are other authorities to the same effect: Gould v. Robson, 8 East, 576; Laxton v. Peat, 2 Camp., 185; Hubbly v. Brown, 16 Johns., 70; Bayley on Bills, 234. There is a recent case in England which approaches very near to the circumstances of the present case. We allude to Lee v. Levi, 1 Carr. & P., 553. In that case the holder, after suit brought against the acceptor and the indorser, had taken a cognovit of the acceptor, for the amount of the bill, payable by instalments; and, at the trial of the suit against the indorser, Lord Chief Justice Abbott thought that this was a giving time which discharged the indorser, and the jury found a verdict accordingly. That case afterwards came before the whole court for revision (6 Dowl. & Ry., 475), and was then decided upon a mere collateral point, viz.: That the defense having arisen after suit brought against the indorser, should have been taken advantage of by special plea, and could not be given in evidence under the general issue; so that the ruling of the lord chief justice was not brought directly into judgment. It was not, however, in any measure overruled.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion, upon the ground of the agreement stated in the special verdict being a virtual discharge of the indorser, that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be affirmed, with costs.

IN RE GOODWIN.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 5 Dillon, 140-144. 1879.)

Opinion by TREAT, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A motion was made by the assignee to expunge the claim of the bank. Issues have been framed, and the cause heard. Goodwin, Behr & Co. were the makers, and Hoeber the indorser of a note for $6,000, which the bank discounted. Before the same became due, the bank knew that the makers were such solely for the accommodation of the indorser. The bank then discounted a note of said indorser at ninety days for $5,000, passed the proceeds of the discount to his private account which he kept with said bank, and he gave his check for $6,000, which was charged against said private account. As the indorser's note for $5,000 was not secured by an indorser thereon, the bank retained the original note for $6,000, and seek to have the same allowed against Goodwin, Behr & Co.'s estate in bankruptcy. There are two propositions, either of which is fatal to the claim: 1st. Hoeber, the indorser, paid the note by his check for the $6,000, which extinguished the bank's demand thereon. 2d. If that be not so, the bank, knowing that Hoeber was primarily liable (Goodwin, Behr & Co. being mere accommodation makers), received payment of at least $1,000 thereon from Hoeber, and extended to him the time of payment for the balance for ninety days without the assent of the accommodation makers.

§ 592. One known to be in fact an accommodation maker must be treated as such, and will be released by extension to principal.

The legal rule in such cases is that if the holder of the note is informed that the maker is only nominally such, but actually an accommodation maker for the indorser, he must deal with the paper and the parties with reference to their true relationships to the obligation. The makers were sureties, and an extension of time to Hoeber, the actual principal, without the assent of the surety, was a discharge of the surety if the bank precluded itself from enforcing at once the original obligation. It is true that matters have been called to the attention of the court which show peculiar equities as between Goodwin, Behr & Co. and Hoeber, but the bank does not represent said equities. The authorities are not seemingly in accord. If, however, the bank is held, by information given subsequent to the discount of the $6,000 note, to be dealing with the transaction as if Hoeber were the maker, and Goodwin, Behr & Co. the indorsers, then the receipt of part payment from Hoeber, and an extension of time to him for a consideration as to the balance due, discharged the sureties. The English courts, while insisting on the strict rule as to the extension of time to the principal without assent of the surety, criticise the reasons given in some cases in support of the rule. May it not be that the true reason is found in the maxim, "in hac foedera non veni" (I have not entered into this agreement)? A surety enters into an obligation, the elements of which are time, etc. If the obligation is to be prolonged beyond the prescribed time, whereby there can be no legal remedy in his behalf until the end of the new period, is there not virtually an effort to hold him bound to a changed or new contract as to time, when the financial and other conditions of the parties may have undergone an entire change in the interval? The conclusion is that the bank is not entitled to prove the $6,000 note, or any part thereof, against the estate of Goodwin, Behr & Co., and judgment will be entered accordingly.

§ 593. Accommodation maker regarded as principal debtor in English courts of law.

Opinion by DILLON, J.

In England an accommodation maker is, in courts of law, regarded as the principal debtor, although the creditor or holder knew, at the time of making the note, that it was given by the maker to the payee without consideration (Byles on Bills [4th ed.], 191, where the cases are cited; 1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 325, and notes; 3 Kent, 104; Story on Bills, secs. 291, 368, 432, 434); and therefore the extension of time by the holder to the acceptor without the consent of the payee and indorser will not discharge the acceptor,—nothing will discharge the maker but payment or release. The leading case is Fentum v. Pocock, 5 Taunt., 192, 1 Marsh., 14, which has been frequently approved in England and in this country. The cases are referred to by Mr. Parsons (1 Notes and Bills, 325), and in White & Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity (vol. 2, 4th Am. ed., p. 1917). There is no decision of the exact point by the supreme court of the United States. The nearest approach to it is in Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 10 Pet., 257; Lenox v. Prout, 3 Wheat., 520, and Creath v. Sims, 5 How., 192, 206. The American cases rest on the authority of the English cases,—particularly Fentum v. Pocock, and those which follow it.

§ 594. — but not in English courts of equity.

But in equity it is otherwise, and the real relation of the parties to the note, bill or bond determines their rights in all cases where the holder has knowledge of that relation. And it has recently been expressly decided by the queen's bench, the court of chancery, and by the house of lords, that the rule of law that if the creditor contracts with the principal debtor to give him time, the surety is discharged, applies to bills of exchange and promissory notes; and that it makes no difference, in the application of the rule, that at the time of contracting the debt the surety was believed by the creditor to be the principal debtor. Overend, Guernsey & Co. v. Oriental Financial Corporation, Law Rep., 7 Ch., 142, A. D. 1871 (S. C., Law Jour., N. S., vol. 41, Eq., 332), affirmed in the House of Lords, Law Rep., 7 H. L., 348, 1874; Ervin v. Lancaster, 118 Eng. C. L. (6 Best & S.), 571; Bailey v. Edwards, 116 id. (4 Best & S.), 761; Pooley v. Harradine, 90 id. (7 El. & Bl.), 431; Taylor v. Burgess, 5 Hurl. & N., 1; Greenough v. McClelland, 105 Eng. C. L. (2 El. & El.), 424.

595. Rule that where creditor contracts with principal debtor to give him time surety is discharged applies to notes. Accommodation acceptors or makers are held as sureties.

The facts in the English case first cited are, in all essential respects, similar to the case now under consideration, and the principle involved is precisely identical. The accommodation acceptors were held to be sureties as against a holder who did not know that they were accommodation acceptors at the time he discounted the bills, but who, after knowledge of that fact, gave time by a valid contract, to the party who was in fact the principal debtor, without the knowledge or consent of the accommodation acceptors; and the holder's action at law against the acceptors was restrained. I will not enter upon a lengthened discussion of the subject. These cases settle the law of England, and overrule the cases on which the American decisions to the contrary rest. I am inclined to think the doctrine of the court of chancery and of the house of lords rests upon sound principles, and that a creditor who actually knows that a given party is a surety on the contract ought not to be permitted to change that contract, or vary the surety's rights by a new contract, without his consent — unless, indeed, the surety has, by express stipulation, as in Sprigg v. Bank, supra, declared in the contract that he is a principal, and thereby estopped himself to plead and show that he was such, and entitled to the privileges and rights of a surety. I affirm the decision of the district court on the strength of the recent English cases referred to, and regret that the case is such that my judgment cannot be reviewed by the supreme court.

Affirmed.

FINDLAY v. BANK OF UNITED STATES.

(Circuit Court for Ohio: 2 McLean, 44-59. 1839.)

Opinion of the Court.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This bill was filed by the complainants to procure certain credits on certain judgments obtained by the Bank of the United States, against Findlay, in his life-time, as the surety of Sutherland. Findlay, and one Thomas Irwin, who some years ago deceased, indorsed three several notes to the Bank of the United States, for Sutherland, on which judgments were entered the 13th July, 1824, for $5,619.71; the 7th June, 1825, for $5,330.13; the 23d July, 1828, for $5,508.75. To secure the payment of these notes a mortgage to the bank was executed by Sutherland, the 25th September, 1829; and at December term, 1828, a decree was entered for $20,623.32, and a sale of the mortgage premises ordered. Another mortgage, bearing the same date, was executed by Sutherland to the bank, to secure the payment of four several notes — two of which were indorsed by Joseph Hough. On the two unindorsed notes judgment was entered the 15th July, 1824, for $2,726.25, and the 23d July, 1827, on one of the other notes for $4,841.36. On the other note, for $4,346, due 25th August, 1827, no judgment was obtained. A scire facias was issued on this mortgage, and a judgment obtained for $16,011, at July term, 1828. The judgment for $5,619.71, against Findlay, Sutherland and Irwin, and that for $2,726.25, against Sutherland only, were levied 10th November, 1824, on certain real property.

On the 5th November, 1821, John Busenbach obtained a judgment in the court of common pleas, for Butler county, against Sutherland, which was levied 27th October, 1826, on a part of the property covered by the prior levy. The above judgments against Findlay were also levied on his property the 16th June, 1827. In the spring of 1829, Findlay and Sutherland frequently solicited the bank to take the property mortgaged and levied upon at certain prices stated; and afterwards, the 29th June, 1829, an agreement, in writing, was made between the bank and Sutherland, by which the latter agreed to convey to the bank the property levied upon, and also that covered by the mortgages, for the sum of $25,794. This sum was produced, probably, by adding to the prices originally talked of, $1,000 upon a lot in Cincinnati, and deducting from the same $1,260, the balance due on the Busenbach judgment. In addition to the above sum, the bank agreed to pay Mrs. Sutherland $3,000 for her right of dower; and it was agreed that the proceeds of the land covered by the mortgage, to secure the payment of the two unindorsed notes of Sutherland, and the two notes indorsed by Hough should be first applied in payment of Hough's liability; and that the residue of such liability should be discharged out of the proceeds of the property conveyed, exclusive of that which was mortgaged to secure the payment of the notes indorsed by Findlay; and it was stipulated that the property should be offered by the marshal at public sale. Sutherland executed the conveyances in pursuance of the agreement; and the property was publicly sold by the marshal, and credited by him on the several executions and order of sale under which it was sold. The proceeds of the mortgaged property were applied in discharge of the liabilities which the mortgages were intended to secure; and the proceeds of the levied property were apportioned between the judgment against Sutherland and Hough, and the two against Sutherland only. The bank purchased the property at the marshal's sale for less than the contract price. For the property levied on, the bank agreed to give the sum of $5,939, and this property was struck off by the marshal at the sum of $5,206.53. On the 10th September, 1830, the bank conveyed the lot in Cincinnati (conveyed to it under the contract with Sutherland for $10,000) to D. Griffen for the consideration, as named in the deed, of $19,000. These are the principal facts out of which this controversy has arisen.

Before the merits of the case are considered, it may be proper to notice an objection which arises to the jurisdiction of the court from the parties to the suit. The complainants are citizens of Ohio, and Timothy Kirby, alleged to be the agent of the bank, and Samuel Gray, administrator of Sutherland, and Thomas D. Carneal and Lewis Whiteman, administrators of Irwin, whose citizenship is not alleged, are made defendants. To give jurisdiction to the court, it is as necessary to allege the citizenship of the defendants as of the complainants. This is in the nature of an original bill, and calls for the exercise of chancery powers; and if the defendants named are citizens of Ohio, it is clear the court cannot, as the parties now stand, take jurisdiction of the case. It is true the whole object of the bill is to have certain credits entered on judgments of this court; but the right of the complainants depends on the construction of an instrument dated long after the judgments, and of certain equitable liens, as between the sureties of Sutherland. This objection may be obviated by discontinuing the bill as to Kirby, who is not a necessary party; by making the administrators of Irwin co-complainants, and by discontinuing the bill as to the administrators of Sutherland. If the estate of Sutherland cannot be affected by a decree in this case, as it most clearly cannot be, his administrators are not indispensable parties in the case. In addition to this, the proof in the case shows that Sutherland died insolvent. With this intimation, which may be a matter for future consideration, the questions made in the argument will be examined.

The complainants insist that they are entitled to a credit on the judgments against Sutherland and Findlay for the fair value of the Cincinnati lot, or the sum for which it was sold by the bank, deducting therefrom a reasonable amount on account of dower. At the time Sutherland conveyed this lot to the bank, the title was, to some extent, embarrassed; and there is no proof that the sum at which it was estimated was less than its value. There is no allegation of fraud in the conveyance of the lot to the bank for the price agreed; and if such an allegation were made, it would not be supported by the fact that some fifteen months afterwards the lot was sold by the bank at an advance of $8,000. Within this time an outstanding claim was bought in by the bank, the right of dower was paid for, and the property may have risen in value.

§ 597. Fraudulent conveyance as against surety.

A debtor has an undoubted right fairly to convey his property in satisfaction of a debt, without the assent of his surety. If such conveyance be made fraudulently, with the view of injuring the surety, it should be set aside. But if the parties act in good faith, and the transaction is characterized by fairness and propriety, though without the knowledge of the surety, he has no ground to complain, much less to set aside the conveyance. But in this case there is satisfactory evidence that Findlay, admitting him to be the surety of Sutherland, was desirous that the lot should be conveyed to the bank for a sum less than that which was agreed to be paid for it. The conveyance of this lot, and the other property, was made by Sutherland under the agreement which fixed the price at which the whole property was taken by the bank; and if this agreement, in so material a part as this, shall be set aside, how can any part of it be enforced? And if the agreement does not stand, the sales by the marshal, being public and in pursuance of legal process, must stand. This would reduce the gross sum for the property much below the price allowed in the agreement. In no point of view, as it regards the price of the property conveyed, is there any ground on which to set aside this agreement. There is neither hardness, unfairness, fraud nor want of assent of the surety on which to give relief.

The counsel for the bank insist that the evidence in the case does not show that Findlay was the indorser on the notes, without any interest in them, for the benefit of Sutherland. The notes were indorsed by Findlay and Irwin, and were discounted for the benefit of Sutherland. He is treated as the principal by the bank, in the negotiations respecting the property, in giving the mortgages, and, finally, in the conveyance of the property to the bank. In the agreement between Sutherland and the bank, respecting the property to be conveyed, the judgments are referred to as "against Sutherland and others as his securities." It is true that the judgments are not in form entered against the indorsers as sureties, but this does not lessen the force, and, indeed, the conclusiveness, of the facts admitted. The parties to the agreement evidently looked more to the facts, with which they were familiar, than the technical description of the judgments. But, independently of this admission, there is enough in the facts of the case to show that Findlay was surety. If Sutherland were not principal, why did he give the mortgages to secure the payment of all the notes? Why did he negotiate with the bank to take property in payment of them? And why did he, finally, convey all his property to the bank? No doubt is entertained of the suretyship of all the indorsers on the notes specified.

The relationship of principal and surety being established between Sutherland and Findlay, if this relationship continue, under the circumstances of this case, it may be proper to inquire whether the complainants would be entitled to the priority of the judgment against Sutherland and Findlay first levied, of which they have been deprived to some extent under the agreement. The proceeds of the property, bound by this lien, were applied to pay the judgment and note for which Hough was liable. This great head of equity is derived from the civil law, and is founded upon the immutable principles of justice and benevolence. It protects the rights of sureties as between themselves, compelling a just contribution from each; and as against their principal, by subrogating them, on the payment of the debt, to all his rights. And it will, under certain circumstances, interpose its powers, and prevent the principal from impairing or destroying the collateral indemnities which he holds from his debtor; or, if destroyed, will, to the same amount, relieve the sureties. And this does not embrace securities taken at the time the debt was created only; for where the principal in a bond, having been sued, gave bail, against whom judgment was entered, the original sureties having paid the debt, obtained a decree for the assignment of this judgment. Parsons v. Braddock, 2 Vern., 608; Wright v. Morley, 11 Ves. Jr., 22; 3 Bligh., 590, 591; 6 Ves., 805; 1 Story's Eq., 477; 1 Ves., 339; 2 Ves., 569, 570; 2 Johns. Ch., 560; 4 Johns. Ch., 323.

But the great question in this case is, whether, after judgment, the relationship of principal and surety exists. The affirmative of this question is earnestly and ingeniously maintained by the complainants' counsel. They rely upon certain statutory provisions and the decision of the supreme court of the state. By the eighth section of the act to regulate judgments and executions, passed 24th February, 1824, it is provided that, in all cases where judgment is rendered upon any bond, sealed bill, promissory note, or other instrument of writing, in which two or more persons are jointly and severally held and bound, if it shall be made to appear to the court that one or more of said persons so bound signed the same as surety or bail for his or their co-defendant, it shall be the duty of the clerk, in entering the judgment, to designate the principal and sureties, and the execution is required to issue first against the principal, whose property shall be exhausted before execution shall issue against the surety. And in the ninth section of the act to regulate proceedings where banks or bankers are parties, passed February 2, 1824, it is provided that a bank may bring a joint action against all the drawers or indorsers and declare for money lent, etc. These statutes introduce a new principle in pleading, and in the rendition of judgment in certain cases; and they seem to have been, in the mind of the legislature, in some degree connected. They were passed at the same session. That which authorized a joint proceeding against all the drawers or indorsers, and which, by construction, authorizes a procedure against all drawers and indorsers, being first enacted, seemed to require a protection to sureties which was given in the second statute. This statute provides a new remedy for sureties unknown to the law, but it does not establish any general principle, or change the relation of principal and surety as it before existed. The remedy affords summary relief to a surety against the hardship or inconvenience of a joint judgment, as authorized by the previous statute; but it does nothing more than this. And it might be a matter of doubt, if the relationship of principal and surety exist after judgment, whether equity could interpose in a case where this plain and adequate relief at law had been neglected. Unless this be made an exception to the general rule, equity could give no relief except upon special ground of fraud or circumstances which prevented or rendered ineffectual the remedy at law.

The case of Dixon v. Ewing, 3 Ham., 280, is considered by the counsel as conclusive of the present question. That was a bill in chancery which stated that the complainants joined in a title bond to Ewing, as the securities of one Foot, for the conveyance of a tract of land. They had no interest in the transaction. Foot failed to convey the land. Suit was brought on the bond and a judgment obtained. Execution on the judgment was issued and levied on the personal property of Foot. The levy was afterwards discharged by the plaintiffs' attorney, without their knowledge, and the property was returned to Foot. And the court enjoined the plaintiffs at law to the amount of the value of the property levied on. In their opinion the court say, "our statute for the relief to bail and sureties is a beneficial one, and although this case, as it now stands, is not within its letter, it is within its spirit, at least, so far as injurious preferences are attempted." This decision rests upon general principles, and not upon the construction of a statute. If it involved the construction of a statute of the state, it would, under our practice, constitute a rule of decision for this court. But standing, as it does, upon principles of general law, it can only be considered as the authority of a high and enlightened court. In this view it will be regarded, and if it shall fail to establish the rule on this subject, it cannot fail to command the highest respect. The decision is in point, and, if it be conformable to law, it is conclusive of the question under consideration.

A case similar in principle, and not very dissimilar in facts, came before the supreme court of the United States, and is reported in 3 Wheat., 520. In that case a judgment was obtained against the maker of the note, and a separate judgment against the indorser. The indorser, fearing the failure of the maker of the note, called upon the agent of the plaintiff and requested an execution to be issued. It was issued, and the indorser offered to point out property to the marshal on which he might levy the amount of the judgment; and proposed to indemnify him for so doing. The execution was recalled by the plaintiff's agent, and the maker of the note became insolvent. In their opinion the court say, "although the original undertaking of an indorser of a promissory note be contingent, and he cannot be charged without timely notice of non-payment by the maker, yet, when the holder has taken this precaution, and has proceeded to judgment against both of them, he is at liberty to issue an execution or not, as he pleases, on the judgment against the maker, without affording any cause of complaint to the indorser; or if he issues an execution, he is at liberty to make choice of the one which he thinks will be most beneficial to himself without consultation with the indorser." And they add, "if the indorser suffers any injury, by the negligence of the judgment creditor, it is clearly his own fault, it being his duty to pay the money, in which case he may take under his own direction the judgment against the maker." The assignment of the judgment was provided for by the statute of Maryland. It is insisted that the language of the court, in this case, means nothing more than to "distinguish the position of the indorser after judgment, from that of conditional liability, which he occupies before it." But is this the full import of the decision? Do not the court say, after judgment, the plaintiff is not bound to take out execution against the principal, or if issued, to have it levied, though property be shown to the marshal, and an offer be made to indemnify him; and this in a case where the principal became insolvent, and all recourse against him was lost. If the relation of principal and surety existed after the judgment, and the surety had an equitable right to do what he did do, he had good ground for relief. But the court take this position from the surety. They tell him that his liability is in no respect affected by the conduct of the creditor, and that he is bound, absolutely bound, to pay the judgment.

The same principle is decided by Chancellor Kent in the case of Bay v. Tallmadge, 5 Johns. Ch., 312. That was a case where there was a postponement of an execution against the principal, without the assent of the sureties, and to their injury. But the chancellor says, "the postponement did not discharge the sureties from their obligation to pay the judgment against them." "Their privileges as bail," he says, "were lost, and they had become fixed as principal debtors." And he further remarks, "I am not aware of any case that has ever imposed upon the creditor the necessity of peculiar diligence against the principal, on the ground of the still subsisting relation of principal and surety, after judgment and execution against the bail or surety. It becomes then too late to inquire into the antecedent relations between the parties. Those relations become merged in the judgment." My researches have not enabled me to find a single case, except the one cited from the Ohio reports, where relief has been given on the ground that the relation of surety subsists after judgment. There are many cases where a court of chancery has acted on this relationship and given relief before judgment. In some instances, under very peculiar circumstances, it has required the principal to use peculiar diligence. And in all cases where the surety has paid the debt of his principal, equity will substitute him to all the rights of the creditor. This doctrine is learnedly discussed by Chancellor Kent, in the case of Williard v. Cheeseborough, 1 Johns. Ch., 408; and by Mr. Justice Story, in his Treatise on Equity, 1 vol., under the head of Substitution; 2 Johns. Ch., 562; 3 Merivale, 579; 2 Fonb., 302, n. 1. 17 Ves., 517, 520, are, also, full on the point. In the case of Hays v. Ward, 4 John. Ch., 123, Chancellor Kent, under peculiar circumstances, enjoined a suit at law against a surety until the creditor had pursued his remedy on a mortgage for the same debt. But these cases all proceed upon equities held to exist prior to the judgment, or upon the fact of payment of the judgment by the surety. And this doctrine, when examined, will be found consistent with the principles of justice. A rule which would make the liability of a surety depend upon contingencies until all the resources of the principal were exhausted, and that by a strictly legal course, would seem to regard the protection of the surety more than the safety of the creditor. It would be inconvenient in practice, and not suited to a commercial community.

The accommodation indorser agrees to pay on condition of demand and notice. And why should he be permitted to vary his contract, or excuse himself from its performance? By paying the money he is substituted to all the means of coercion against the principal which the creditor could use; and, also, to all the collateral indemnities he holds. And after judgment against him, this is the only relief, it would seem, which the law gives him. It is as ample a one as can be afforded, and imposes no hardship of which the surety has a right to complain. In the present case Findlay's character, as surety, was merged in the judgments; and he could claim, as surety, no equities but the right of substitution on the payment of the judgments. If Findlay be regarded as a principal, and equally liable with Sutherland to pay the judgments, it is not perceived on what ground he can ask the interference of this court.

§ 601. Rights of a creditor who has a claim on two funds, and of one who also has a claim on one of such funds.

The position assumed by the counsel is admitted, that where a creditor has a claim on two funds, and another creditor has a claim on one of the funds, equity will either restrain the creditor from going against the fund liable to both, or, on its exhaustion, will substitute the creditor of this fund to the rights of the other. But how can this doctrine be made to apply in the present case? The defendants are all principals, and Sutherland, the owner of the property, is bound to pay all the judgments. And by a conveyance of his property he does pay one in full and others in part. Now, is there any principle of equity which will restrain him from doing this? I confess I know of none. The complainants insist that it was not the intention of the bank to make an application of the proceeds of the lands conveyed to it by Sutherland, different from that which the law would make. Mr. Jones, the agent of the bank, does state in his deposition that he objected to the clause in the agreement which provided that Hough's liabilities should be first discharged, and that it was agreed that this clause should be altered. But this statement is not corroborated by Mr. Wood, who drew the agreement, and no alteration of it was ever made. On the contrary, it appears that the bank permitted satisfaction to be entered of the judgment against Hough, which sanctioned this part of the contract.

It would be extremely dangerous to admit parol evidence to vary or alter a written agreement. The rule is well settled, that such evidence cannot have this effect, especially where the written agreement has been acted on and confirmed, and there is no fraud. The marshal, it appears, credited the amount of his sales on the respective executions and order of sale; and this, it is insisted, is obligatory on the bank, and must fix the rule by which the proceeds of the lands conveyed must be applied. The credits thus entered show, it is urged, the election of the bank, which being made, cannot be changed. On the other side it is contended that the credits were entered by the marshal without the direction of the bank, which looked to the agreement for the application of the proceeds, and not to the marshal. It is very clear that the act of the marshal in this respect cannot bind the bank, especially where a different application of the proceeds had been made by the parties. The marshal's sale was provided for in the agreement, probably, with a view to perfect the title, and give to Sutherland the benefit of any advance of price for which the lands might sell. They sold for less than the contract price, and of course the sale could have no effect on the contract. We must look to the contract, and not to the marshal's sale and return, for the sum to be credited and the mode of its application. The agreement does not change, except as to the judgment against Sutherland only, the legal application of the proceeds of the mortgaged premises. It provides that the judgment, including interest and costs of $5,462.20 and the note, including interest, amounting to $4,779.88, shall be first satisfied and discharged out of said sum of $25,794, so far as derived from the property mortgaged to secure said judgment and note; and the residue to be satisfied out of the proceeds derived from the other property, not interfering with the amount received from the property mortgaged for other purposes.

The balance remaining due on the above judgment and note, after exhausting the mortgage given to secure their payment, is, by the agreement, to be paid out of the proceeds of the lands not mortgaged. And no ground is perceived which authorizes this court to change this application of the proceeds of this property. It disregards the priority of the judgment against Findlay, but of this, as has been stated, his representatives cannot complain. He stands as a principal in the judgments, and can be considered in no other light, until the judgments shall be satisfied. The judgment against Sutherland only was secured by mortgage, but the proceeds of this mortgage, under the agreement, were applied in the payment of Hough's liabilities. So that that judgment stands without any special provision for its payment. It is insisted that this judgment shall be paid out of the proceeds of the property not covered by the mortgages, on the ground that the bank had a right to make such an application. The bank undoubtedly might have provided in the agreement for the payment of this judgment in the manner stated, but it has not done so; and the court, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, will not direct the credit to be thus entered. This judgment must stand with the judgment against Findlay, both of which were entered on the same day, and levied at the same time, to be discharged, in proportion to their respective amounts, out of the proceeds of the property levied on. It is agreed in the contract that the premises described shall be taken by the bank, subject to the judgment of Busenbach. If the bank, in the language of the agreement, received the property subject to this judgment, no deduction should be made from the consideration stated, on account of it. Indeed it would seem that this judgment was deducted from the general amount, before the contract was drawn. The calculations can be made and the credits entered in conformity with this opinion.

PHILLIPS v. PRESTON.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Eastern District of Louisiana.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Preston was an accommodation indorser for Barrow, and Phillips was a second indorser. They agreed, at the time of making their indorsements, that they would share any losses equally. This suit was brought to recover a share of an alleged loss.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WOODBURY.

The points which have been argued in this case are in part connected with matters of form, and in part with what is substance. We shall dispose of the first before proceeding to examine the last.

§ 603. Refusal to allow "peremptory exceptions" not error if party objecting received substantial benefit of them.

The principal objection in respect to form is, that the court below refused to receive what are called in the practice of the state of Louisiana "peremptory exceptions." These are of two kinds—one as to form, and one as to law. Those in this case were offered as "peremptory exceptions, founded in law." By the Code of Practice in Louisiana, art. 345, such exceptions "may be pleaded in every stage of the action previous to the definitive judgment." 1 Louisiana, 315; 4 Martin (N. S.), 437. Hence, though offered here after the pleadings were read, they are admissible, while peremptory exceptions relating to form would not be then admissible. See art. 344. The only doubt as to their being duly offered arises from the provision in the three hundred and forty-sixth article, which requires them to "be pleaded specially," and they are not here in the precise form of a special plea at common law. But, in the absence of any adjudged cases to the contrary, we are inclined to think that, under the liberal and general pleading in use in Louisiana, these exceptions must be considered as "specially pleaded," when set forth as they were here in writing, and in a specific or detailed form, and judgment prayed on them in favor of the present plaintiff. Has he then been deprived of the advantage attached to them? That is the important inquiry. On examination of the record it will be seen that he had the benefit of all these exceptions, first in a motion in arrest of judgment. Again, he had the benefit of all the important matter in those exceptions by the bill which was afterwards filed and allowed, and upon which this writ of error has been brought. We cannot, therefore, perceive that he has suffered any by the refusal of the court to receive these peremptory exceptions when first offered. The case in this respect is like one at common law, where the defendant should propose to demur generally to the declaration, but, being refused, objects to the sufficiency of it to cover various portions of the evidence as it is offered, and also objects to the sufficiency of the declaration in arrest of judgment. He thus, by a subsequent bill of exceptions to the rulings on the testimony and on the sufficiency of the declaration, obtains every advantage that he could have had under his general demurrer, and thus suffers nothing which requires a reversal of the judgment and a new trial for his relief.

§ 604. Refusal to allow clerk to take down evidence not error when no appeal can be taken.

The next objection of a formal character is, that the court below refused, though requested by the original defendant, to have the clerk take down in writing and file the testimony of the witnesses and the documentary evidence. It is true that by a statute of Louisiana, passed July 20, 1817, their courts are directed to have the testimony taken down "in all cases where an appeal lies to the supreme court, if either party require it." It is also true that an act of congress, passed May 26, 1824 (4 Stats. at Large, 62), has made the practice existing in Louisiana the guide to that in the courts of the United States, when sitting in that state, except as it may be modified by rules of the judge of the United States court. And it is further shown in this record, that the district judge there, November 20, 1837, adopted the practice of Louisiana, as then existing, in all cases not of admiralty jurisdiction. In a cause once decided by this court, which was connected with this point, Wilcox v. Hunt, 13 Pet., 378, it was remarked that the plea put in there as a part of the state practice, as the latter had not been adopted, was not received. But the practice there standing differently from that which is urged in this case, that decision does not control the present one. In considering, then, the propriety of the ruling of the court here, it is first to be noticed that, by the words of the statute, this testimony is to be taken down and filed only in those cases "where an appeal lies." That means, of course, a technical appeal, where the facts are to be reviewed and reconsidered, for in such an one only is there any use of taking them down. But in the present case no appeal of that character lay to this court, but merely a writ of error to bring the law and not the facts here for re-examination. To construe the act of 1824 as if meaning to devolve on this court such a re-examination of facts, without a trial by jury, in a case at law, like this, and not one in equity or admiralty, would be to give to it an unconstitutional operation, dangerous to the trial by jury, and at times subversive of the public liberties. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet., 448. In a case of chancery or admiralty jurisdiction it might be different, as in those, by the law of the land, a technical appeal lies, and the facts are there open to reconsideration in this court. Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet., 632; McCollum v. Eager, 2 How., 64. In this case, likewise, it would be totally useless to have all the facts taken down in that manner, because, if so taken and sent up here, it would be irrelevant and improperly burdening the record, as much as the whole charge and opinion of the judge, instead of the naked points excepted to. See twenty-eighth rule of this court, and Zeller v. Eckert, 4 How., 297, 298. If a case comes up in that manner, this court never reconsiders or re-examines all the facts, but merely the law arising on them, as if a bill of exceptions had been properly filed. This has been decided already in Parsons v. Armor, 3 Pet., 425; Minor v. Tillotson, 2 How., 394. Beside these considerations, showing that neither the words of the statute, nor the reasons for it, reach a case like this, there is another in the practice and laws of Louisiana, which shows that this provision does not extend to a cause like the present in this court. There the court of appeal, even in cases at law, often decides on all the facts as well as the law; but not so here. The court there may be substituted for a jury by consent of the parties in a trial at law, and were in this case below. But no such power can be conferred on this supreme court by parties in cases at law; and, as before shown, it exists under acts of congress merely in cases in equity and admiralty. To conclude on this point, then, it will be seen that the plaintiff in error, notwithstanding the refusal to have the clerk take down this evidence, has enjoyed all the benefit of it under his bill of exceptions, where it was material, and he wished to raise any question of law on it, and has enjoyed it as fully as if the whole had been taken down and filed. And thus he loses nothing and suffers nothing by the court refusing to do what we think neither the language nor spirit of the law requires in a case like this. Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet., 433.

§ 605. Objection that trial by jury was not allowed is too late after party proceeds to trial before court.

There are two other objections of form, which appear on the record and may well be noticed, though they are not embodied in the bill of exceptions. One is as to the waiver of a trial by jury in this case in the court below. After a hearing there, it was urged that, the waiver not having been entered on the record, the court was not authorized to proceed without a jury. But it would hardly be permissible for a party to proceed without objection in a trial of facts before the court, in a case at law in a state where the statutes permitted it, and the habits of the people under the civil law inclined them to favor it, and then, after a decision might be announced which was not satisfactory, to offer such an objection as this. From its not being incorporated into the bill of exceptions, or argued at the hearing before us, a strong presumption arises that it has been abandoned.

The other objection is spread upon the early part of the record, and was a proper one for the consideration of the court in that stage of the case, as it went to its jurisdiction. This was urged on the ground that the notes mentioned in the petition of the plaintiff below belonged or ran originally to R. Barrow, a resident of Louisiana, in the same state with the defendant, and that his title was assigned to the plaintiff, and thus the latter cannot sue the defendant in this court, if Barrow could not. This position would be well taken under the provision in the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stats. at Large, 78), if the original plaintiff had instituted his suit upon the notes as assignee of them. See Towne v. Smith, 1 Woodb. & M., 115; Bean v. Smith, 2 Mason, 252; 16 Pet., 315; Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dal., 8-11; Montalet v. Murray, 4 Cranch, 46. But so far from that, he does not declare at all on the notes. He sets out a separate and different contract as his ground for recovery, resting on an original agreement between him and the defendant; and does not set out any assignment of those notes to himself by Barrow. Even if he counted on the notes, but not on or through an assignment of them, this court would have jurisdiction. 6 Wheat., 146; 9 id., 537; 2 Pet., 326; 11 id., 801; 3 How., 576, 577; 1 Mason, 251; 1 McL., 132. The judge below, then, properly overruled this objection.

§ 607. Collateral agreement of co-sureties to share loss pro rata is founded on good consideration and is provable by parol; authorities; evidence.

We come next to the only remaining question in this case, which branches into five or six different exceptions. It is a question of substance, and in some respects is not without difficulty. It is whether the ground upon which the objection going to the jurisdiction was overruled is well founded in the declaration and the facts, by showing a separate and independent contract, and one which had a good consideration in law. On looking to the petition, it will be seen that it sets out a sale of land between other parties; the mode of payment stipulated; the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant to become indorsers of certain notes, and divide between them any loss; the subsequent failure of the purchaser to pay the notes; the settlement of them by the plaintiff, and his right under the agreement and facts to recover of the defendant one-half of the amount. The whole claim proceeds on the collateral agreement, and there is no pretense of grounding the suit, as holder or indorsee, on any promises contained in the notes or in the indorsements on them. There is also a good consideration for this collateral agreement. It is the promise of the plaintiff beforehand to lose one-half, if the defendant would become a surety with him and lose the other half, and the actual payment afterwards of the whole by the plaintiff. Being then a collateral agreement by parol, which is sued, it stands free from the objection to the parol evidence offered to prove it. Were the action on the notes, and this evidence offered to contradict them, it would be entirely different; because, in an action on a note, parol testimony is not competent to vary its written terms, and probably not to vary a blank indorsement by the payee from what the law imports. Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 2256; Stone v. Vincent, 6 Mart. (N. S.), 517; 15 La., 539; 10 id., 205; 1 Pet. C. C., 84; Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 59; 3 Camp. N. P., 56, 57; 9 Wheat., 587; 1 Mart. (N. S.), 641; Chitty on Bills, 541; 12 East, 4; 4 Barn. & Ald., 454. So, between the contracting parties, likewise, all prior conversation is supposed, as far as binding, to be embodied into the written contract. 4 La., 269; Taylor v. Riggs, 1 Pet., 591; 8 Wheat., 211. But the parol evidence here is not offered in any action on the note, or to alter its terms or its indorsements; nor is any prior or contemporaneous conversation offered to vary the note, or its indorsement, in an action founded on either of them. But it is offered to prove a separate contract, which was made by parol, and is of as high a character as the law requires in such cases, and this evidence is plenary and entirely satisfactory to substantiate the separate contract. It is true, at the same time, that, after a prior indorser has paid a note, he cannot recover, even in an action, not on it, but for contribution of one-half from a second indorser, if they were not in fact joint sureties, nor in fact made any collateral contract whatever, nor in fact had any communication whatever as to their liability. McDonald v. Magruder, 3 Pet., 474; 3 Har. & Johns., 125; 7 Johns., 367. But the present is a case differing, toto celo, from that. Here, by a deliberate arrangement before a public notary, and by the positive evidence of two witnesses, the two indorsers were co-sureties, and specially agreed to bear any loss equally between them; and the right to recover is, therefore, entirely clear. 3 Pet., 477; Douglas v. Waddle, 1 Hamm., 413, 420; Deering v. The Earl of Winchelsea, 2 Bos. & Pull., 270.

There are two or three other views connected with this part of the case which may be usefully adverted to, but by which we do not decide it. Thus, where a person like Phillips, the original defendant, was not a party to a note, but put his name on the back of it, parol testimony has been deemed competent to show the real object for which it was placed there; and especially if it did not contradict any legal implication from the name being there. And hence, under circumstances like these, where, as in Louisiana and some other states, it is implied by law that such a person puts his name there as a surety or guarantor, no objection exists to parol proof to that effect. 10 Louisiana, 374; Lawrence v. Oakey, 14 id., 386; Nelson v. Dubois, 13 Johns., 175; Dean v. Hall, 17 Wend., 214; 5 Mass., 358; 12 id., 281; 1 Vermont, 136; Ulen v. Kitteridge, 7 Mass., 233; 4 Wash., 480; 5 Serg. & R., 363. In White v. Howland, 9 Mass., 314, he is held to be liable as if signing with the maker as a surety. But however much, in some states, the practice may go beyond this in suits between the parties to the agreement, as in 1 Hamm., 420, and 5 Serg. & R., 363, it could generally not be competent to prove anything by parol, in actions on the note, contrary to what is written or to what is implied in law. Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 59. And in other states and in other circumstances, where the inference of law is not that such a name is placed there as a surety, it is very doubtful whether, in a suit on the note, proof that he did it only as a surety is competent. 6 Mart. (N. S.), 517; Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 59. In England, in the case of such a name on the back of a bill of exchange, the person may be treated as a new drawer (Chitty on Bills, 241); and if the payee there has also indorsed the note the implication deemed most proper is, that another name on the back is that of a second indorser, and should so be held in the hands of third persons. Chitty on Bills, 188, 528; Holt's Nisi Prais, 470; 5 Ad. & Ell., 436; 6 Nev. & Man., 723. So, 6 Mart., 517. It will be seen, however, that these last are generally cases of actions on the notes or bills of exchange themselves, while the present case is not brought on the note itself, but on a distinct and collateral contract.

Another suggestion bearing on the case might be, that in Louisiana the surety, when paying, may step into the shoes of his creditor, if he pleases, by subrogation, and enjoy all his rights against the debtors or other sureties. Hewes v. Pierce, 1 Mart. (N. S.), 361; Callihan v. Tanner, 3 Rob. (La.), 299; Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 2157. But there the suit is probably in the creditor's name, and not, as here, in that of the surety. So, in some countries where the civil law prevails, such a contract as this, deliberately made before a notary, and by him reduced to writing by request of the parties, would, in law, be deemed equivalent to a contract in writing; and on that ground be admissible even in a suit on the note between the original parties to it. The doings of the parties thus have a sort of public form given to them, quasi judicial, and they are bound by them, though not signed by the parties. 2 Domat's Civil Law, b. 2, tit. 1, § 1, art. 28, and tit. 5, § 5, pp. 661, 662. It would be there deemed an act of too much deliberation by the parties, and of too much formality before that public officer, to be treated merely as an ordinary verbal arrangement. Coop. Justinian, 586; 3 Burr., 1671; Story on Bills, § 277. But, though the Louisiana code, founded chiefly on the civil law, may not expressly abrogate such a doctrine, it does not in terms make records by a notary valid, unless signed by the parties, or consisting of copies of papers signed by the parties and acknowledged before witnesses. Civil Code, arts. 2231, 2413; 8 Mart. (N. S.), 568; 10 La., 207, 354. And though the paper containing this is signed by the parties to the sale, and attested by witnesses, it is not signed by Preston and Phillips, the parties to this arrangement.

It is not necessary, however, to decide absolutely on the effect of either of these last views. Deeming the action here to be founded on the collateral agreement, and deeming the evidence offered to be competent, for the reasons first stated under this head, these conclusions will virtually dispose of the last six exceptions contained in the record of this case. Thus, as to Barrow's deposition, the admission of which was the ground of one of these exceptions, it is clearly competent to prove this separate parol contract in a suit on that, and not on the note. So the certificates and notices, also excepted to, were properly proved as a part of the collateral transaction under the general expressions in the petition, and not as notices that should be specially set out in a declaration, where notes are counted on by a holder. In a case like that, the averment of them and the proof are highly material, but in the former case they are rather historical and merely a part of the res gestæ, without its being essential to give them in detail. The original plaintiff avers in the petition that the notes were protested, and that he was obliged to pay them, which would not have been the case without due notices; and this is quite enough in an action on a collateral undertaking. So the notary's evidence, which is another of the exceptions, becomes under this aspect entirely competent, and the written memorandum made by him at the time, which is another objection, was also admissible evidence to refresh his memory, if not per se of the facts stated in it. Greenl. Ev., §§ 436, 437. That it was admissible to refresh his memory, see Smith v. Morgan, 2 Moody & R., 259; Horne v. McKenzie, 6 Clark & F., 628. Other cases say such a memorandum is admissible itself to go to the jury. Greenl. Ev., § 437, note; 1 Rawle, 182; Smith v. Lane, 12 Serg. & R., 84; 2 Nott & McC., 331; 15 Wend., 193; 16 id., 586-598. If this last be a rule controverted, the writing here was "the act of sale," and contained other matters as to the transaction in connection with this as the whole terms of sale, which were clearly competent, and the whole properly went together to the jury as exhibiting the progress and character of the transaction, beside being admissible to refresh the memory of the witness. Bullen v. Michel, 2 Price, 422, 447, 476. So the evidence of the sale of Carr's property and of the transfer of it to the original plaintiff, Preston, by the sheriff, and the terms of the transfer, though objected to, are mere links in the chain of the transaction, and unexceptionable in that view; and were, like the evidence of the former sale to Carr by Barrow, duly authenticated.

Upon the whole case, then, we are happy to find that no legal objection seems to be tenable against making the original defendant meet an engagement which, on the record, he appears to have been bound in honor and justice, no less than law, faithfully to discharge. Although the court have deemed it proper thus to deliver an opinion on this case, as it has been argued by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, yet the death of the plaintiff has since been suggested; and no appearance is entered for the defendant. We shall not, therefore, enter judgment in conformity to the opinion until the defendant or the representatives of the deceased appear.

M'DONALD v. MAGRUDER.

(3 Peters, 470-479. 1830.)

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was a writ of error to a judgment rendered by the circuit court of the United States for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, brought by the first indorser of a promissory note against the second indorser, to recover half its amount. The note was made by Samuel Turner, Jr., and indorsed George B. Magruder, John G. M'Donald. At the trial of the cause a case was agreed by the parties, and the judgment of the circuit court was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, on a verdict given by the jury, subject to the opinion of the court.

§ 608. Indorser liable to subsequent indorsee.

That a prior indorser is, in the regular course of business, liable to his indorsee, although that indorsee may have afterwards indorsed the same note, is unquestionable. When he takes up the note he becomes the holder as entirely as if he had never parted with it, and may sue the indorser for the amount. The first indorser undertakes that the maker shall pay the note, or that he, if due diligence be used, will pay it for him. This undertaking makes him responsible to every holder, and to every person whose name is on the note subsequent to his own, and who has been compelled to pay its amount.

§ 609. Indorser without consideration is not liable.

This is the regular course of business where notes are indorsed for value. But it is contended that, where less than the amount is received, the indorser is responsible to his immediate indorsee only for the sum actually paid; consequently, if nothing is paid, the mere indorsement does not bind the indorser to pay his immediate indorsee anything. If B. indorses to C. the note of A., without value, and A. fails to take it up, it is, as between B. and C., a contract without consideration, on which no action arises. This is undoubtedly true, if C. retains the note in his own possession; and may be equally true, if he indorses it for value. When he repays the money he has received he is replaced in the situation in which he would have been had he never parted with the note. If he puts it into circulation on his own account, new relations may be created between himself and his immediate indorsee, which may be affected by circumstances. In the case under consideration the note took the direction intended by all the parties. It was indorsed by Magruder, for the purpose of enabling Turner to discount it at the bank. To insure this object, Turner applied to M'Donald, who placed his name also on the paper. No intercourse took place between the indorsers. No contract, express or implied, existed between them, other than is created by their respective liabilities, produced by the act of indorsement. What are these liabilities? The first indorser gave his name to the maker of the note for the purpose of using it in order to raise the money mentioned on its face. He made himself responsible for the whole sum, upon the sole credit of the maker. His undertaking is undivided. He does not understand that any person is to share this responsibility with him. But either the bank is unwilling to discount the note on the credit of the maker and his single indorser, or the maker supposes his object will be insured by the additional credit given by another name. He presents the note, therefore, to M'Donald, and asks his name also. M'Donald accedes to his request, and puts his name on the instrument. If the maker passes the note for value, the liability of M'Donald to the holder is the same as if that value had been received by M'Donald himself. Why is this? No consideration is received by M'Donald, and this fact is known to the holder and discounteer of the note. But a consideration is paid by the holder to the maker, and paid on the credit of M'Donald's name. He cannot set up the want of a consideration received by himself; he is not permitted to say that the promise is made without consideration; because money paid by the promisee to another is as valid a consideration as if paid to the promisor himself.

In what does the claim of the second on the first indorser differ from that of the holder on the second indorser? Neither has paid value to his immediate indorser; but the holder has paid value to the maker on the credit of all the names to the instrument. The second indorser, if he takes up the note, has paid value to the holder, in virtue of the liability created by his indorsement. If this liability was founded equally on the credit of the maker and of the first indorser, if his undertaking on the credit of both subjects him to the loss consequent on the payment of the note, how can the contract between him and his immediate indorser be said to be without consideration? If it be true, as we think it is, that Magruder, when he indorsed the note and returned it to the maker to be discounted, made himself responsible for its amount on the failure of the maker, if this responsibility was then complete, how can it be diminished by the circumstance that M'Donald became a subsequent indorser? How can the legal liability of a first indorser to the second, who has been compelled to take up the note, be changed otherwise than by an express or implied contract between the parties? This question has arisen and been decided in the courts of several states. Wood v. Repold, 3 Har. & J., 125, was a bill drawn by A. Brown, Jr., at Baltimore, on Messrs. Goold & Son, of New York, in favor of G. Wood & Co., and indorsed by G. Wood & Co., and afterwards by Repold, the plaintiff. The bill was drawn and indorsed for the purpose of raising money for the drawer, and was discounted at the Bank of Baltimore. On being protested for non-payment, it was taken up by Repold, and this suit brought against the first indorser. Payment was resisted, because the indorsement was without consideration for the accommodation of the drawer; but the court sustained the action. The same question arose in Brown v. Mott, 7 Johns., 361, on a promissory note, and was decided in the same manner. In that case the court said that, if he had taken it up at a reduced price, it would seem that he could only recover the amount paid. Undoubtedly, if M'Donald had been compelled to pay a moiety of this note, he could have recovered only that moiety from Magruder. The case of Douglas v. Waddle, 1 Hamm., 413, was determined differently. This case was undoubtedly decided on general principles; but the custom of the country and a statute of the state are referred to by the court as entitled to considerable influence. The weight of authority as well as of usage is, we think, in favor of the liability of the first indorser.

The claim of Magruder has also been maintained, on the principle that they are co-sureties, and that he who has paid the whole note may demand contribution from the other. The principle is unquestionably sound, if the case can be brought within it. Co-sureties are bound to contribute equally to the debt they have jointly undertaken to pay; but the undertaking must be joint, not separate and successive. Magruder and M'Donald might have become joint indorsers. Their promise might have been a joint promise. In that event, each would have been liable to the other for a moiety. But their promise is not joint. They have indorsed separately and successively, in the usual mode. No contract, no communication has taken place between them which might vary the legal liabilities these indorsements are known to create. Those legal liabilities, therefore, remain in full force. Upon this question of contribution, the counsel for the defendants in error rely on two cases reported in 2 Bos. & Pull., 268 and 270. The first, Cowell v. Edwards, was a suit by one surety on a bond against his co-surety for contribution. It was intimated by the court that each surety was liable for his aliquot part, but not liable at law to any contribution on account of the insolvency of some of the sureties. The party who had paid more than his just proportion of the debt could obtain relief in equity only. The second case, Sir Edward Deering v. The Earl of Winchelsea, Sir John Rous and the Attorney-General, was a suit in chancery, in the exchequer. Thomas Deering had been appointed receiver of fines, etc., and had given three bonds conditioned for faithful accounting, etc. In one of these the plaintiff was surety; in another, Lord Winchelsea; and, in the third, Sir John Rous. Judgment was obtained on the bond in which the plaintiff was surety, and this suit was brought against the sureties to the two other bonds for contribution. It was resisted on the ground that there was no contract between the parties, they having entered into special obligations. The lord chief baron was disposed to consider the right to contribution as founded rather on the equity of the parties than on contract, and the court decreed contribution. In this case the parties were equally bound, were equally sureties for the same purpose, and were equally liable for the same debt. Neither had any claim upon the other superior to what that other had on him. The parties stood in the same relation, not only to the crown, to whom they were all responsible, and to the person for whom they were sureties, but to each other. Under these circumstances, contribution may well be decreed ex equali jure. But, in the case at bar, the parties do not stand in the same relation to each other. The second indorser gives his name on the faith of the first indorser, as well as of the maker. The first indorser gives his name on the faith of the maker only. Unquestionably these liabilities may be changed by contract; but, no contract existing between these parties, it is not a case to which the principle of contribution applies.

No notice has been taken of the form of the action. It is admitted that Magruder, having paid the whole note, may recover a moiety from M'Donald, if their undertaking is to be considered as joint; if he, as first indorser, is not responsible to M'Donald for any part of it which M'Donald may have paid. The judgment is to be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to set aside the verdict, and enter judgment as on a non-suit.

(12 Wheaton, 594-598. 1827.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The question to be decided in this cause is certified to this court on a division of opinion from the judges of the Virginia district. The bill is filed to recover a sum of money of Robinson's estate; and the debts being numerous, and the assets probably insufficient to satisfy the whole, the right of priority becomes a material object among the creditors.

The particular demand upon which this question is certified is that of one Smith, who was joint indorser with Robinson, on a bill of exchange drawn by one Roots, and returned under protest. The bill, of course, must have been drawn payable to Robinson and Smith, and being taken up by them, and the latter having paid more than a moiety in satisfaction of the debt, his administrator now claims of the estate of Robinson the amount by which Smith's payments exceeded the moiety. There is no question on his right to come in for that sum as a simple contract creditor; but he claims precedence, and the rank of a judgment creditor, under a particular provision of the laws of Virginia in force at Robinson's death, and under an equitable principle, according to which he who pays a debt of a superior dignity is suffered to rank in the application of assets according to the dignity of the debt satisfied; or, in other words, is substituted for the creditor who held the prior debt. The terms of the Virginia act are these: "All bills of exchange which are or shall be protested shall, after the death of the drawer or indorser thereof, be accounted of equal dignity with a judgment; and the executors or administrators of every such drawer or indorser shall suffer judgment to pass against them for all debts due upon protested bills of exchange, before any bond, bill or other debt of equal or inferior dignity, under the penalty of being obliged to pay the same out of their own proper goods." The priority, therefore, of the holder of the bill of exchange, as well against the estates of the indorsers as the drawer, is unquestionable; but the other creditors insist that, as between the co-indorsers, the rights of Smith against the estate of Robinson must be determined by the nature of the action to which he would have been put at law to recover back what he paid above his moiety, that is, assumpsit on simple contract. But both on principle and authority we are induced to think otherwise.

§ 613. Subrogation of indorser who pays note or bill.

What have the creditors of Robinson to complain of? They are only referred back to the situation in which they were before they were relieved by the application of Smith's funds to the payment of the bill of exchange. If the bill of exchange still remained in the hands of the holder unsatisfied, his right to a priority from Robinson's estate, as to the moiety of the bill, would be unquestionable; and if relieved from that state by the money of Smith, it is but right that Smith should have refunded to him that sum which they, without that payment, would certainly have been obliged to relinquish. This is in perfect analogy with that class of cases in which real assets have been decreed to make good to simple contract creditors sums that have been taken from personal assets, and applied to relieve the real estate (8 Ves., 382), or to satisfy specialty creditors. Gibbs v. Ougier, 12 Ves. Jr., 413. That a surety who discharges the debt of the principal shall, in general, succeed to the rights of the creditor, as well direct as incidental, is strongly exemplified in those cases in which the surety is permitted to succeed to those rights, even against bail, who are themselves, in many respects, regarded as sureties. 2 Vern., 608; 11 Vesey, 22. That such would be the effect of an actual assignment made by the creditor to the surety, or to some third person for his benefit, no one can doubt. But in the cases last cited, we find the court of equity lending its aid to compel the creditor to assign the cause of action, and thus to make an actual substitution of the sureties, so as to perfect their claim at law. This fully affirms the right to succeed to the legal standing of their principal; and, after establishing that principle, it is going but one step further to consider that as done which the surety has a right to have done in his favor, and thus to sustain the substitution without an actual assignment. And accordingly we find the dictum expressed in Robinson v. Wilson, 2 Madd., 434, in pretty general terms, "that a surety who pays off a specialty debt shall be considered as a creditor by specialty of his principal." If the parties in this cause be considered as claiming under assignment from the holder of the bill, and each as assignee of the claim against his co-indorsee, according to the actual state of their respective interests, there can be no doubt of the priority here claimed. This subject has undergone a very serious examination in the courts of the United States, and in cases in which, as in this, satisfaction has been made by the surety without taking an actual assignment of the debt. The first in order of time was that of Burrows and Brown v. M'Whann and Campbell, administrators of Carnes, 1 Desaus., 409.

This was a case exactly the parallel of the present in all its circumstances. The parties were co-securities to one Banks, in a bond to Warrington, and had contributed, but unequally, to the satisfaction of the judgment obtained against them jointly on the bond. They had taken no assignment of the judgment, and Brown and Burrows, who had paid most, prayed to be let in as judgment creditors of Carnes, their co-obligor, in right of the judgment obtained by the creditor, Warrington. There was, in this case, satisfaction also entered formally on the judgment, but as this was obtained by the management of Carnes' administrators, it was treated as a nullity, and the complainants had a priority decreed to them in right of the judgment against themselves, conjointly with Carnes, their co-obligor. The next case was that of Eppes, Executor of Wayles, v. Randolph, 2 Call, 125, in which the surety to a bond, having paid it off, but having taken no assignment from the creditor, filed his bill to charge the real estate of the principal, upon the ground that he had succeeded to the rights of the creditor by the mere act of satisfying the bond. It was not questioned that such would have been the effect of an assignment, nor that the aid of the court would have been granted to compel the creditor to assign; but the claim to relief was insisted upon, on the ground that, without such assignment, the surety could only be considered in the rank of a simple contract creditor, and, as such, neither having a preference to other simple contract creditors, nor the rights of a creditor by specialty, to charge the assets descended.

This is precisely the defense set up in the present case; but in the case of Wayles v. Randolph, the court decided that the surety succeeded to the rights of the creditor, and decreed satisfaction accordingly out of the remaining assets, both real and personal (p. 189); modifying their decree, however, so as not to affect the executor with a devastavit for any payment made before the filing of the bill. In the year 1802, the same point was decided in the courts of Virginia in the case of Tinsley v. Anderson, 3 Call, 329. In this case, a creditor filed his bill to compel mortgagees and judgment creditors to subject the estate of one Anderson to a sale, that prior incumbrances might be cleared away, so as to let him in for satisfaction; and in applying the proceeds of the mortgaged property, the court was called upon to decide this question in all its latitude. In delivering their decree, the language of the court is "that for all sums paid by sureties, they ought to be placed in the situation of the creditors whose debts they have paid or are bound to pay." That this, then, is the settled law of the state in which this contract and this cause originated cannot be doubted. But we feel no inclination to place our decision upon that restricted ground, since we are well satisfied with its correctness on a general principle, and on authorities of great respectability in other states. We will, therefore, order it to be certified to the circuit court of Virginia district that John Smith, executor of John Smith, deceased, is entitled to satisfaction from the assets of the estate of John Robinson, with the priority of a judgment creditor of the deceased.

HALL v. SMITH.

(5 Howard, 96-103. 1846.)

CERTIFICATE OF DIVISION from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Maryland.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Thornton sued Smith, who gave him two notes, indorsed by McCaleb and by Kent as sureties, whereupon Thornton discontinued his suit. These notes not being paid at maturity, Thornton brought suit against McCaleb, who was arrested, and procured one Lemmon as bail. Lemmon became McCaleb's bail because he was an intimate friend of McCaleb's father-in-law, Hall, and believed that he would save him (Lemmon) harmless. This Hall promised verbally to do, and finally paid the balance due on the notes, which were then assigned to him, and he brings suit against Smith to recover the money he paid out for his use. On a certificate of division, the questions propounded were (1) whether the plaintiff could recover, and (2) if not, could the defendant offer evidence that Smith and McCaleb were both citizens of Mississippi when the notes were given, and thus bar plaintiff from suing as assignee.

§ 614. Surety of a surety paying debt of principal may recover from principal.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WAYNE.

Upon the trial of this cause in the circuit court two points were made, upon which the judges differed in opinion; and it has been certified to this court, as is provided for in the sixth section of the act of 1802, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States." 2 Statutes at Large, 159. From the evidence, we think that all the persons in this transaction became privies in the same contract to secure the payment of a debt due by the defendant to Thornton. The payment of it, therefore, by any one of them other than the debtor, was a payment at his request, and an express assumpsit to reimburse the amount. But, suppose such a privity not existing between the parties, the evidence shows it also to be a case of the surety of a surety paying the debt of a principal, under a legal obligation, from which the principal was bound to relieve him. Such a payment is a sufficient consideration to raise an implied assumpsit to repay the amount, though the payment was made without a request from the principal. Tappin v. Broster, 1 Carr. & P., 112; Exall v. Partridge, 8 Term R., 310; Child v. Morley, id., 610. We shall decide the first point certified to be answered in the affirmative, which makes it unnecessary to notice the second.

SWEENEY v. EASTER.

(1 Wallace, 166-175. 1863.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Plaintiffs bring trover against defendants to recover the value of certain notes indorsed for collection by plaintiffs to Harris & Co., bankers, and by them indorsed for the same purpose to Sweeny, R. F. & Co., who collected the notes and retained the proceeds to satisfy a balance due them from Harris & Co., who had become insolvent.

§ 615. Competency of partner as witness to explain indorsement of firm who are indorsers.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

The first exception was to the admission of R. H. Harris, of the firm of Harris & Sons, as a witness. Neither that firm nor any of its members were parties to the suit, nor is it pretended that the witness was in any manner interested in the event of it. But it is claimed that because the name of the firm of which he is a partner is indorsed on the negotiable paper which is the subject matter of this suit, he cannot, being a party to such paper, be permitted to invalidate or contradict it, or vary its legal import. The objection as thus stated embraces two distinct propositions. First, that a party to a negotiable instrument shall not be permitted to impeach or render invalid the paper with which he thus stands connected. Second, that he cannot be permitted to contradict or vary the legal import of the original paper, or such indorsement as he may have made on it by parol testimony. The latter objection applies to the character of the evidence, without regard to the person offered as a witness, and would be as effectual against testimony from the mouth of a person who had no connection with the paper as from an indorser or maker of it.

This is not a suit on the paper, or against any of the parties to it. It is an action of trover for the wrongful conversion of the paper, in which plaintiffs seek to recover its value. The firm of Harris & Sons sent it to defendants, who were their banking correspondents, for collection; and they made a special indorsement on it, thus: "Pay Sweeny, R., F. & Co., for collection. SAM. HARRIS & SONS." Now, does this testimony of the witness, to the effect that Harris & Sons were not the owners of the paper, and did not sell it to defendants, or intend to give them any lien on or title to the paper, or its proceeds when collected, contradict or vary the legal import of this indorsement? We cannot see that it does. It rather explains the transaction in perfect conformity with the real meaning and effect of the indorsement. The words "for collection" evidently had a meaning. That meaning was intended to limit the effect which would have been given to the indorsement without them, and warned the party that, contrary to the purpose of a general or blank indorsement, this was not intended to transfer the ownership of the note or its proceeds. If defendants acquired any interest in the paper, it was not by virtue of that indorsement, but by some course of dealing with Harris & Sons, or by some other matter outside of the indorsement. The character of this indorsement also takes the case out of the rule asserted in the first proposition embraced by the exception. Perhaps no subject connected with commercial paper has been more the subject of controversy, and of opposing and well-balanced judicial decisions, than the proposition here relied on. It was first laid down in the English courts in the case of Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term, 296, and afterwards held the other way in Jordaine v. Lashbrook, 7 id., 601. This court, however, has steadily adhered to the doctrine of Walton v. Shelley, and we are referred by counsel for plaintiffs in error to our own decisions on this subject in 6 Pet., 51; 8 Pet., 12; 3 How., 73; 13 How., 229. The rule propounded in Walton v. Shelley is, that a person who has placed his name on a negotiable paper as a party to it shall not afterwards, in a suit on such security, be competent as a witness to prove any fact which would tend to impeach or invalidate the instrument to which he has thus given his name. The reason of it is, that it is against good morals and public policy to permit a person who has thus aided in giving currency and circulation to such paper to testify to facts which would render such paper void, after he has thus imposed it upon the public as valid, with all the sanction which his name could give it. Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term, 296; Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 57; Bank of Metropolis v. Jones, 8 id., 16. The indorsement in the present case was not intended to give currency or circulation to the paper. Its effect was just the reverse. It prevented the further circulation of the paper, and its effect was limited to an authority to collect it. No principle of public policy would be violated, nor any fraud upon innocent holders of the paper would be perpetrated, by permitting the parties who made that indorsement to testify to facts which are in perfect harmony with its language and its intent. Again, the testimony does not tend to invalidate the paper, or any indorsement on it. The defendants could not have recovered of Harris & Sons on that indorsement if the notes had been protested in their hands; and they were therefore deprived by that testimony of no right which the indorsement gave them; nor was such indorsement impeached or impaired by the testimony. This exception must be overruled.

§ 616. Competency of evidence to establish knowledge that firm were not owners but mere collectors of paper.

The second exception was taken to the refusal of the court to grant an instruction to the jury prayed by plaintiffs in error. The instruction asked is as follows: "And the private practice of Harris & Sons, in transmitting negotiable paper having time to run, whereby they intended to distinguish between negotiable paper discounted by them and that received for collection, as given in evidence by the witness Harris, is not competent to charge the defendants with notice as to whether the paper in controversy was discounted by and belonged to the said Harris & Sons, or was transmitted for collection, unless the jury shall find, from all the evidence in the case, that the defendants had knowledge of such private practice; and in the absence of such knowledge the defendants were authorized to treat such paper according to what it purported on its face, and the general custom of bankers in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, offered in evidence." This prayer contains two propositions; the one relating to the knowledge of defendants of certain private modes of doing business of Harris & Sons, and the other to what the jury were authorized to infer from certain other circumstances in the absence of such knowledge on the part of defendants. The instructions which were given by the court and which are in the record were full and sound on the first of these propositions, and, we think, were all that was necessary on both branches of the prayer. But the second branch of the instruction asked is objectionable because it referred to the jury the interpretation of the indorsement on the paper, and also required of them to determine the case on the face of the paper and the custom of bankers alone, without reference to the special facts proven in regard to the course of dealing between defendants and Harris & Sons. The charge of the court left all these matters of fact to the jury for their consideration after a full and fair statement of all the principles of law which were necessary to a sound verdict.

We see no error in the record, and therefore the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed with costs.

BLAIR v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF MANSFIELD.

(Circuit Court for Ohio: 2 Flippin, 111-115. 1877.)

Opinion by WELKER, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit is brought against the bank upon the following promissory note:

"$5,000.

MANSFIELD, OHIO, August 11, 1873.

"Ninety days after date I promise to pay to the order of R. H. McMann, cashier, five thousand dollars at the First National Bank of Mansfield, in New York exchange. Value received.

WILLARD HICKOX."

Indorsed: 1st. "Pay D. P. Dildine, Esq., cash or order.—R. H. McMann, Cashier."

2d. "Pay J. A. Blair, or order.—D. P. Dildine."

The petition alleged the assignment by R. H. McMann, cashier of the bank, for and on behalf of the bank, to D. P. Dildine, before due and for a valuable consideration, and by said Dildine, before maturity and for a valuable consideration, to the plaintiff, and avers the proper demand and notice on maturity to the First National Bank, etc. The defendant answers, as a defense, that the note was received by the said R. H. McMann without any consideration therefor, and indorsed to Dildine, cashier, without any consideration to said National Bank, and solely as a matter of accommodation for said Hickox; that Hickox was largely indebted to the bank at the time of the execution of said note, and that he and said McMann unlawfully and fraudulently colluded and combined to cheat the bank, and with said purpose and intent Hickox executed the note to McMann, and with said purpose and intent, and without any authority in law or fact therefor, McMann unlawfully and fraudulently indorsed and delivered said note to Dildine without receiving any consideration therefor for said bank. To this answer the plaintiff files a general demurrer. The answer does not deny the assignment and transfer of the note by McMann, cashier, to Dildine, and by Dildine to the plaintiff, before maturity. We may, therefore, in considering the plaintiff's demurrer and the sufficiency of defendant's answer, regard the assignment to have been made before maturity and for valuable consideration paid by the plaintiff. That being so regarded, all that part of the answer as to the consideration of the note, or its assignment to the plaintiff, constitutes no defense to the note in the hands of the plaintiff if he be an innocent holder of the note.

§ 617. A note payable to A., "cashier," is a note payable to the bank.

The answer and demurrer raise two questions for determination: 1st. Whether the note payable to McMann, cashier, is a note payable to the bank? 2d. Whether McMann, as such cashier, had authority to assign the note? As to the first point: The case of Bank of Genessee, 19 N. Y., 313, was a suit on a note payable to "the order of S. B. Stokes, Cash.," at the Bank of New York, and by him indorsed by the name of "S. B. Stokes, Cash." It was held by the court that the note was payable to the bank. Judge Denio in that case says: "In the absence of any evidence to connect the bill with defendant's bank, he would be regarded as the payee and indorser individually, and the abbreviation affixed to his name would be considered as descriptio personæ. But when it has been shown that he was the defendant's cashier, the presumption would be that the note payable in that form was the property of the bank, and when he indorsed it with the addition mentioned, and sent it to the plaintiff in an official letter for discount, it was the same thing as requesting the plaintiff to discount on behalf of the defendant's bank." It was also held in that case, "that there being nothing in the circumstances to put the indorser upon inquiry, and he having discounted the bill in good faith, he was entitled to recover against the bank, although the bill was indorsed for the accommodation of a third party, the bank having no interest in it, but its governing officer authorized the indorsement and application for discount." In 1 Wallace, 234, it is held by the court: "That where negotiable paper is drawn to a person by name with addition of 'cashier' to his name, but with no designation of the particular bank of which he was cashier, parol evidence is allowable to show that he was the cashier of a bank which is plaintiff in the suit, and that in taking the paper he was acting as cashier and agent of that corporation." These cases, I think, settle that the National Bank was the owner of this note, although payable to McMann as cashier, and that it was the paper of the bank.

§ 618. A cashier has authority to assign notes.

2d. Had he authority to transfer and indorse the note? In Morse on Banks and Banking, 151, it is said, in speaking of the powers of a cashier, that "all its negotiable paper he may negotiate and transfer in its behalf, and to this end he may indorse it over, so as to bind the bank like any ordinary indorser on similar paper." Again: "The outside party dealing with him (cashier) in good faith, and without notice of the irregularity, holds the bank as if the transaction had been unobjectionable throughout. For it is the inherent power of the cashier, which he exercises simply by virtue of his office, to make the transfer, and no person can be required, in a case where no circumstances of suspicion put him upon inquiry, to go behind this authority. If the agent exceeds it, the matter lies wholly between himself and principal." See, also, 29 N. Y., 554. Again: "That the cashier, by his indorsement of negotiable paper on behalf of the bank, will always bind the bank to the full extent that any individual indorser of like paper and in like form would be bound, unless the holder of the indorsed paper took it with actual notice of some fact rendering the indorsement irregular and invalid." It will be seen by the authorities that the powers of a cashier are very large. He is the general agent of the bank for all its banking transactions. Whether he have specific authority to do certain things or not, if within the scope of his general duties, the outside world have a right to presume the authority, and his acts bind the bank.

In this case the note was payable to the cashier of the bank, and by him indorsed in the regular course of business, we have a right to presume, to Dildine, cashier of another bank, and by him to the plaintiff. What circumstances of suspicion were there about the transaction to put the plaintiff on his guard that appear in the answer? It is a common practice among banks to receive negotiable paper, and forward, after indorsement by the cashier, to another bank, and there rediscount the same. There is no allegation in the answer that any of the matter therein set up was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, or that there were such circumstances surrounding the transactions therein set forth to put the plaintiff upon inquiry in purchasing the note. The admitted relation of McMann to the bank was such that any person had a right to suppose the transaction was in the usual course of business. In the absence of these facts in the answer, I do not think it a good defense, and the demurrer thereto will be sustained.

CHILDS v. CORP.

(Circuit Court for Vermont: 1 Paine, 285-289. 1810.)

Opinion by LIVINGSTON, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The object of this cross-bill is to have a credit on the mortgage mentioned in the pleadings in this cause, for the amount of a certain bill of exchange for £1,000, which it is alleged has been lost to the complainant by the negligence of the defendant. It appears that on the 29th November, 1803, the defendant sold to the complainant a bill of exchange for £1,000, which had been drawn by Robert Bird & Co of New York, on Bird, Savage & Bird, of London (both houses composed of the same persons), and which had been protested for non-acceptance and non-payment. For this bill the complainant gave the defendant his promissory note for $3,418.79, payable in the July following. The bill remained in the hands of the defendant, who gave his receipt for it, promising to return it to the complainant on due payment of his note. The note not being paid the complainant was sued and judgment obtained against him; after which, to secure the amount of the judgment and some other demands, he gave the defendant three other promissory notes, dated the 8th of October, 1805, for $1,749.93, each payable the 1st of April, 1806, 7 and 8, with interest, and executed a mortgage on certain real estate in Vermont. On the execution of this mortgage the receipt above mentioned was given up, but the bill remained in the defendant's hands, without any written agreement respecting it.

Thus far there is no dispute about facts between the parties. The complainant asserts that he expected the defendant would have delivered him the bill on receiving the new securities, but that he refused to do so, agreeing, however, that he would hold it for his benefit and endeavor to collect the money due thereon for his use; which he neglected to do, to the great loss of the complainant. The defendant admits that the bill remained with him as "a further security for the moneys due from the complainant, until the same were paid by the complainant, or by the receipt of moneys on the bill, which he was authorized to receive and apply toward his demands against the complainant," but denies that "he was obliged to use any endeavors or be at any trouble or expense in endeavoring to collect the bill." Without stating that he had taken any measures to obtain payment, he alleges that he was unable to do so by reason of the insolvency of the parties to it.

It becomes necessary, then, to recur to the testimony, to ascertain the understanding of the parties at the time of leaving this bill with the defendant, which must determine the obligation and duty thereby imposed on him. In settling this question, the defendant's letter of the 9th of April, 1805, to his attorney, Mr. Foote, has been thought material. In this he desires Mr. Foote to take up the receipt he had given to the complainant, adding, "That it was understood, and he meant thereby to have it understood by his attorney and Mr. Childs, that whatever he might recover on said bill should be for his benefit." Without going further, it would be very difficult to say that the defendant was at liberty to be entirely passive about the recovery of the moneys due on this bill of exchange. He resided in the city of New York, and the complainant at Colchester, in Vermont, at the distance of more than three hundred miles from each other. By consenting to retain the bill, and apply what was received on it to the complainant's credit, he put it out of the power of the latter to use any diligence for its recovery. The complainant, without the bill or protest, which was also in the defendant's hands, could not prove any debt, either under the commission against the house in England, or under the separate commission against Robert Bird in this country. He could not but believe that the defendant would do thus much, at least, or return him the bill, to enable him to do it himself. He could not suppose — nor could it have been the intention or understanding of those gentlemen — that the bill was to remain among the papers of the defendant, without a single effort on his part to secure to himself the dividends which might be declared on it — which must have been the sole object of his retaining it. If he found the trouble or expense too great, he should have relinquished his agency, and apprised the complainant of his unwillingness to incur either; and means might then have been taken by the complainant to prevent the loss which it is alleged has happened. But if, from the very nature of the transaction, some diligence was not imposed on the defendant, the testimony of Peaslee and Henry seems to remove every doubt. The first, who was employed by the complainant to come to some arrangement with the defendant, and who is mentioned in his letter to Mr. Foote as the person with whom he had had a good deal of conversation on Mr. Childs' concerns, says that the defendant "retained the bill in his own hands, and that it was an understanding between Mr. Corp and himself, that he was to act upon the bill, and to account to Childs for whatever the bill might net." In another place he says, "He was directed by Mr. Childs to make a regular demand of the bill, but he did not, because Mr. Corp inclined to hold the bill; from whom he understood that he would act for Mr. Childs, and collect what he could of the bill, and account with him for whatever he should collect." The other witness is not less explicit. Mr. Henry says, "That in 1807, two years after the interview between Mr. Corp and Mr. Peaslee, he called on him, at the request of Mr. Childs, and informed him that it was his wish to have the bill, in order to obtain a dividend, which the witness had learned was declared on all the debts of the company; but the defendant declined giving it to him, alleging that he would endeavor to obtain the dividend himself, and would not give out of his hands any security he had."

The court is bound to conclude from this testimony, as well as from the internal evidence of the transaction, that the defendant was considered by the complainant, and was regarded by himself, as his agent to act for him, as the witness expresses it, and to collect what might become due on this bill. Whether he were obliged to sue, or to attach property of the drawers, or not, it is unnecessary to say, because that is not the negligence imputed to him; but the court is of opinion that with the full knowledge which he had of their bankruptcy, it was at least his duty to have used that ordinary diligence and care which no man, however negligent, would have omitted in his own concerns, that of proving the debt, and thus taking a chance of dividends which might be made. This was the only way left to collect anything, and certainly when he promised to act for the complainant, and to endeavor to obtain the dividends, nothing short of this could be a compliance with his engagement. The trouble of such a step would be trifling, and the expense very inconsiderable.

§ 621. Measure of damages for negligence in not collecting bill.

The court, however, does not think with the defendant's counsel, that Mr. Corp has made himself liable for the whole bill, but only for so much of it as shall appear to have been lost by his negligence. Such an indemnity is all the complainant can ask, and beyond this a court of equity will not readily go. It is impossible, however, from any evidence before us to say what credit the complainant is entitled to on his mortgage. The depositions of Mr. McCall and Mr. Henry leave it too uncertain what might have been received without some further inquiry. The court, therefore, before a final decree, thinks it proper to refer it to the master to report what dividends have been declared and paid to persons holding bills of exchange drawn by Robert Bird & Co., in this country, on Bird, Savage & Bird, in England, and not accepted by them, either by the assignees of the latter, or by those of Robert Bird, and to reserve all further directions until the coming in of his report.

§ 622. Generally.—All indorsers or assignors of a writing obligatory or other negotiable paper become equally liable with the original maker or obligor on receiving due notice of the non-payment of the instrument. Campbell v. Jordan, Hemp., 534.

§ 623. Indorser a joint maker.—If an indorser put his name on the back of a note at the time it was made, as surety for the maker, and for his accommodation to give him credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration for which the note was given, he must be considered as a joint maker of the note. Rey v. Simpson,* 22 How., 341.

§ 624. Indorsement before delivery makes the indorser liable as a principal maker. Best v. Hoppie, * 3 Colo. Ty, 187.

§ 625. A person who indorses a note at the request of the payee, before the negotiations in which it is given are closed, is liable as an indorser. Yeager v. Farwell, 13 Wall, 6 (§§ 1027-28.)

§ 626. Accommodation acceptor liable as maker.—An accommodation acceptor for the drawer is deemed the principal and primary debtor as to the holder of the bill; and this, generally, whether he be known as accommodation acceptor or not; but as to the drawer he is a mere surety. In re Babcock, 3 Story, 393. See §§ 5, 278, 364, 498.

§ 627. Stockholders held principal debtors.—Under the charter of the Merchants' and Planters' Bank of Savannah, which provided that the persons and property of the stockholders should at all times be liable, pledged and bound for the redemption of the bills and notes in proportion to the number of shares that each individual might hold, held, that the stockholders were not sureties, but principal debtors. Hatch v. Burrows, 1 Woods, 439.

§ 628. If, under the provisions of the charter of a bank, a stockholder is deemed a principal debtor in proportion to the amount of stock he owns, he is liable to redeem the bills at their face, no matter what the plaintiff paid for them; and the fact that the assignees of the bank had assets in their hands sufficient to pay the bills is no defense to an action against the stockholders, after the bills have been presented to the bank and payment refused. Ibid.

§ 629. Indorsement in blank.—The presumption is that an indorser in blank intended to make himself liable as an indorser of an ordinary negotiable note, and that he is entitled to all the rights of such an indorser. McComber v. Clark, 3 Cr. C. C., 6.

§ 630. Indorser a guarantor.—If an indorser's indorsement was subsequent to the making of a note, and he put his name there at the request of the maker, pursuant to a contract with the payee for further indulgence or forbearance, he can only be held as guarantor. Rey v. Simpson, * 22 How., 341.

§ 631. Joint maker.—A note was upon its face joint and several. Held, that it could not be shown that one of the makers was in fact a surety. Great Western Ins. Co. v. Pierce, * 1 Wyom. Ty, 45.

§ 632. Liability of principal to surety, when contracted.—The liability of principal to surety is contracted when the instrument is signed. In re Perkins, 6 Biss., 185.

§ 633. Where one is only second indorser.—If a note was intended for discount, and an indorser put his name on the back of it with the understanding of all the parties that his indorsement would be inoperative until it was indorsed by the payee, he would then be liable only as second indorser in the commercial sense, and entitled to the privileges of such an indorser. Rey v. Simpson, * 22 How., 341.

§ 634. Special agreement to be liable as indorser.—W. T. & Co., delivered E., an indorser, two notes made by E. and H., payable to W. T. & Co., taking from him a written agreement binding himself, his heirs and executors to pay the two notes "in the same manner and to the same extent in all respects as though the said two promissory notes had been drawn and made payable to my order and by me indorsed to the said W. T. & Co." Held, that E. was liable on this contract the same as if he had indorsed the two notes, the contract having been made for a valuable consideration, i. e., the delivery of the notes. Pinnes v. Ely, * 4 McL., 178.

§ 635. Consideration of guaranty.—Where the consideration of the guaranty was stated to be $1, the guarantor having acknowledged receipt thereof is estopped to deny it. Lawrence v. McCalmont, 2 How., 445.

§ 636. A valuable consideration, however small ($1), or nominal, if given and stipulated for in good faith, is in the absence of fraud sufficient to support an action of guaranty. Ibid.

§ 637. Where one consideration—viz., an extension to a debtor—for a promissory note was legal and another was illegal on account of usury, the former was held sufficient to sustain the contract. Oates v. National Bank, 10 Otto, 239 (§§ 397-404).

§ 638. Interpretation.—A letter of guaranty should receive a fair and reasonable interpretation, so as to effectuate its objects. Lawrence v. McCalmont, 2 How., 445.

§ 639. Notice.—What is reasonable notice to the guarantor of the principal's default is a question for the jury. Ibid.

§ 640. Agreement as to liability; proof of.—In an action against one who had indorsed a note in blank, after protest, held, that parol evidence was admissible to prove an agreement that the defendant should not be liable unless the maker should prove to be insolvent. Taylor v. Scholfield, 2 Cr. C. C., 315.

§ 641. Guaranty construed.—An assignment not in the usual form, but containing an express guaranty or promise by the assignor for the ultimate payment of the note, does not change or vary the assignor's liability from that of an ordinary assignor where no such guaranty is expressed. Dent v. Ashley, * Hemp., 53.

§ 642. Altering guaranty by parol.—A guaranty cannot be altered or contradicted by parol evidence. Clarke v. Russell, * 8 Dal., 415.

§ 643. Letter of introduction not a guaranty.—A general letter, introducing parties "as a house on whose integrity and punctuality the utmost dependence may be placed," and wishing that "you will render them every service in your power," followed by a second letter which referred to the first as "a letter of recommendation," and added, "We have now to request that you will endeavor to render them every assistance in your power," does not amount to a guaranty. Ibid.

§ 644. General rule as to suing maker before assignor.—Assignee must show due diligence in endeavoring to recover from the maker before he can recover from the assignor. He must show that he prosecuted suit against the maker in reasonable time; that execution has been delivered to the proper officer to be served, and that it has been ineffectual. Mandeville v. Mackenzie, * 1 Cr. C. C., 23; Dunlop v. Silver, 1 Cr. C. C., 27; Dean v. Marsteller, * 2 Cr. C. C., 121; Dulany v. Hodgkin, * 5 Cr., 333; Dent v. Ashley, * Hemp., 55. This is the rule in Virginia and Kentucky. Bank of U. S. v. Weisiger, * 2 Pet., 331; McIver v. Kennedy, 1 Cr. C. C., 424. Also in Indiana. Morgan v. Tipton, 3 McL., 330. See, also, Lemmons v. Choteau, * Hemp., 85.

§ 645. Under the Kentucky statute notes pass by assignment instead of indorsement, and the assignee cannot recover from his assignor unless he uses all legal process and due diligence to recover from the maker. What is due diligence as to maker stated. Bank of United States v. Tyler, * 4 Pet., 366.

§ 646. The time intervening between issuing execution and placing it in the marshal's hands was thirty-one days, and the time from the return of one to the issuing of another execution was thirty days. Held, due diligence. Ibid.

§ 647. Where the maker of a note is wrongfully released from prison by the jailer, the assignee must sue the jailer and his sureties before he can resort to the assignor. Ibid.

§ 648. That the maker is an unsettled and transient person, without averring insolvency, will not excuse the holder from using due diligence. Lemmons v. Choteau, * Hemp., 85.

§ 649. The fact that the indorser has been secured by pledge of collaterals will not excuse the holder from prosecuting the maker to insolvency. Dulany v. Hodgkin, * 5 Cr., 333.

§ 650. The assignee of a bond or note is bound to use due diligence by suit to recover the debt from the maker of the note, before he can resort to the assignor, unless it is unnecessary or impossible to sue the obligor by reason, for example, of his notorious insolvency or removal from the state. If the assignee show merely a bare demand of the maker it is not enough to prove diligence. He should have instituted suit without delay against the maker, held him to bail, if bail was demandable, and have pursued him to insolvency by taking him upon a ca. sa. Dent v. Ashley, * Hemp., 55.

§ 651. It is not essential to due diligence that the assignee take out execution returnable on a rule day against the maker. United States v. Tyler, * 4 Pet., 366.

§ 652. The Indiana statute provides that the indorsee of a note shall have recourse against the indorser only after "having used due diligence in the premises." Held, that the indorsee of a note secured by mortgage on lands in another state need not exhaust that security before he sues the indorser. Swigget v. Seymour, * 4 Biss., 220.

§ 653. The insolvency of the maker obviates the necessity of suing him before suing an indorser. Martin v. Cole, 14 Otto, 30 (§§ 235-237).

§ 654. Where it is the duty of the holder to sue an indorser before an action on the note is barred against the maker, by limitation or prescription, so that the indorser may, if he choose, bring such action against the maker, the holder satisfies the requirements of the law and makes a legal demand by commencing an action against the indorser before the time of limitation or prescription expires, although the trial of such action may not be held until after it expires. Bird v. Louisiana State Bank, 3 Otto, 96 (§§ 1059-1061).

§ 655. Request to sue; non-compliance.—If the holder of a note past due be requested to proceed against the maker, but neglect to do so until the principal becomes insolvent, the surety will not be held liable. Martin v. Skehan, * 2 Colo. T'y, 614.

§ 656. Bank charter; necessity of suing maker obviated by.—Under the charter of the Bank of Alexandria, it is not necessary to sue the maker of a note in order to create a right of action against the indorser. Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, 1 Cr. C. C., 168; Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cr., 49.

§ 657. Insolvency of maker; evidence of; discharge from prison.—Where the drawer is discharged from imprisonment for debt under an insolvent act, such discharge is sufficient evidence of insolvency to excuse delay or even neglect in getting out execution against his person or property, even though the creditor did not insist upon the thirty days' imprisonment made by the statute a precedent to discharge of the debtor from prison. Bank of the United States v. Weisiger, * 2 Pet., 331.

§ 658. Where promissory notes were guaranteed by persons whose names did not appear thereon, it was held that the guarantors were not exonerated by want of notice of the maker's default if he was insolvent when the notes matured. Reynolds v. Douglass, 12 Pet., 497.

§ 659. Creditor taking note as conditional payment; duty; delay.—A debtor gave a note of a third person to his creditor. The creditor refused to accept it in satisfaction of the debt, but agreed to hold it and to credit whatever should be paid upon it to the debtor. It was sent to the bank where it was payable, but was not paid, and was kept by the bank until the maker became insolvent. Held, that the creditor was not negligent and chargeable with the loss of the note, the debtor having knowledge of, and acquiescing in, his disposition of the note. Westphal v. Ludlow, 2 McC., 506.

§ 660. Bailee of draft; diligence to collect it.—The bailee of a draft, whether for pay or to collect it, must use due diligence to collect it. He will be liable for negligence. 8 Op. Att'y Gen., 125.

§ 661. Borrower of note; negligence of.—If A. loan the note of a third person to B., B. must use due diligence to recover the amount due by it; and if the debt is lost by the insolvency of the maker and by B.'s want of diligence, B. must pay the amount of the note to A. Higbie v. Hopkins, 1 Wash., 230.

§ 662. Conditional payment; diligence required.—One who receives a note as a conditional payment of a debt due him must use due diligence to collect it of the parties thereto at maturity, otherwise by his laches the debt will be discharged. But he is not bound to bring suit upon the note. Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet., 114.

§ 663. Taking the promissory note of a third person as a conditional payment for goods sold and delivered, and the institution of a suit against the vendee upon his indorsement, does not preclude an action by the vendor upon the original consideration until suit against the maker of the note. It is sufficient if he has used due diligence to receive the money on the note. Clark v. Young, 1 Cr., 181.

§ 664. Discharge of maker releases surety.—The consent of the holder of a note to the discharge of the maker, if without the permission of the surety, releases the latter. In re McDonald,* 14 N. B. R., 477.

§ 665. The guarantor of a note, the holder of which has forfeited his right to prove his claim against the estate of the maker, a bankrupt, by his attempt to obtain and hold a fraudulent preference, cannot prove against the estate, he being already exonerated by the act of the creditor. In re Ayres, 6 Biss., 48.

§ 666. Prior indorser; release of.—The release of a prior indorser by the holder discharges all the subsequent indorsers. Hawkins v. Thompson,* 2 McL., 111.

§ 667. Extension; release of surety.—To constitute an extension there must be a valid contract which the court would enforce in favor of the principal against the creditor. Ex parte Balch,* 2 Low., 440.

§ 668. The taking of new security by the holder of a promissory note, and giving time to the maker, if done without the consent of the indorser, discharges him from liability on the note. Bank of United States v. Lee, 3 Cr. C. C., 288; White v. Burns, 5 Cr. C. C., 123; Cope v. Hunt, 4 Cr. C. C., 293.

§ 669. Extension effects a release whether there was damage or not. Ex parte Balch,* 2 Low., 440.

§ 670. Extension in consideration of a third person's acceptance releases indorsers. Cooper v. Gibbs,* 4 McL., 396.

§ 671. Agreement in consideration that the maker would assign to the holder the amount due the holder on the note out of a judgment that the maker expected to obtain in a short time, that the holder would give time on the note and not bring suit until after the next court; and time was accordingly given. Held, a release of the surety. Varnum v. Milford,* 2 McL., 74.

§ 672. Taking new security; release.—The maker of a note transferred all his interest in his firm to his accommodation indorser to secure him against loss, the indorser agreeing in consideration of such transfer to save the maker harmless from liability on the note. Held, a release of the maker and an intervening indorser. In re Wilder,* 3 Fed. R., 859.

§ 673. A. was lessor of a plantation. B., the lessee, borrowed of C. money on notes, to secure which it was agreed that the cotton raised on the plantation should be shipped to the complainant C., nothing being said as to what was to be done by C. with it or its proceeds. Further security was given C. by a mortgage executed by A. The notes were partly paid. The next season C. made B. additional advances, secured by deed of trust of all the crops to be raised, which stipulated that the proceeds of such crops should be applied, (1) to paying for supplies furnished the second season, and (2) to paying the balance due on the notes. Complainant sought to foreclose. A. set up in defense that the first agreement provided that all the crops of cotton raised on the demised premises should be applied to the payment of the notes, and that the cotton should be shipped to the complainant by B. for that purpose as rapidly as it could be prepared for market; that the second agreement was in fraud of the first, and released A. as a surety, since it diverted a portion of the crops to a different purpose from that originally intended. The agreement as set up by B. in defense was not proved, however, and it was held that to release A. as surety a subsequent agreement between his principal and the creditor must be shown that placed the surety in a worse condition than when he became surety; that such agreement not being proved, the subsequent arrangement and the deed of trust had no effect on the liability of A., the mortgagor. Roach v. Summers, * 20 Wall., 165.

§ 674. Agreement to postpone prosecution; release.—An agreement by the holder to postpone the prosecution of a suit against the maker, in consideration of his permitting one A., whom he had confined to the jail limits on a ca. sa., to go outside of such limits to testify in another suit of the holder against third parties, is a release of an indorser. United States Bank v. Hatch, * 1 McL., 90.

§ 675. Extension by renewal; release.—Payment of a note was duly demanded and refused. Notice was given to the payee, who was also the first indorser, for the accommodation of the maker and another. Afterwards an arrangement was made with the holder and the subsequent indorsers, without the consent of the accommodation indorser, to prolong the credit on the note, and to discount, by way of renewal, bills drawn by the maker and one of the indorsers, and accepted for the amount of the original note. Held, that the accommodation indorser was discharged. Seventh Ward Bank v. Hanrick, * 2 Story, 416.

§ 676. Extension after judgment no release.—After judgment the relation of principal and surety which existed before judgment between the maker and indorser of a note ceases, both the note and the contract of indorsement becoming merged in the judgment; and a creditor who, after judgment against the maker and indorser, gives time to the maker does not thereby release the indorser. King v. Thompson, * 3 Cr. C. C., 146.

§ 677. After judgment rendered in favor of the indorsee of a negotiable instrument, against both maker and indorser, the latter becomes liable as a principal debtor. He may pay the judgment and become subrogated to the rights of the indorsee under the judgment against the maker. If the indorsee has got out an execution against the maker on his judgment and then countermands the order to levy it, this does not release the indorser from liability, for the indorsee has a right to control the execution against either the indorser or the maker without reference to the wishes of either. It might be different, however, if the indorsee had agreed with the indorser to levy execution immediately against the maker, but should neglect to do so, thereby throwing the indorser off his guard and causing him to lose an opportunity to make the money out of the maker's estate, by paying the judgment and proceeding himself under it against the maker. Lenox v. Prout, * 3 Wheat., 520.

§ 678. Where the indorsee of a note secured by mortgage, having obtained judgment against the maker, granted him two years' indulgence, it was held to release the indorsers. Morgan v. Tipton, 3 McL., 339.

§ 679. The holder of a note, after obtaining judgment against the maker, and after execution, and before the return day, in consideration that the maker would pay $100, agreed to extend the time until the ensuing fall. Held, not to release the surety. The maker being bound to pay the whole of the judgment, the payment of $100 upon it constituted no legal consideration, and the agreement for the extension being a nudum pactum did not release the surety. Low v. Underhill, * 8 McL., 376.

§ 680. Extension with the indorser's assent, or reserving his right to sue maker.—An extension given a maker by a holder will release an indorser, but not if the indorser assent to it, nor if the extension be granted with an express reservation of the indorser's rights to sue the maker. Eldredge v. Chacon, * Crabbe, 296.

§ 681. An assignment by a maker for the benefit of creditors, containing an extension, and signed by an indorser, will not operate to release such indorser from liability on the note, especially if it be scheduled by the maker in his assignment as a preferred claim to be first paid. Ibid.

§ 682. After demand and notice the indorser is not discharged by giving time to the maker. The Bank v. Abbott, * 3 Cr. C. C., 94; Corbett v. Woodward, 5 Saw., 403.

§ 683. Forbearance to sue, no release.—Forbearance to sue will not release the indorser, unless an agreement for delay for a definite time is made upon a good consideration which deprives the holder of the right to sue on the note. Varnum v. Bellamy, * 4 McL., 87.

§ 684. A mere agreement with the drawers for delay, without any consideration for it, and without any communication or assent of the indorser, is not a discharge of the latter after he has been fixed in his responsibility by refusal of the drawee and due notice to himself. McLemore v. Powell, * 12 Wheat., 557.

§ 685. Agreement to stay execution held no release.— An attorney, to collect a note, took from the maker a confession of judgment, with a stay of execution until the second term. It was proved that, had the attorney brought suit upon the note, he could not have recovered judgment and issued execution, under the practice of the court, until the second term thereof after commencing suit. Held, not such an indulgence to the maker as would release an indorser, especially as no authority was given to the attorney to give an extension, and especially as the indorser had waived his right to object by consenting to the attorney's proceedings. Suydam v. Vance, * 2 McL., 99. Citing Hallett v. Holmes, 18 Johns., 28; Bruen v. Marquand, 17 Johns., 58.

§ 686. Attorney; agreement not to sue; held not a release.— An attorney is not authorized to agree not to sue upon a note in consideration of receiving from the maker a small sum of money to be applied upon it and a number of debts due the maker, with authority to collect them and apply the proceeds upon the note. Varnum v. Bellamy, * 4 McL., 87.

§ 687. Giving chattel mortgage, no release.— Sureties on a note are not released by the giving of a chattel mortgage by their principal, such mortgage not extending the time of paying the note. Meguiar v. Groves, * 1 Fed. R., 279.

§ 688. Extension after discharge of maker in bankruptcy.— An extension, given the maker after his discharge in bankruptcy, will not release a surety. Fernan v. Woodruff, 5 McL., 350.

§ 689. Guaranty of third person.— The guaranty of a third party to pay the note does not discharge the indorser. Corbett v. Woodward, 5 Saw., 403.

§ 690. Delay of trustee to sell security, no release.— The trustee in a deed of trust given to secure a note did not sell the property till it had depreciated so as to become inadequate security. Demand and proper notice having been given, held, that the indorser was not released. Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, 2 Cr. C. C., 5.

§ 691. Partner's note to his firm; surety's liability.— One-half of a note made by F. to his own firm of M. & F., upon dissolution belongs to him, and the liability of his sureties would be lessened one-half. McMicken v. Webb, * 6 How., 292.

§ 692. Forbearance after levy.— After judgment against makers and levy of execution on their property they executed a delivery bond and the property was released. The condition of the bond having been broken, a second fi. fa. was issued and levied upon property which, however, was not sold, by order of plaintiff's attorney, until some time afterwards, and then only a small part of the note was realized. Held, that the forbearance, being without consideration and terminable at any time, did not release the sureties. Creath v. Sims, 5 How., 192.

§ 693. Surety; subrogation — indemnity — concurrent remedies.— A surety who seeks relief by requiring the creditor to proceed against the principal must offer to indemnify the creditor in his proceedings against the principal, and must offer to pay whatever the principal fails to pay under the creditor's proceedings. The creditor (holder of a bill) may proceed in bankruptcy against the drawee, and may also attach property of the drawers until he has recovered the whole of his debt. Any surplus over his debt obtained by the attachment suit will go to the estate of the bankrupt, and the creditor, if he does not pursue the attachment suit himself, is bound to allow the bankrupt's assignee to do so for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate. In re Babcock, 3 Story, 393.

§ 694. Set-off.— A. and B. were accommodation makers, indorsers or acceptors of various bills for the benefit of C. They were not, however, co-sureties, although B. had undertaken to accommodate C. upon the express understanding that he was to incur no liability; but this was not communicated to, or agreed to by, A. B. made a bill for the accommodation of C., which was discounted, and the proceeds applied to pay another bill on which A. was liable as an accommodation acceptor. Held, that B. did not thereby acquire a right of action against A.; and when A. sued B. on a bill of which B. was acceptor, but which A., being an accommodation indorser upon it, had paid, that B. could not set off the bill he had paid against A. There is no presumption that several accommodation parties are co-sureties for each other. On the contrary the law is well settled that all the parties upon accommodation paper are to be treated as parties to business paper, and subject to the strict principles of commercial law applying to such paper; and that where there is no agreement to the contrary, the legal conclusion is that each party stands in the same relation to the others as on business paper. Robinson v. Kilbreth, * 1 Bond, 592.

§ 695. Contribution.— Unless there is a contract so to do, an accommodation indorser is not bound to contribute with an accommodation maker to pay a note made for the benefit of a third person. Law v. Stewart, * 3 Cr. C. C., 411; McCarty v. Roots, * 21 How., 432. But see McDonald v. Magruder, 3 Cr. C. C., 298; Magruder v. McDonald, * 3 Cr. C. C., 299.

§ 696. Successive indorsers.— Successive indorsers of commercial paper are not liable for contribution. McCarty v. Roots, * 21 How., 432.

§ 697. Collateral promises to pay.—A promise to pay a bill when able to do so must be accepted by the promisee with an agreement on his part to wait. He loses his right to proceed upon this promise if he sues upon the bill before the promisor is able to pay it. Craig v. Brown,* 3 Wash., 508.

§ 698. An indorser is not bound by a promise to pay where the promise is made in ignorance of the fact that he has been discharged. Good v. Sprigg,* 2 Cr. C. C., 172.

§ 699. Indorsers of a demand note discharged by failure to demand payment of it within a reasonable time are not bound by a new promise to pay it, unless it be made with a knowledge of all material facts affecting their rights. Martin v. Winslow, 2 Mason, 241 (§§ 786, 787).

§ 700. A bill of exchange not being paid at maturity, the drawer agreed to pay it as soon as he should be able, if the holder would give him time. Held, that the extension was a new consideration, sufficient to uphold the promise, upon which assumpsit was maintainable. Lonsdale v. Brown, 4 Wash., 149.

§ 701. Where an accommodation indorser, after the note became due, promised to pay it, held, that the promise applied exclusively to the note, and could not be used in support of a count for money had and received. Page v. Bank of Alexandria,* 7 Wheat., 35. See §§ 5, 278, 364, 498, 626.

§ 702. Sale of note taken in payment for goods.—If a vendor take a note of his vendee, without agreeing to receive it in satisfaction, and then transfers the note, he exposes the vendee to a responsibility to pay it to the holder, which, so long as it continues, is a bar to an action against the vendee on the original contract of sale, upon which the vendor can sue only after getting back the note, and having it in his power to return it to the vendee. Parker v. United States, Pet. C. C., 262.

§ 703. A principal may sue on a bill indorsed to his agent; if the rule were otherwise, there would be an exception in favor of the United States. United States v. Barker,* 1 Paine, 156.

§ 704. Returning bill to remitter.—If the holder of a bill, whether as agent or creditor of the remitter, send it back to the latter, the party to whom it is thus sent may not only sue in his own name, but may at the trial strike out his own subsequent indorsement, and fill up all the preceding blank indorsements, so as to make them correspond with the title set forth in his declaration. Ibid.

§ 705. The return of a bill to an indorser, with protest for non-acceptance and non-payment, is presumptive evidence that the indorsees who thus return the bill were merely agents to collect it, and the indorser to whom it is returned may sue upon it, although no re-indorsement to him is made. Dugan v. United States,* 3 Wheat., 172; United States v. Barker,* 1 Paine, 156.

§ 706. The holder having a right by law to recover on a bill from the indorser, evidence of a custom in the trade between this country and England, that the English merchant must return it immediately on protest to the indorser, and that if he call upon the drawer for payment he exonerates the indorser, is inadmissible. The law being settled, evidence of a contrary usage is not competent. Brown v. Jackson,* 2 Wash., 24.

§ 707. Parol agreement as to liability of indorser.—Where a note is payable to order, and the payee indorses it after dishonor, he is entitled to demand and notice; and in an action by a remote indorsee, he cannot prove an agreement with his immediate indorsee that he was not to be liable as indorser. Cox v. Jones,* 2 Cr. C. C., 370.

§ 708. Trustee for bank not liable as indorser.—An act of congress prohibited national banks from loaning money and taking mortgage security therefor. The A. National Bank, being desirous of loaning B. money, agreed that B. should make his note and mortgage therefor to C., who should indorse the note to the bank, and thereby transfer to it the mortgage. This was done and the bank subsequently sued C. as indorser. Held, that he was merely the trustee of the bank and not liable as an indorser, having indorsed the note solely for the convenience of the bank and without consideration. National Bank of Rising Sun v. Brush,* 6 Fed. R., 132.

§ 709. Special agreement as to liability.—An agreement made by the president and cashier of a bank with an indorser, that the signing of his name is mere matter of form and that he will not be held liable, does not bind the bank. United States Bank v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51.

§ 710. Attorney's agreement not to hold indorser on — Judgment.—In an action against the maker the indorser believed he had a good defense to the note, but was assured by the plaintiff's attorney that the maker had ample means out of which to make the amount of the note, and that if he (the indorser) would confess judgment on the note he (the attorney) would proceed at once to make the amount out of the assets of the maker. The indorser confessed judgment as desired, but the plaintiff neglected to proceed against the maker. Held, that the attorney had authority so to stipulate with the indorser, and that the plaintiff was barred from proceeding against the indorser. Union Bank v. Garey, 5 Pet., 90; Garey v. Union Bank, 3 Cr., 238.

§ 711. Agreement construed.—A. indorsed B.'s bill of exchange on C. in London to D., and wrote D. as follows: "On receiving advice of the acceptance by C. of B.'s bill of exchange on said C. in favor of and indorsed by me to you for £394 sterling, please pay to S. and H. (creditors of A.) or order, such balance as may be due to me on account of the above bill after deducting therefrom the $300 advanced to me by you on account thereof." D. accepted this order thus: "The amount due me is $289.25 for premium of insurance, $583.70 balance per account current, and $500 advanced you in Philadelphia; in all $1,373.04, which being deducted out of the proceeds of the bill on London, I promise to account for the balance to the above mentioned gentlemen." Held, that this acceptance, being only a promise to pay out of the proceeds of the bill, and it not being in fact paid, H. could not sustain an action against D. for the money. The bill not being paid, the promise to pay out of its proceeds was at an end. Subsequently D. wrote A. that "as soon as the fate of the bill is decided I will account with your creditors in due time," adding in a postscript, "as E. is responsible for the bill in London, I shall charge the amount to him, and be responsible for the same to your creditors." Held, that one of these promises of payment being conditional and the other appearing to be absolute, they were so inconsistent as to require the court to construe them to ascertain their meaning, and they were construed to mean that D. would account to the creditors for the proceeds of the bill in case it should be paid by the drawee; or if not, that D. would charge the bill to E. if, as the writer supposed, he was responsible for the same; and in that event, also, D. would himself become responsible to the creditors of A. It turned out that E. was not responsible for the bill and D. was not on this ground held liable. Hutz v. Karthause,* 4 Wash., 1.

§ 712. Authority to collect.—A valid power of attorney is sufficient to authorize the attorney to place the name of his principal (the payee of a draft) upon the back of it, and to receive the money upon it. Kimbro v. First Nat. Bank,* 1 MacArth., 415. As to collection agents, see AGENCY, VII.; BANKS, VIII.

§ 713. Agent to collect; negligence in not suing; insolvency excuses.—Where a bill is given to an agent to collect, and he is sued for the amount of it, he shows sufficient diligence and excuses his failure to collect it by proving that the acceptor was insolvent when the bill matured. Thomas v. Page,* 8 McL., 167.

§ 714. In the discount, collection, negotiation and transaction of business in reference to notes and bills, branch banks sustain the relation of agents of a common principal—i. e., the parent bank, which may limit or control their agency according to its own pleasure. United States Bank v. Goddard, 5 Mason, 366 (§§ 1012-17).

VI. DEMAND.

SUMMARY—Note must be presented, § 715.—Draft on a bank in another city, § 716.—By clerk of notary, § 717.—Death of maker; indorser becoming administrator, § 718.—Days of grace, §§ 719-725.—Note falling due on Sunday, § 726.—Payable after sight, § 727.—Payable on demand, § 728.—Delay in presenting sight draft, § 729; or checks and drafts generally, § 730.—Place of demand, §§ 731-735.—Personal demand, §§ 736-738, 744.—Opinion of clerk that drawee will accept; diligence in giving notice, § 739.—Excused by a state of war, § 740.—Drawer of check having no right to draw, §§ 741, 742.—Check paid with a draft, § 743.—Averments of demand and notice, §§ 744, 745.

§ 715. Where a notary makes demand he must present the paper whose payment he is demanding, and his protest must recite such presentment, else it will not be admissible to prove presentment. Musson v. Lake. §§ 746, 747.

§ 716. A check drawn on a bank in another city should be presented, not by mail, but by express. The holder should not take a draft in payment of it instead of cash, and if he does so he takes the draft at his own risk, and if it is not paid, he cannot sue the drawer of the check for the value of the goods the check was given for. Farwell v. Curtis, §§ 748-750.

§ 717. Although usage in London and Liverpool authorizes the clerk of a notary to make demand of a note, yet the law does not, strictly speaking, allow him to do so. In any case the protest must be made by the notary, and if by the clerk in the name of the notary, the protest is invalid. Sacridor v. Brown, § 751. See § 830.

§ 718. If the maker of a note die before it matures, and an indorser become his administrator, demand must be made upon the indorser as administrator, in order to sustain an action against him as indorser. Magruder v. Union Bank of Georgetown, §§ 752, 753.

§ 719. By the common law money payable by contract is due on the last day named, and the promisor has until the last hour of the day to pay in. But the custom of commerce with reference to negotiable paper extends the time by giving three days' grace, but requiring payment during business hours of the last day. This custom varies according to usage. A usage allowing four days of grace existing in the banks of a city for twenty or twenty-five years, and generally known and acquiesced in, is good, and a demand need not be made until the fourth day. And although such custom should be pleaded, yet if proof of it is made without objection, the lack of an averment of such custom cannot be made available after judgment. Renner v. Bank of Columbia, §§ 754-759. See § 841.

§ 720. Parties are presumed to draw bills in reference to the usage, as to time of presentment for payment, of the bank where they make their bills payable. A usage to present bills on the fourth day after maturity is valid and applies as well to promissory notes. Bank of Washington v. Triplett, §§ 760-768.

§ 721. Payment of a time bill never presented for acceptance ought to be demanded on the last day of grace. A demand of payment previous to that day will not authorize a protest. This rule is the same whether the bill has been presented for acceptance or not. Ibid.

§ 722. Presentment presumed to have been made at the proper hours of a day. Wiseman v. Chiapella, §§ 769-772.

§ 723. Evidence of a usage of merchants, as to presenting foreign bills of exchange, is competent to show their understanding of what is reasonable time. Wallace v. Agry, §§ 773-776.

§ 724. A bank changed its usage by holding paper discounted until the fourth day of grace, and then making demand, and, where the fourth day came on Sunday, demand was postponed until Monday. Only four instances of such presentation on Monday were shown, and no notice of the usage was shown to have been given. Held, not a good usage, and a delay until Monday not due diligence. Adams v. Otterback, §§ 777-780.

§ 725. Payment must be demanded upon the day when the note or bill falls due. Mitchell v. Degrand, §§ 781-784.

§ 726. If a note or bill falls due on Sunday, demand and notice should be given on the preceding Saturday. Doremus v. Burton, § 785.

§ 727. Where a bill is payable a certain number of days after sight, the time begins to run from the date of legal presentment and acceptance, and not from the date upon which information may be casually given the drawee of the existence of the bill. Mitchell v. Degrand, §§ 781-784.

§ 728. A note payable on demand must be presented within a reasonable time, or its indorsers will be discharged. What is a reasonable time is a question of fact for the jury. Martin v. Winslow, §§ 786, 787.

§ 729. Though there must be no unreasonable delay in presenting a sight draft for acceptance, yet this is a matter governed by the course of trade, and the circumstances of each particular case. Whether a detainer in Boston of a bill drawn on London at sixty days' sight from the 6th of July to the 29th of September was unreasonable or not, held a question for the jury. Wallace v. Agry, §§ 773-776.

§ 730. It is laches to delay presentment of a check or draft for beyond a day, where holder and drawee both reside in the same place. Farwell v. Curtis, §§ 748-750.

§ 731. Presentment of a bill of exchange for payment at the acceptor's place of business is sufficient, although it be closed and no one is present. Wiseman v. Chiapella, §§ 769-772.

§ 732. It is no longer required, where an acceptor has removed from town, to make an effort to find out his place of business or residence in order to make demand. Ibid.

§ 733. Where a note is silent as to the place of demand, parol evidence is admissible to show an agreement to make demand at a particular bank. Brent v. Bank of Metropolis, §§ 788-791.

§ 734. A demand of payment made at a hotel without explanation is not sufficient. Adams v. Otterback, §§ 777-780.

§ 735. A bill of exchange was addressed "To Messrs. Cox & Cowan, New York, N. Y.," who wrote across its face "Accepted; Cox & Cowan," without otherwise indicating where it should be presented for payment. The drawer, acceptors and indorser resided in Kentucky, and the bill was drawn, accepted and indorsed there. The acceptors' place of business was also in Kentucky, but they frequently resorted, for business purposes, to a place in New York, and the bill was presented for payment and protested for non-payment at that place, although a bill naming no place of payment should ordinarily have been presented to them for payment at their Kentucky place of business. Held, that the bill being addressed to the drawees at New York, and accepted by them without explanation or condition, the law construes the instrument as having become payable at the place designated by the address as the place where the acceptance took place, and that a presentment and protest at the place in New York, frequented by the acceptors, was sufficient. Cox v. National Bank, §§ 792-800.

§ 736. A personal demand need not be made on the maker of a note purporting to be payable at a particular bank. Brent v. Bank of the Metropolis, §§ 788-791.

§ 737. The facts that the indorsers were active in procuring the accommodation for the maker; that it had been continued for years without a personal demand on the maker; that it was the usage of the bank, when the maker of an accommodation note resided out of the city, to require as a condition of the loan that a demand at the bank should be sufficient; that this accommodation would have been continued only on this condition, and that the note purported to be payable at the bank, are sufficient to show an agreement to dispense with a personal demand on the maker. Ibid.

§ 738. A removal of the maker from the state or jurisdiction in which he resides and in which his note is payable excuses the holder from making actual demand upon him for payment. M'Gruder v. Bank of Washington, §§ 801, 802.

§ 739. Where a bill is presented for acceptance, and the drawee's clerk informs the holder that the drawee is absent upon military duty, but expresses the opinion that the bill will be accepted, the holder is not bound to treat this as a non-acceptance of the bill. He may properly wait until next day as a reasonable time to ascertain the intentions of the drawee, and such delay will not be deemed laches on his part. But if he elects to consider the bill as dishonored, and protests it for non-acceptance, he is bound by that act, and must give no notice by the next practicable mail to the parties whom he means to charge for the default. If no such notice is given, the drawer is released from all liability, although on the next day the holder sees the drawee, who then accepts the bill. Mitchell v. Degrand, §§ 781-784.

§ 740. A holder of negotiable paper is relieved by a state of war from the obligation to make demand upon the maker when the paper matures. It is necessary, however, for the holder, in order to charge an indorser of such paper, to make demand upon the maker within a reasonable time after it becomes possible by the close of the war. But he will be excused even then from making demand on the maker, if the maker has provided the indorser with funds to pay the paper. The indorser in such case becomes the principal debtor, to charge whom demand is not necessary. Whether the maker's funds are placed in the indorser's hands for the purpose of being applied to pay the note or bill, is a question of fact. So held where they were funds of the maker derived by the indorser from assets of a firm, of which himself and the indorser were partners. Ray v. Smith, §§ 803-806.

§ 741. Viewing a check in the light of a bill of exchange, a drawer who has no funds in bank, and no right to draw a check upon it, cannot complain of want of due presentment or want of due notice. In re Brown, §§ 807-811.

§ 742. One who has in the hands of the drawee but a part of the funds necessary to meet his draft, and no reasonable expectation of the drawee's paying his draft, has no right to presentment or notice of non-payment. Ibid.

§ 743. A check paid with a draft may be considered as dishonored. Farwell v. Curtis, §§ 748-750.

§ 744. A declaration against indorsers on a note must aver either a personal demand on the maker, or an agreement excusing a personal demand on him. An averment of demand at a particular bank, where the note was payable, is, after verdict and judgment, a sufficient averment of an excuse for not making personal demand. Brent v. Bank of the Metropolis, §§ 788-791.

§ 745. Averments of presentment and protest for non-acceptance, and of notice of same to the drawers, are sufficient to maintain an action on the bill. If the declaration also avers presentment for payment, protest for non-payment, and notice thereof, such averments are surplusage and need not be proved. Wallace v. Agry, §§ 773-776.

MUSSON v. LAKE.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE M'KINLEY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— The plaintiffs brought an action of assumpsit, in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi, against the defendant, as indorser of a bill of exchange, drawn at Vicksburg, in said state, by Steele, Jenkins & Co., for $6,133, payable twelve months after the 1st day of February, 1837, to R. H. and J. H. Crump, and addressed to Kirkman, Rosser & Co., at New Orleans, and by them afterwards accepted, and indorsed by the payees and the defendant. On the trial of the cause the plaintiffs offered to read as evidence to the jury a protest of the bill of exchange, to the reading of which the defendant objected, because it did not appear in the protest that the notary had presented the bill to the acceptors, or either of them, when he demanded payment thereof. And upon the question whether the protest ought to be read to the jury as evidence of a presentment of the bill to the acceptors for payment, or as evidence of the dishonor of the bill, the judges were opposed in opinion. Which division of opinion they ordered to be certified to this court; and upon that certificate the question is now before us for determination.

§ 746. A protest that does not recite presentment is not admissible to prove demand.

The indorser of a bill of exchange, whether payable after date or after sight, undertakes that the drawee will pay it, if the holder present it to him at maturity and demand payment; and if he refuse to pay it, and the holder cause it to be protested, and due notice to be given to the indorser, then he promises to pay it. All these conditions enter into and make part of the contract between these parties to a foreign bill of exchange; and the law imposes the performance of them upon the holder as conditions precedent to the liability of the indorser of the bill. A presentment to and demand of payment must be made of the acceptor personally, at his place of business or his dwelling. Story on Bills, § 325. Bankruptcy, insolvency, or even the death of the acceptor, will not excuse the neglect to make due presentment; and in the latter case it should be made to the personal representatives of the deceased. Chitty on Bills, 7th London ed., 246, 247; Story on Bills, 360; 5 Taunt., 30; 12 Wend., 439; 2 Doug., 515; Warrington v. Furber, 8 East, 245; Esdaile v. Sowerby, 11 East, 117; 14 East, 500. The reasons why presentment should be made to the drawee are, first, that he may judge of the genuineness of the bill; secondly, of the right of the holder to receive the contents; and thirdly, that he may obtain immediate possession of the bill upon paying the amount. And the acceptor has a right to see that the person demanding payment has a right to receive it, before he is bound to answer whether he will pay it or not; for, notwithstanding his acceptance, it may have passed into other hands before its maturity. And he, as well as the drawee, has a right to the possession of the bill, upon paying it, to be used as a voucher in the settlement of accounts with the drawer. Story on Bills, § 361; Hansard v. Robinson, 7 Barn. & Cress., 90. Mr. Justice Story has given the form of a protest now in use in England, in his treatise on bills of exchange, by which it will be seen that the words "did exhibit said bill" are used, and a blank is left to be filled up with "the presentment, and to whom made, and the reason, if assigned, for non-payment." Story on Bills, 302, note. This, with the authorities already referred to, shows that the protest should set forth the presentment of the bill, the demand of payment, and the answer of the drawee or acceptor. The holder of the bill is the proper person to make the presentment of it for payment or acceptance. Story on Bills, § 360. But the law makes the notary his agent for the purpose of presenting the bill, and doing whatever the holder is bound to do to fix the liability of the indorser. Everything, therefore, that he does in the performance of this duty must appear distinctly in his protest. He is the officer of a foreign government; the proceeding is ex parte; and the evidence contained in the protest is credited in all foreign courts. Chitty on Bills, 215; Rogers v. Stephens, 2 Term R., 713; Brough v. Parkings, 2 Ld. Raym., 993; Orr v. Maginnis, 7 East, 359; Chesmer v. Noyes, 4 Camp., 129. The evidence contained in the protest must, therefore, stand or fall upon its own merits. It rests upon the same footing with parol evidence; and if it fails to make full proof of due diligence on the part of the plaintiff, it must be rejected.

But the counsel for the plaintiffs insists that the statute of Louisiana, and the interpretation given to it by the supreme court of that state in the case of Nott v. Beard, 16 La., 308, have so changed the law merchant as to render unnecessary the presentment of a foreign bill for payment. After a careful examination of the opinion of the court in that case, we are unable to perceive any intention manifested to depart from the settled usages of the law merchant; but, on the contrary, they attempt by argument and authority to bring the case within that law. The question before that court was the identical question now before us. The protest was objected to because it did not show that the bill had been presented by the notary to the acceptors for payment. To this objection, that court said it might perhaps have been more specific, if, in the protest, it had been stated that the bill was presented, and payment thereof demanded. And they admit the law is well settled that, before the holder of an accepted bill can call on the drawer for payment, he must make a presentment for or demand of payment, and give notice of the refusal. Here, then, is a definite proposition, asserting that a presentment for payment and a demand of payment are convertible terms, and that the proof of either would be sufficient. To support this proposition, they refer to Chitty on Bills, and Bayley on Bills, and the annotators on them. And as further proof and illustration, and to show that demand of payment should be preferred to presentment for payment, they refer to the statute of Louisiana, passed in 1827, in which they say the word demand is used in it, and that the word presentment is not; and they refer to the statute, also, to show that notaries were vested with certain powers by it, which gave authority to their acts; and that they, being public officers, the presumption of law is that they do their duty; and therefore, if the protest were defective, and liable to the objection urged against it, this presumption of law would cover all such defects. This is substituting presumption for proof, in violation of all the rules of evidence. With all due respect for that distinguished tribunal, we are constrained to dissent from the general proposition they have laid down on the subject of demand and presentment, and from all their reasoning in support of it. Due diligence is a question of law; and we think we have shown, by abundant authority, that the holder of an accepted bill, to fix the liability of the drawer or indorser, must present it to the acceptor and demand payment thereof. It may be well here to repeat what Lord Tenterden, C. J., said on this subject, in delivering the judgment of the court of king's bench, in the case of Hansard v. Robinson, before referred to. He said: "The general rule of the English law does not allow a suit by the assignee of a chose in action. The custom of merchants, considered as part of the law, furnishes in this case an exception to the general rule. What, then, is the custom in this respect? It is that the holder of the bill shall present the instrument, at its maturity, to the acceptor, demand payment of its amount, and, upon receipt of the money, deliver up the bill. The acceptor paying the bill has a right to the possession of the instrument for his own security, and as his voucher and discharge pro tanto, in his account with the drawer. If, upon an offer of payment, the holder should refuse to deliver up the bill, can it be doubted that the acceptor might retract his offer, or retain his money?" This extract, we think, furnishes a full answer to all that has been said by the supreme court of Louisiana to prove that it is not necessary to present the bill to the acceptor for payment, and to the presumption of law relied on to cure the defects in the protest.

But to show that, by the statute of Louisiana, the presentment of a bill to the acceptor for payment is not dispensed with, and that the presentment is, by a fair construction of the act, as much within its true intent and meaning as the demand, we proceed to examine its provisions. The principal object of the legislature in passing this statute seems to have been to give authority to notaries to give notices in all cases of protested bills and promissory notes, and to make their certificates evidence of such notices. And, therefore, all that is said on the subject of the demand and the manner of making it, and the other circumstances attending it, was not intended as a new enactment on these subjects, but as inducement to the powers conferred on the notary, which was the principal object of the statute, as will appear, we think, by reading it. That part of it which relates to this subject is in these words: "That all notaries, and persons acting as such, are authorized, in their protests of bills of exchange, promissory notes and orders for the payment of money, to make mention of the demand made upon the drawee, acceptor or person on whom such order or bill of exchange is drawn or given, and of the manner and circumstances of such demand, and by certificate added to such protest, to state the manner in which any notices of protest to drawers, indorsers or other persons interested were served or forwarded; and, whenever they shall have so done, a certified copy of such protest and certificate shall be evidence of all the notices therein stated." It seems to have been taken for granted by the legislature that the notaries knew how to make out a protest, and therefore they did not prescribe the form, but gave the substance of it, to which the notary was required to add a certificate of the manner in which he had given notices, and when done, according to the statute, a certified copy of the protest and certificate should be evidence, not of the demand and manner and circumstances of the demand, but of the notice only. This shows that the intention of the legislature, in passing this part of the statute, was merely to authorize the notaries to give notices, and to make the copy of the protest, and the certificate added to it, evidence of notice in the courts of Louisiana. But independent of this view of the subject, we think the language employed in this statute includes the presentment of the bill for payment, and for all other purposes, as fully as it does the demand of payment. In giving construction to the act, the phrase, "and of the manner and circumstances of such demand," cannot be rejected, but must receive a fair interpretation. When taken in connection with other parts of the statute, what do these words mean? The manner of making a demand of payment, we have seen, is by presenting the bill to the drawee or acceptor; and so important is this part of the proceeding that the omission to present the bill to the acceptor will justify his refusal to pay it, although payment be demanded. The legislature cannot be presumed to have intended to make so important a change in the law merchant as that ascribed to them by the counsel for the plaintiffs, without at the same time providing some other mode of obtaining the acceptance and payment of bills of exchange, and of holding drawers and indorsers to their liabilities. It is but reasonable, therefore, to give to the phrase before referred to such construction, if practicable, as will leave the law merchant as it stood before the passage of the statute, and carry into effect the main intention of the legislature. This, we think, may fairly be done without doing any violence to the intention or the language of the statute. The manner of the demand must, therefore, mean the presentment of the bill for either acceptance or payment; and the circumstances of the demand, we think, means the place where the presentment and demand is made, and the person to whom or of whom it is made, and the answer made by such person. It is very clear that bills payable at sight and after sight are within the meaning of the statute, because it provides for a demand of payment of the acceptor of a bill. Now, how can there be an acceptor of a bill without a presentment for acceptance? Until the bill become due, payment cannot be demanded of the drawee. This shows that without the word presentment and the word demand also, the plain meaning of the statute could not be carried into effect. A bill payable at a fixed period after its date need not be presented for acceptance; it is sufficient to present it and demand payment when it arrives at maturity, but a bill payable at sight or after sight can never become due until after it has been accepted. How is the holder or the notary to obtain the acceptance of such a bill under the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana? Will it be sufficient to demand payment of the bill? That would be a nugatory act, because it is not due; then it must be admitted that, by fair and necessary construction, the word presentment is within the plain meaning and intention of the statute, and that the bill may be presented for acceptance or for payment, and therefore neither the statute nor the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana has changed the law merchant in any of these respects.

§ 747. The law of the place of drawing or indorsing a bill governs the drawer's or indorser's contract.

There is, however, another question, entirely independent of the statute and the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana, which may be decisive of the case before this court, and that question is, Whether the contract between the holder and indorser of the bill in controversy is to be governed by the law of Louisiana, where the bill was payable, or by the law of Mississippi, where it was drawn and indorsed. The place where the contract is to be performed is to govern the liabilities of the person who has undertaken to perform it. The acceptors resided at New Orleans; they became parties to the bill by accepting it there. So far, therefore, as their liabilities were concerned, they were governed by the law of Louisiana. But the drawers and indorsers resided in Mississippi; the bill was drawn and indorsed there; and their liabilities, if any, accrued there. The undertaking of the defendant was, as before stated, that the drawers should pay the bill; and that if the holder, after using due diligence, failed to obtain payment from them, he would pay it, with interest and damages. This part of the contract was, by the agreement of the parties, to be performed in Mississippi, where the suit was brought, and is now depending. The construction of the contract, and the diligence necessary to be used by the plaintiffs to entitle them to a recovery, must, therefore, be governed by the laws of the latter state. Story on Bills, § 366; 4 Pet., 123; 2 Kent's Comm., 459; 13 Mass., 4; 12 Wend., 439; Story on Bills, § 76; 4 Johns., 119; 12 Johns., 142; 5 East, 124; 3 Mass., 81; 3 Cowen, 154; 1 Cowen, 107; 5 Cranch, 298. Whatever, therefore, may have been the intention of the legislature in passing the statute, and of the supreme court of Louisiana in the decision of the case referred to, neither can affect, in the slightest degree, the case before us. In Mississippi, the custom of merchants has been adopted as part of the common law; and by that law and their statute law this case must be governed. We think, therefore, the protest offered by the plaintiff, as evidence to the jury, ought not to have been received as evidence of presentment of the bill to the acceptors for payment, nor as evidence of the dishonor of the bill, which is ordered to be certified to the circuit court accordingly.

Justices McLEAN and WOODBURY dissented, holding that the protest was admissible in evidence. WOODBURY, J., held that it should have been left to the jury to find whether the note was present when demand was made.

FARWELL v. CURTIS.

(Circuit Court for Wisconsin: 7 Bissell, 160-166. 1876.)

Opinion by HOPKINS, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The real point of the defense is, whether a check given by defendant on the 5th of April, 1875, for $800, was and is to be held as a payment. The parties have stipulated the facts to be as follows: That on the 5th day of April, 1875, the defendant, a resident of New Lisbon, in this state, purchased goods of plaintiffs in Chicago, their place of business, to the amount of $800 and over, and on that day gave his check to the plaintiffs for the sum of $800, upon the bank of New Lisbon, a banking house doing business in that place, to apply as payment towards the goods so purchased by him to that amount; that the plaintiffs on the same day sent the check per mail to the bank, the drawees, with instructions to collect and return; that there is a daily mail between Chicago and New Lisbon; and the check was received at the bank of New Lisbon on the morning of the 7th of April, and was paid out of the defendant's funds on deposit in the bank, there being sufficient for that purpose, and charged to his account; that the bank, on the 7th of April, sent to the plaintiffs, through the mail, a draft for the amount of the check on the Union National Bank, Chicago, which was received by them on the morning of the 9th, which they on that day deposited in the Bank of Montreal, of Chicago, for collection, which was on the 10th of April presented to the Union National Bank for payment, and not paid, and was returned on the same day to the plaintiffs, who, on the same day, wrote the New Lisbon Bank that the check would go to protest if not paid on Monday, and to defendant that it was not paid, and asking him "to poke up the bank on the matter." Not being paid, it was protested on Monday, the 12th, of which defendant was notified per mail. It is further stipulated that the bank of New Lisbon could have paid said check in money up to the 10th day of April; but that on the close of the day's business on that day it stopped payment, having up to that time paid all checks presented for payment; that the bank had not the funds in the Union National Bank to meet the draft when they drew it, nor authority to draw it without funds. These are the material facts established by the evidence, and the question is, whether the plaintiffs were guilty of such negligence in presenting the check and demanding payment as to discharge the drawer.

§ 748. Presentment of check by mail not due diligence.

The practice of sending checks by mail to the drawee I think is not usual, and has not received much judicial consideration, and not any direct sanction that I can find. In Morse on Banking, page 334, he says it is a good presentment, and cites for his authority, Bailey v. Bordenham, 10 Law T., N. S., 422. I have examined that case, and it gives some countenance to his assertion. but I think the point is not absolutely decided. In these days when such facilities are furnished by express companies for presentation at distant places, there is no reason for adopting a less direct or effective mode to accomplish the object. In this case there is a daily mail, by railroad between Chicago and New Lisbon, and a daily express also, with route agents and local agents, which furnished ample opportunities for presentation at the bank counters, as early as the morning of the 7th of April, and probably on the morning of the 6th, if it had been sent by the first opportunity. But if sent by the last train on the 6th, it would have reached New Lisbon on the morning of the 7th, and could have been collected and returned so as to have reached the plaintiff by the morning of the 8th of April. To send by mail to the drawees with instructions to collect and return, under such circumstances, is hardly equivalent to a demand at the counter for payment. The bank could not have paid the currency if it had it; there was no one to pay it to. The admission is that the bank was paying and had the money to pay up to and including the 10th, so that if the money had been asked on the 7th it would have been paid. Now, as the plaintiffs adopted another course than the one which the exercise of ordinary care and diligence would have dictated, and loss has resulted by reason of it, they should stand it.

§ 749. A check paid with a draft may be considered as dishonored. What is laches in presenting check or draft.

But it may not be necessary to settle this point, as Morse, who says a presentation by mail is good, as well as the case cited by him to support the assertion, says, also, that when the holder sends by mail to the drawee directly, if the money does not come back by the return mail, notice of dishonor should be given. Adopting this rule would not relieve these plaintiffs, for they did not comply with it; the money did not come back by the next mail, nor was the check protested as required. But, instead of the money, on the 9th, four days after the receipt of the check, a draft came back on the Union National Bank, but that was not presented until the 10th for payment, and was not protested until the 12th, so that, conceding that the presentation by mail was sufficient, the plaintiffs were guilty of laches in not presenting the draft before the 10th. This delay is inexcusable, according to any rule of diligence that I know of, so that, assuming that Mr. Morse states a safe and satisfactory rule, it does not exonerate these plaintiffs from laches. But, I think, if the time is extended beyond what it would have been if sent by the usual and ordinary modes, that is, by express, or to some party to present, and beyond the period established by law as reasonable for presentation, and a loss happens by reason of the failure of the drawee, the payee of the check is alone chargeable unto it. For instance, in this case, it is admitted that the bank had the money to pay the check up to and including the 10th, so that, if payment had been demanded in the usual way, it would have been paid, and if the parties chose to make the drawee their agent, and the drawee as their agent sent a worthless draft instead of the money, which he would have paid to any party presenting the check at the counter, and charged the check to the drawer, the same as if paid in money, so that he had no right to enforce his claim or power to protect himself, the payee, instead of the drawer, should incur the loss that ensued by the subsequent failure. The charge to defendant's account was made on the 7th of April, in the morning, and the check marked paid, and what was done after that time was done by the bank at plaintiffs' request and as their agent, and whether in good or bad faith on the part of the banker, the defendant is not to blame or chargeable therewith, or for any loss resulting therefrom.

§ 750. Rule as to time within which bank checks should be presented.

The common or commercial law has fixed certain times within which checks must be presented to the drawees for payment, and when it appears that the bank was paying during that time, and the drawer's account was good for the same, and the refusal or failure to obtain payment after was by reason of the failure of the bank occurring subsequent thereto, the loss has to be borne by the payee or holder of the check. That rule is, in cases where the parties all reside in the same place, that it must be presented for payment before the close of business on the day following its date or delivery to the payee; and in cases where it is drawn upon a bank at another place, it must be sent at the farthest by the last mail on the next day after it is received, and be presented by the party receiving it on the day following the reception by him. Smith v. Janes, 20 Wend., 192; Story on Promissory Notes, 493. If not thus regularly demanded, and the bank or bankers should fail after those times, the loss will be the loss of the holder, who is considered as having made the check his own by his laches. If the check is presented and not paid, notice of dishonor must be given the drawer in order to charge him. Now, in this case, it is plain that the plaintiffs did not observe these rules. They sent the check in time, and, if the presentation by letter was a good demand, it was presented on the 7th in the morning; then it should have been paid on the 7th, and if not, the drawer should have been notified of its non-payment. But, instead of being paid in money, it was paid by draft on Chicago, and it is claimed that the plaintiffs had time to present that, to see whether it would be paid, and that if not paid, they could then protest the check. This is not the law. The holder of a check cannot in that way extend the time for which the drawer would be liable. The drawer had a right to have his check paid on the day presented, and it was the duty of the holder to see to it that it was so paid, or if not, protested; and if the holder accepts the check or draft of the bank in payment in lieu of money, he must present and collect it the same day, or else he is chargeable with laches. He cannot, as in this case, keep it for three days, and then go back upon the drawer of the check if it is not paid, as by so doing he would extend the drawer's liability for two days beyond the time fixed by the law. Alexander v. Burchfield, 7 Man. & G., 1061.

This point is directly decided in Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y., 171. In that case the check of the drawee was taken and presented at the bank on the following day, but before its presentation the drawers of the check had failed. The party accepting the payment thereupon protested the draft which they received it in payment of, and brought suit to recover the amount of the draft, claiming that as the check was presented on the next day after its date, it was duly presented, and, if not paid, the draft for which it was given was not paid. On the contrary it was claimed that, as the drawers of the check were paying all of the day on which it was given, and that if it had been presented on that day it would have been paid, and that, as it was taken in lieu of the money, it should have been presented on that day, that the party could not have the whole of the next day to present a check taken under such circumstances, which was sustained by the court, which said: "It was the duty of the plaintiffs to present the check at the bank at least during the day on which they received it, and obtain either the money or a certificate, or cause the same to be protested for non-payment, and not having done so, they were chargeable with negligence and the consequent loss." Here, even giving the plaintiffs the benefit of the time allowed when sent by mail, as in other cases, and they are guilty of negligence; they received the banker's check on the 9th, but delayed presenting it for payment to the Union National Bank until the 10th. Certainly such negligence cannot be tolerated in treating with paper that they had taken in lieu of money, without the consent or knowledge of defendant. The plaintiffs cannot hold the defendant liable on his check during the time they were thus experimenting with the check they received from the bankers, in payment of his check to them. The bankers may have, and probably did, practice a fraud upon the plaintiffs when they sent this draft on the Union National Bank. But the defendant is not chargeable with that. He can say to the plaintiffs: "If you had sent the check to a party here to present in the usual way, it would have been paid, and I have a right to require you to pursue the ordinary course in such case; and if you depart therefrom, and are defrauded by your agent, which in this case was the banker, it is your loss, and you alone are liable, as you brought it unnecessarily upon yourself."

Under the evidence, the defendant must therefore have judgment.

SACRIDER v. BROWN.

(Circuit Court for Michigan: 8 McLean, 481-488. 1844.)

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This action is brought against the defendant as an indorser of a foreign bill of exchange; and the only question raised in the case is, whether the demand of payment and protest for non-payment were legally made. The demand and protest were made by the clerk of the notary, using the name of the notary, but without his knowledge or direction.

§ 751. Right of notary's clerk to make demand and protest.

In the case of Leftly v. Mills, 4 Term R., 175, Justice Buller said, "the next and the material part is the making of the demand; the party making the demand must have authority to receive the money," etc. It is material, too, to consider by whom the demand was made in this case; I am not satisfied that it was a proper demand, for it was only made by the banker's clerk. The demand of a foreign bill must be made by a notary public, to whom credit is given because he is a public officer." Mr. Chitty, in his treatise on Bills, 333, states the above and adds: "But the number of bills requiring presentment is frequently so great as to render a presentment by the notary himself impossible, and the constant practice is for the clerk to make the presentment." "In case there be not any public notary at the place where the bill is dishonored, it is expressly provided by 9 and 10 Will. 3, ch. 17, sec. 1, as to inland bills, that they may be protested for non-payment by any substantial person at that place, in the presence of two or more witnesses." The statement by Mr. Chitty that a demand of payment must be made by a notary and not by his clerk caused a correspondence between him and the association of notaries for Liverpool, which afterwards included the notaries of London. From this it appeared that it had long been the practice in London and Liverpool for the clerks of notaries to present bills for acceptance or payment. While Mr. Chitty admitted the practice, he still adhered to his original statement, and in page 465, when considering whether the clerk of a notary can, under the above statute, make the demand of payment, he says it is doubtful, though such is the practice. Again Mr. Chitty says, page 477, "the established custom of merchants requires that a formal demand of payment shall be made within the business hours of the last day of grace, by a notary, being a known public officer of experience, and sworn to do his duty," etc.

In a case in New York it has lately been decided that a notary's clerk cannot present a bill for payment, but that the presentment must be made by the notary. 3 Hill, 53; 4 Hill, 129. Now, if it were admitted that a notary's clerk may make a demand of payment, yet it is very clear that the clerk cannot make the protest. This must be done by the officer who acts under oath, and to whose official acts duly certified the law gives verity. The use of the name of the notary without his consent or knowledge was a gross impropriety, and can add nothing to the protest. It was void when made, and time has not given it validity. We think the protest for non-payment is not established by the evidence.

Judgment for the defendants.

MAGRUDER v. UNION BANK OF GEORGETOWN.

(3 Peters, 87-92. 1880.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action was brought by the Union Bank of Georgetown against George B. Magruder, as indorser of a promissory note made by George Magruder. The maker of the note died before it became payable, and letters of administration on his estate were taken out by the indorser. When the note became payable, suit was commenced against the indorser, without any demand of payment other than the suit itself, without any protest for non-payment, and without any notice that the note was not paid, and that the holder looked to him as indorser for payment. Upon these circumstances the counsel for the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury that, before the plaintiff can recover in this action, it is essential for him to prove demand, and notice to the indorser of the non-payment, which, not being done, the verdict should be for the defendant. But the court refused to give this instruction, and charged the jury that no demand or notice of non-payment was necessary. To this opinion the counsel for the defendant in the circuit court excepted, and has brought the cause to this court by writ of error.

§ 752. Demand must be made to charge indorser.

The general rule that payment must be demanded from the maker of a note, and notice of its non-payment forwarded to the indorser within due time, in order to render him liable, is so firmly settled that no authority need be cited in support of it. The defendant in error does not controvert this rule, but insists that this case does not come within it, because demand of payment and notice of non-payment are totally useless, since the indorser has become the personal representative of the maker. He has not, however, cited any case in support of this opinion, nor has he shown that the principle has been ever laid down in any treatise on promissory notes and bills. The court ought to be well satisfied of the correctness of the principle before it sanctions so essential a departure from established commercial usage.

§ 753. — although the indorser be also the administrator of the maker. (a)

This suit is not brought against George B. Magruder as administrator of George Magruder, the maker of the note, but against him as indorser. These two characters are as entirely distinct as if the persons had been different. A recovery against George B. Magruder, as indorser, will not affect the assets in his hands as administrator. It is not a judgment against the maker, but against the indorser of the note. The fact that the indorser is the representative of the maker does not oppose any obstacle to proceeding in the regular course. The regular demand of payment may be made, and the note protested for non-payment, of which notice may be given to him as indorser with as much facility as if the indorser had not been the administrator. It is not alleged that any difficulty existed in proceeding regularly; the allegation is that it was totally useless. The note became payable on the 8th day of November, 1824. The writ was taken out against the indorser on the 26th day of April, 1825. If this unusual mode of proceeding can be sustained, it must be on the principle that, as the indorser must have known that he had not paid the note as the representative of the maker, notice to him was useless. Could this be admitted, does it dispense with the necessity of demanding payment? It is possible that assets which might have been applied in satisfaction of this debt, had payment been demanded, may have received a different direction. It is possible that the note may have been paid by the maker before it fell due. Be this as it may, no principle is better settled in commercial transactions than that the undertaking of the indorser is conditional. If due diligence be used to obtain payment from the maker, without success, and notice of non-payment be given to him in time, his undertaking becomes absolute, not otherwise. Due diligence to obtain payment from the maker is a condition precedent, on which the liability of the indorser depends. As no attempt to obtain payment from the maker was made in this case, and no notice of non-payment was given to the indorser, we think the circuit court ought to have given the instruction prayed for by the defendant in that court. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

RENNER v. BANK OF COLUMBIA.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE THOMPSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes up on a writ of error to the circuit court of the District of Columbia; and by the record it appears that the action in the court below was prosecuted against Renner, the plaintiff in error, as indorser of a promissory note, drawn by James Foyles, and discounted at the Bank of Columbia. The note bears date on the 9th day of January, 1817, for $4,600, and is payable sixty days after date. In the declaration it is averred that demand of payment of the maker was made on the 14th of March, which was on the fourth day after the expiration of the sixty days which the note had to run. Several questions arising out of the record have been presented for the consideration of the court. The principal one, however, is that which relates to the time of demand of payment of the maker of the note, and grows out of a bill of exceptions taken upon the trial. This has been pressed upon the court as a question of great importance, and the decision of which, in its application to the concerns of the bank, will have a very wide and extensive effect. We shall proceed to the consideration of this point in the first place, leaving the others, which are of minor importance, to be noticed hereafter.

The testimony given at the trial was for the purpose of showing that the Bank of Columbia had, from its first establishment in 1793, adopted the practice of demanding the payment of notes discounted by it, on the fourth day after the time limited for the payment thereof, according to the express terms of the note. And that such was the universal custom of all the banks in Washington and Georgetown. That this custom was well known and understood by the defendant when he indorsed the note in question. After this testimony had been received, without objection, the counsel for the defendant below called upon the court to instruct the jury that upon the evidence so given by the plaintiffs, of a demand upon the maker of the note, on the fourth day after the time limited by the note for the payment, the defendant was not liable on his indorsement; which instruction the court refused to give, and a bill of exceptions was thereupon taken. This court must, therefore, assume as established facts (and, looking at the evidence before the jury, no doubt could be entertained on the subject), that the custom of the Bank of Columbia, and all the other banks in Washington and Georgetown, from their first institution, had been to demand payment of notes due them, on the fourth day after the time limited therein; and that this custom was known and well understood by the defendant Renner when he indorsed the note in question, and, it may be added, with full knowledge and expectation that this note was to be dealt with in the same way; for it was a renewal of a discount, continued for a considerable time before, on other notes similarly drawn and indorsed, some of which had been demanded in like manner, and protested, and afterwards paid and taken up by himself. Under such circumstances, it would seem that nothing short of some positive and unbending principle of law could shield the defendant from responsibility. But, so far from trenching upon any such principle, we think his liability completely established by well settled rules of law. It seems to be assumed as the settled law of promissory notes, that, in order to charge an indorser, demand of the maker must be made on the third day after that limited in the note; and that this is so stubborn a rule that parties are not permitted to violate it, even by their mutual agreement.

§ 754. Custom as to four days' grace is binding. Rule as to demand on third day will be noticed by the courts.

We admit, in the most unqualified manner, that the usage of making the demand on the third day of grace has become so general that courts of justice will notice it ex officio; and in the absence of any proof to the contrary will presume that such was the understanding of all parties to a note when they put their names upon it. But that this rule has any attributes so inviolable as not to be touched by the parties to negotiable paper cannot be admitted. It has its origin in custom, and that custom, too, comparatively of recent date; and is not one of those to the contrary of which the memory of man runneth not, and which contributed to make up the common law code which is so justly venerated. So far from this, that the allowance of any days of grace is in derogation of the common law rule, applicable to other contracts. They are emphatically the mere creatures of usage, varying in different countries to suit the views and convenience of men in business, originally gratuitous, and not binding on the holder. The common law would require payment on the last day limited by the contract, and would also give to the maker the whole of that day. It is a settled principle of the common law, applicable to all contracts, that a party has until the last day limited by his agreement to perform his engagement, and even until the last hour of the day. The common law knows of no fractions of a day; custom, however, and that introduced, too, principally by banks, has limited the day to a few hours of business. But this, and whatever other rules have been adopted by consent, and merely for the convenience of commercial men, are departures from the common law doctrine. When, therefore, the allowance of only three days of grace is said to be the law of the contract by bills of exchange and promissory notes, nothing more can be intended than that custom has so long sanctioned this rule that all dealers in paper of this description are understood to govern themselves by it. The law of the contract, properly speaking, is to pay when due; and that time is to be ascertained either from the contract per se, or that taken in connection with some known custom, which the parties are presumed to have tacitly consented should be made a part of the contract. And it is in this view only that three days of grace are allowed, where that custom is recognized as the rule; for a note which upon its face has sixty days to run is in truth and in fact a contract for sixty-three days, and interest is taken for that time. And how is it ascertained that it is a note for sixty-three days, but by looking out of the contract and finding what was the understanding of the parties? Where the custom has existed for a long time, and has become general, courts of justice, as before observed, will notice it ex officio; and where it has not, it is matter of proof. If this is not the light in which these transactions are to be considered, all banks are chargeable with usury; for all take interest beyond what is allowed by law, if time is to be determined by the note itself. The general rule of law is that demand of payment must be made of the maker when the note falls due; and that time, as now settled, is on the last day of grace; and even this rule is of recent date, for in the king's bench in England, as late as the year 1791, about coeval with the institution of this bank, and the custom established by it, we find (Leftley v. Mills, 4 Term R., 170) Lord Kenyon and Mr. Justice Buller differing on this very point; the former holding that, by analogy to other contracts, the acceptor of a bill of exchange had the whole of the third day of grace to pay the bill, and that a demand on the fourth day was not too late. Mr. Justice Buller thought the demand ought to be made on the third day of grace: that the nature of the acceptor's undertaking was to pay the bill on demand on any part of the third day of grace; and he inferred this from its having been, as he said, the practice to make the demand on that day. If it was a doubtful question in England so late as the year 1791 whether the demand ought to be made on the third day of grace, or the day after, this bank is not chargeable with any culpable innovation upon long established rules of law or usage, by adopting the practice of making the demand on the fourth day.

It is said, however, that the effect of this testimony is to alter and vary, by parol evidence, the written contract of the parties. If this is the light in which it is to be considered, there can be no doubt that it ought to be laid entirely out of view; for there is no rule of law better settled or more salutary in its application to contracts than that which precludes the admission of parol evidence to contradict or substantially vary the legal import of a written agreement. Evidence of usage or custom is, however, never considered of this character, but is received for the purpose of ascertaining the sense and understanding of parties by their contracts which are made with reference to such usage or custom; for the custom then becomes a part of the contract, and may not improperly be considered the law of the contract; and it rests upon the same principle as the doctrine of the lex loci. All contracts are to be governed by the law of the place where they are to be performed; and this law may be and usually is proved as matter of fact. The rule is adopted for the purpose of carrying into effect the intention and understanding of the parties. That the note in question was to be paid at the Bank of Columbia, and to be governed by the regulations and custom of the institution, and so understood by all parties, cannot admit of a doubt.

It would be a waste of time to go very much at large into an examination of the various usages and customs that are admitted in evidence and recognized in courts of justice both in England and in this country, in almost every branch of business, and especially in commercial transactions, for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning and interpretation of contracts. A few only will be noticed that are somewhat analogous to the present case. In the case of Cutter v. Powell, 6 Term R., 320, where was brought under consideration the legal effect of a promissory note, given to the mate of a ship for a certain sum of money, provided he proceeded on her voyage and continued to do duty to the port of destination. The legal construction to be given to this note was clear, and so considered by the court, that nothing was due unless the mate continued to do duty to the port of destination. He having died, however, on the voyage, the court directed an inquiry into the usage of merchants in such cases, declaring that if it sanctioned an allowance for the time the service was performed, the plaintiff should recover according to such usage. No intimation is here given that such proof would be repugnant to the contract, although it was against the legal import of the note, if construed without reference to the usage; and although the usage related to trade, it was very limited in its application. So in Noble v. Kennoway, 2 Doug., 510, usage of trade was admitted in evidence to explain the understanding of parties in a policy of insurance, although the usage had not existed three years. Lord Mansfield said the usage could only be known by proof and must be tried by a jury; that underwriters must be presumed to be acquainted with the practice of the trade they insure, whether recently established or not. If it were necessary, cases might be multiplied almost without end showing the same principle and same recognition of local and particular usages in almost every branch of business. We have also, in the state courts in our country, the decisions of very enlightened judges adopting the same principles and governing themselves by the same rules, and, in many cases, not unlike the one before us. In Jones v. Fales, 4 Mass., 252, the same doctrine as to usages of banks was fully sanctioned, and although that particular usage might have been found in practice inconvenient, and not to meet public approbation, yet the principle which governed the decision of the court is not thereby weakened, namely, that the usage with which the defendant was conversant was proper evidence to be submitted to a jury, to infer from it the agreement of the party. And although, as suggested at the bar, this custom was altered by the banks, we do not find the courts of justice in that state attempting to control it in its application to notes made in reference to the usage. The doctrine of this case was again fully recognized in The Lincoln and Kennebeck Bank v. Page, 9 Mass., 155, where it was held that bank usages, established respecting demands on makers of promissory notes and notices to indorsers, being known to dealers in the banks, they were bound by them, and that the usage was proper evidence to be submitted to a jury. These cases are not referred to for the purpose of approving the particular usages, but to show that evidence of such usage was never considered as contradicting the written contract.

Halsey v. Brown, 3 Day, 346, is a very strong case on this subject. The question was as to the liability of ship-owners for the loss of money taken on freight by the captain. The defense set up was that the master, according to established custom, was permitted to take money on freight as a perquisite to himself, and the owners discharged from responsibility; and the question directly presented to the court was whether a particular custom or usage could be given in evidence to control the general law. And the court says it is a principle that the general common law may be, and in many instances is, controlled by special custom. So the general commercial law may, by the same reason, be controlled by a special local usage so far as that usage extends, which will operate upon all contracts of this nature made in view of, or with reference to, such usage. In Smith v. Wright, 1 Caines, 43, this general principle is laid down. The true test of a commercial usage is its having existed long enough to have become generally known, and to warrant a presumption that contracts are made in reference to it. In the case of The Bank of Utica v. Smith, 18 Johns., 230, a note payable at the Mechanics' Bank in New York was presented and payment demanded fifteen minutes after bank hours, and this was held sufficient, it appearing that, although it was a quarter of an hour after the usual time of closing the bank as to other business, it was within bank hours, it appearing that, according to the general course of doing business at this bank, these fifteen minutes were the usual and accustomed time for these presentments, and of this course of business the defendant ought to have informed himself.

It is unnecessary to pursue this subject further by particular reference to decisions in the state courts. The same doctrine, as to the effect of particular usages in controlling the general law, will be found to accompany the administration of justice, wherever the subject is brought under consideration. Whether these usages are, in all instances, wise and beneficial, may, perhaps, be questionable; but where they do exist, they are considered as regulating and controlling contracts made under and in reference thereto. The same principle is recognized by this court in the case of Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria, 5 Cranch, 49. The chief justice, in speaking of the effect of usage upon the legal obligation of parties, observes, if the case showed that such was the usage of the bank, and such the understanding under which notes were discounted, this court is not prepared to say that the undertaking created by the indorsement would not be so fashioned as to give effect to the real intention of the parties. These cases are sufficient to show, in the most satisfactory manner, the light in which courts of justice consider contracts made in reference to any particular usage, and the effect that such usage is to have upon them. And no good reason is perceived why these principles should not be applied to the case before us. The custom, under which this bank has transacted business for five and twenty years, of demanding payment of the drawers of notes on the fourth instead of the third day, after the time limited for payment, is not unreasonable or repugnant to any principles of general policy. It does not stand alone, but is in accordance with the usage of every other bank in Washington and Georgetown. The defendant indorsed the note in question, with full knowledge of the custom. A demand on the fourth day is in perfect harmony with the principles of the common law, if applied to the contract, the maker having the whole of the third day to pay his note, and not being in default until the fourth. The inconveniences suggested on the argument growing out of a usage here, differing from that which is in practice in other places on this subject, are not of great public concern. If they exist, they affect the banks and their customers only. And if felt to the prejudice of either the one or the other, we may rest assured it would be altered. Their private interest is a sure guaranty for this.

§ 756. Courts bound by the contract as made.

But, admitting the practice to be inconvenient, and that a uniformity, in this respect, with other parts of the country would be desirable, the remedy is not in the hands of courts of justice, whose business it is to judge of contracts as made by parties themselves, and not to prescribe the manner in which they shall be made. We are, accordingly, of opinion that the court below did not err in refusing to instruct the jury that the demand upon the maker of the note, on the fourth day after the time limited for payment thereof, discharged the defendant from liability on his indorsement.

One of the minor points which has been alleged as error, appearing on the face of the record, is, that the demand on the maker of the note should, at all events, have been laid on the third day after the time limited by the note for payment, and not on the fourth. This objection cannot be sustained at this time. Whether the declaration would not have been bad on demurrer, not, however, because the demand is laid on a wrong day, but because it does not aver the usage, is a question not necessary now to decide. But if, as we have determined, the demand was properly made on the fourth day, it would have been bad if laid at an earlier day, because the maker would have been under no obligation to pay, and, of course, not in default. If, therefore, the cause should be sent back to the court below, no amendment in this respect ought to be made. The want of an averment, so as to let in the proof of usage, cannot now be objected to the record. The evidence was admitted without objection, and now forms a part of the record, as contained in the bill of exceptions. Had an objection been made to the admission of the evidence of usage, for the want of a proper averment in the declaration, and the evidence had, notwithstanding, been received, it would have presented a very different question. The time of the demand, as laid in the declaration, is according to the legal effect of the note. If made at an earlier day, it would have given no cause of action against the indorser, for he was not bound to pay until the default of the maker, and he was not in default until the fourth day. It is a general rule, in declaring as to time, that it must be laid after the cause of action accrues. The case of Rushton v. Aspinwall, 2 Doug., 679, does not apply. The bill of exchange upon which that suit was founded was dated on the 27th of November, in the year 1778, payable three months after date. The declaration stated that the bill was presented for acceptance on the day of the date thereof, and duly accepted, and, afterwards, on the same day, the acceptor was requested to pay, etc., but neglected and refused, etc., and then goes on to state the liability of the defendant, as indorser, and that he, on the same day, assumed and promised to pay, etc. It appears, therefore, that the refusal of the acceptor, and the assumption of the indorser, are laid on the day of the date of the note, which was three months before it fell due. The plaintiff, therefore, by his own showing, had no cause of action when he commenced his suit. This was a defect which no verdict could cure. He had not set forth his cause of action defectively, but shown that he had no cause of action; and this was the ground on which it was placed by the court. A cause of action, defectively or inaccurately set forth, is cured by the verdict, because, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, all circumstances necessary in form or in substance, to make out his cause of action, so imperfectly stated, must be proved at the trial; but when no cause of action is stated, none can be presumed to have been proved. This case is not to be considered as if before us on demurrer to the declaration. There being no averment of the special custom as to the demand on the fourth day, and the general rule being that the demand must be made on the third, if the declaration alleges it to have been made on the fourth, the joinder in demurrer admits the fact, and, of course, that the demand was too late. But had the declaration contained an averment of the special custom, it must allege a demand on the fourth day. That is according to the legal effect of the note; and a demand laid on any other day would have been bad. We must now consider the case as if the declaration had contained a special averment of the custom, the proof having been before the court and jury without objection, and now making a part of this record.

§ 758. Secondary evidence of note admissible when note mislaid or lost; not necessary to show its destruction.

The only remaining question arises out of a bill of exceptions taken upon the trial, to the decision of the court below, admitting secondary evidence of the contents of the note. And it has been contended: 1. That no such evidence was admissible, unless it appeared that the note was destroyed. The rule with respect to the admission of secondary evidence, we think, is not so restricted. If the original is lost, by accident, and no fault is imputable to the party, it is sufficient. In the present case, it appeared that the note was in court a few days before, and introduced in evidence on the trial against Foyles, the maker, but had been mislaid, and upon thorough search could not be found. Every case of this kind must depend, in a great measure, upon its own circumstances. This rule of evidence must be so applied as to promote the ends of justice, and guard against fraud or imposition. If the circumstances will justify a well grounded belief that the original paper is kept back by design, no secondary evidence ought to be admitted; but when no such suspicion attaches, and the paper is of that description, that no doubt can arise as to the proof of its contents, there can be no danger in admitting the secondary evidence. In this case, the note having been in court a few days before, and proved, upon a trial against the maker, there could be no possible inducement to withhold it, and it was, no doubt, mislaid purely by accident.

§ 759. — such secondary evidence may be other than a notarial copy of the note. Not necessary to allege such loss in the declaration to admit secondary evidence.

It is objected, in the second place, that if secondary evidence is admissible, the contents of the note was not proved by that which was competent; that it should have been by a notarial copy. Proof of the contents of a lost paper ought to be the best the party has in his power to produce, and, at all events, such as to leave no reasonable doubt as to the substantial parts of the paper. But, to have required a notarial copy, would have been demanding that of the existence of which there was no evidence, and which the law will not presume was in the power of the party; it not being necessary that a promissory note should be protested.

It is objected, lastly, that secondary evidence was not admissible, without a special count in the declaration upon a lost note. The English practice on this subject has not been adopted in this country, as far as our knowledge of it extends, and to require a special count upon a lost note, would be shutting the door against secondary evidence, in all cases where the note was lost after declaration filed. We do not think any danger of fraud is to be apprehended from the admission of such evidence, under the usual count upon the note; and, the practice in the court below not requiring a special count in such cases, no error was committed in the admission of the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

BANK OF WASHINGTON v. TRIPLETT.

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a writ of error to a judgment of the United States circuit court of the District of Columbia for the county of Alexandria. On the 19th of June, 1817, William H. Briscoe, of Alexandria, drew a bill on Peter A. Carnes, of Washington, payable four months after date to the order of Triplett and Neale. The payees of the bill indorsed it in blank and delivered it to the cashier of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, for the purpose of being transmitted through the said bank to a bank in Washington for collection. The cashier of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria indorsed the bill to the order of the cashier of the Bank of Washington, and transmitted it to him for collection in a letter of the 19th of July, 1817. Neither of the banks had any interest in the bill. The bill was protested for non-payment, and this suit was brought by Triplett and Neale against the Bank of Washington to recover its amount. The declaration charges that the bank did not use reasonable diligence to collect the money mentioned in the said bill nor take the necessary measures to charge the drawer, but neglected to present the bill either for acceptance or payment, and to have the same protested, whereby the plaintiffs have lost their recourse against the drawer. It was proved, on the part of the bank, that either on the day the bill was received or the succeeding day one of its officers called with the bill at the house of the said Peter A. Carnes for the purpose of presenting it for acceptance, and was told that he was in Baltimore. He called again three or four days afterwards for the same purpose, and was again told that he was in Baltimore. These answers were reported to the cashier. On the 9th of October, 1817, the cashier of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria addressed the following letter to the cashier of the Bank of Washington:

"DEAR SIR: The holder of the draft on Peter A. Carnes for $625.34 desires me to inform you that if the draft is not paid to make the notary send a notice to P. A. Carnes, Baltimore, and likewise to W. H. Briscoe, Leesburg, provided it is not paid at his residence in Washington."

On the 13th of the same month the cashier of the Bank of Washington, in answer to this letter, stated that the bill had not been accepted because the drawee could not be found, and that the directions given in the letter of the 9th should be observed. On the 24th of October, the fourth day after that expressed on the face of the bill as the day of payment, it was protested for non-payment and returned under protest to the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria. Notice was given to the drawer, who has refused to pay the same.

On the trial the counsel for the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury: 1. That upon this evidence, if believed, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. 2. That the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover for any loss of recourse against Briscoe, the drawer of the said bill. 3. That the failure of the defendants (after having called at the residence of the drawee of that said bill to obtain his acceptance, and not finding him or any person there to accept it) to notify the drawer of the circumstance was not such negligence as discharged the said drawer from his liability on the said bill and entitles the plaintiffs to recover. 4. That if they believed, from the evidence, that the defendants conformed to their former usage in regard to such bills as the one in question in calling on the drawee for acceptance (the said drawee being from home) and not noting the same as dishonored and giving notice thereof to the parties on the said bill, then their failure to treat the said bill as dishonored and to give notice accordingly of non-acceptance, did not discharge the drawer thereof from his liability to the plaintiffs.

The court refused to give either of these instructions; to which refusal the counsel for the defendants excepted; and a verdict and judgment were rendered for the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs in error insist that the circuit court ought to have given the instructions first asked, because, 1st, no privity existed between the real holder of the bill and the Bank of Washington. That bank was not the agent of Triplett and Neale, but was the agent of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria. Some cases have been cited to show that if an agent employed to transact a particular business engages another person to do it, that other person is not responsible to the principal. On this point, it is sufficient to say that these cases, however correctly they may have been decided, are inapplicable to the case at bar. The bill was not delivered to the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria for collection, but for transmission to some bank in Washington, to be collected. That bank would, of course, become the agent of the holder. By transmitting the bill, as directed, the Mechanics' Bank performed its duty, and the whole responsibility of collection devolved on the bank which received the bill for that purpose; the Mechanics' Bank was the mere channel through which Triplett and Neale transmitted the bill to the Bank of Washington.

§ 760. A bank which receives a bill for collection through another bank becomes the agent of the holder.

The deposit of a bill in one bank, to be transmitted for collection to another, is a common usage of great public convenience, the effect of which is well understood. This transaction was, unquestionably, of that character; and there is no reason for suspecting that the Bank of Washington did not so understand it. The duty of that bank was precisely the same, whoever might be the owner of the bill; and, if it was unwilling to undertake the collection, without precise information on the subject, that duty ought to have been declined. The custom to indorse a bill put in bank, for collection, is universal; and the Bank of Washington had no more reason for supposing that Triplett and Neale had ceased to be the real holders, from their indorsement, than for supposing that the cashier of the Bank of Washington had become the real holder, by the indorsement to them. It is the customary proceeding for collection in such cases, and is for the advantage of the party interested. At any rate, the letter of the 9th of October disclosed the real party entitled to the money; and the answer to that letter assumes the agency, if it had not been previously assumed. The court is decidedly of opinion that the Bank of Washington, by receiving the bill for collection, and certainly by its letter of the 13th of October, became the agent of Triplett and Neale, and assumed the responsibility attached to that character. The first prayer of the defendants, in the circuit court, being to instruct the jury that, upon the whole evidence, the plaintiff ought not to recover, if it might properly have been granted, in any case in which any testimony was offered, certainly ought not to have been granted if any possible construction of that testimony would support the action. The liability of the bank for the bill placed in its hands for collection undoubtedly depends on the question whether reasonable and due diligence has been used in the performance of its duty. To maintain the charge of negligence, the counsel for Triplett and Neale have alleged the failure to give notice of the non-acceptance of the bill, and the failure to demand payment in proper time. The counsel for the bank have brought the first question more distinctly into view, by a more definite instruction respecting it, which was afterwards asked; and its consideration will be deferred until that prayer shall be discussed; but the first must be disposed of, under the general prayer.

§ 761. Bank liable for negligence in making demand. Payment of bill should be demanded on last day of grace.

Unquestionably, by failing to demand payment in time, the bank would make the bill its own, and would become liable to Triplett and Neale for its amount. The inquiry, therefore, is into the fact. The demand was made on the fourth day after that mentioned on the face of the bill as the day of payment. The defendants in error insist that, if the bill was never presented for acceptance, payment ought to have been demanded on the day mentioned on its face. If this be not so, then it ought to have been demanded on the third day afterwards, which is the last day of grace. The allowance of days of grace is a usage which pervades the whole commercial world. It is now universally understood to enter into every bill or note of a mercantile character, and to form so completely a part of the contract that the bill does not become due, in fact or in law, on the day mentioned on its face, but on the last day of grace. A demand of payment, previous to that day, will not authorize a protest, or charge the drawer of the bill. This is universally admitted, if the bill has been accepted.

§ 762. — rule the same whether bill has been presented for acceptance or not.

If it has been noted for non-acceptance, but has been held up, it would not be protested for non-payment until the last day of grace. Why, then, should a bill never presented be demandable at an earlier day than if it had been accepted, or if acceptance had been refused? Whatever might have been the original motive for the indulgence, it is now taken into consideration, both by the drawer and payee of the bill. The amount is, consequently, estimated on the calculation that it becomes really due on the last day of grace. Neither party can foresee, when the bill is drawn, whether it will be paid or not; nor, if it be payable after date, whether it will be presented or not. Their calculation, therefore, as to the day when it becomes really due and is to be paid, is independent of these considerations. No sufficient reason is perceived for the distinction.

§ 763. Usage of bank as to time of payment of bill or note governs.

It is, however, a law dependent on usage. The books which treat on the subject concur in saying that payment must be demanded when the bill falls due; and that it falls due on the last day of grace. The distinction between a bill which has and which has not been presented has never been taken; and it is apparent that a bill is never drawn with a view to this distinction. The fact that the question has never been made is a strong argument against it. The point has never, so far as we can find, been brought directly before a court; and we have seen only one case in which it has been even incidentally mentioned. In Anderton v. Beck, 16 East, 248, a bill was drawn, payable two months after date, and was not presented for acceptance. It was protested for non-payment, and a suit was brought by the holder against the drawer. He resisted the demand, and the opinion of the court proceeds on the admission that the bill fell due on the last day of grace. This case consists, we believe, with the opinions and practice of commercial towns. But if a bill, payable after date, and not presented for acceptance, falls due on the same day as if it had been accepted, the defendants in error insist that payment ought to have been demanded on the last day of grace. It was proved at the trial that the settled usage of the Bank of Washington, at that time, and of all the other banks in Washington and Georgetown, was to demand payment on the day succeeding the last day of grace; and this usage, so far as respects notes negotiable in a particular bank, has been sanctioned by the decisions of this court. Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 582 (§§ 754-759, supra), was a suit brought in a circuit court of the District of Columbia, against the indorser of a promissory note, which had been negotiated in the Bank of Columbia. Payment was demanded, and the note protested on the fourth day after that mentioned in the note as the day on which it became payable. This was proved to have been in conformity with the custom of the bank; and the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury that the demand was not in time, and that the indorser was not liable for the note. This instruction was refused, and the defendant brought the judgment into this court by writ of error. The judgment, on great deliberation, was affirmed. In this case, the custom of the bank was known to the parties to the note. But the question arose afterwards in a case in which the custom was not known to the parties. Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 430 (§§ 958-963, infra), was a suit brought by the bank against the plaintiff in error and others, on a note indorsed by him and negotiated in the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, which was protested for non-payment on the day of [after] the last day of grace. It was proved at the trial that this was according to the usage of that bank. The counsel for the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury that this usage could not bind the indorser, unless he had personal knowledge of it at the time he indorsed the note. The court refused to give the instruction, and the jury found a verdict for the bank, on which judgment was rendered. That judgment was brought before this court and affirmed. The court said that, "when a note is made payable or negotiable at a bank, whose invariable usage it is to demand payment, and give notice on the fourth day of grace, the parties are bound by that usage, whether they have a personal knowledge of it or not." In the case of such a note the parties are presumed, by implication, to agree to be governed by the usage of the bank at which they have chosen to make the security itself negotiable.

These cases decide that under consideration, unless there be a distinction between a bill and a note made negotiable in a particular bank. In the case of a note negotiable in a particular bank, the parties may very fairly be presumed to be acquainted with the usage of that bank. As the decisions which have been cited depend upon that presumption, it will become necessary to inquire how far the same presumption may be justified in the case of a bill drawn on a person residing in a place where this usage is established. If a promissory note were made in the city of Washington, payable to a person residing in the same place, though not purporting to be payable and negotiable in bank, it would very probably be placed in a bank for collection. It is a common practice, and the parties would contemplate such an event as probable when the note was executed. The same reason seems to exist for applying the usage of the bank to such a note as to one expressly made payable and negotiable in bank. Such notes are frequently discounted, and certainly the person who discounts them or places them in bank for collection stands in precisely the same relation to the bank, as respects its usage, as if the notes purported on their face to be negotiable in bank. The maker of a negotiable paper, in such a case, may fairly be presumed to be acquainted with the customary law which governs that paper at his place of residence. In the case at bar, however, the bill was drawn at Alexandria, on a person residing at Washington. Does this circumstance vary the law of the case?

§ 765. Usage of place on which bill is drawn governs as to days of grace.

The usage by which questions of this sort are governed is different in different places. It varies from three to thirty days; and the usage of the place on which the bill is drawn, or where payment is to be demanded, uniformly regulates the number of days of grace which must be allowed. This bill being drawn on a person residing in Washington, and being protested for non-payment in the same place, is, according to the law merchant, to be governed by the usage of Washington. Could this be questioned, still the holder of the bill, who placed it, by his agent, in the Bank of Washington for collection, who has made that bank his agent, without special instructions, submits his bill to their established usage. The cases, then, which have been cited, are not different in principle from this; and payment having been demanded, according to the invariable usage of the bank, was demanded in time. If, then, the objections to the conduct of the bank were confined to the demand of payment and protest for non-payment, the first instruction asked by the defendants in the circuit court ought to have been given. But they are not confined to the demand of payment and to the protest for non-payment. They extend to the steps taken by the bank concerning the presentation of the bill. The second instruction asked for is in terms which are, in some degree, equivocal. It may imply either that the recourse against the drawer of the bill was not lost, or that, if lost, that circumstance would not entitle the plaintiff to recover against the bank; as its decision is not essential to the cause, it will be passed over. The third is more specific. The court is asked to say that the failure of the bank to give notice to the drawer that the drawee was not found at home, when called upon to accept the bill, is not such negligence as discharged the drawer from his liability, and entitles the plaintiff to recover.

§ 766. Notice should be given of refusal by the drawee of a bill to accept it.

The question suggested by this prayer is one on which no decision is found in the books. It depends on analogy, so far as it is to be decided by adjudged cases. Such a bill need not be presented; but if presented, and acceptance be refused, it is dishonored, and notice must be given. Had the bank taken no step whatever to obtain an acceptance, no violation of duty would, according to these decisions, have been committed. Can any unsuccessful attempt to do that which the law does not require, place the agent in the same situation that he would have stood in had the drawee been found, and had positively refused acceptance?

§ 767. Where presentment for acceptance is unnecessary a bill should not be protested for non-acceptance because of the drawee's absence from home.

Absence from home, with a failure to make provision for payment when a bill becomes due, is a failure to pay; but absence from home when the holder of a bill or his agent offers it for acceptance is in no respect culpable. Had the drawee received advice of the bill, he could not have known that it would be presented for acceptance, because the law did not require it, and is consequently not blamable for his absence when the officers of the bank came to present it for acceptance. Had the bill, under such circumstances, been protested for non-acceptance, and returned, the drawer might not have been liable for it. The bill, then, on general principles, ought not to have been protested; and the absence of the drawee ought not to be considered as equivalent to his refusal to accept. It might have been a prudent precaution to have given information that the bill was not accepted, because the drawer had not been found; but we cannot say that the omission would subject the agent to loss, unless such was the special usage of this bank.

§ 768. When a party may conform to his former usage as to presenting bills for acceptance.

4. The fourth prayer is for an instruction to the jury, that, if they believe, from the evidence, that the defendants conformed to their former usage, in regard to such bills, in calling on the drawee for acceptance (the said drawee being from home), and not noting the same as dishonored, and giving notice thereof to the parties on the said bill, then their failure to treat the said bill as dishonored, and to give notice accordingly, of non-acceptance, did not discharge the drawer thereof from his liability to the plaintiff. The court has already indicated the opinion that this omission to treat the bill as dishonored, in consequence of not finding the drawee at home, if the usage of the bank was not to notice such a circumstance, did not discharge the drawer; consequently, this instruction ought to have been given, unless it should be supposed foreign to the case in which it was asked. In a suit brought by the holder against the bank, the court was not bound to declare the law as between the holder and the drawer, unless the liability of the bank was determined by the liability of the drawer. Although, in the general, the one question depends on the other, yet it may not be universally so. The bank was the agent of the holder, not of the drawer, and might consequently so act as to discharge the drawer without becoming liable to its principal. In this case, however, as the agent received no specific instructions, but was left to act according to the law merchant, a course of proceeding which did not discharge the drawer could not render the agent liable to the principal. This prayer was, therefore, essentially the same with that which preceded it, with this difference. The third prays an instruction, whatever might be the usage of the bank; the fourth prays essentially the same instruction, provided the conduct of the bank conformed to its usage. This instruction, therefore, ought to have been given as prayed. Upon a review of the whole case, the court is of opinion that, if the bank acted in conformity with its established usage, in not noting the bill, and giving notice thereof, when the ineffectual attempt was made to present it for acceptance, this action could not be supported. With respect to this usage, the testimony is contradictory, and ought to have been submitted to the jury in conformity with the last prayer made by the counsel for the bank. The court erred in not giving this instruction as prayed. The judgment, therefore, is to be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

This cause came on, etc., on consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the circuit court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, that if they believed that the defendants conformed to their former usage in regard to such bills as the one in question, in calling on the drawee for acceptance (the said drawee being from home), and not noting the same as dishonored, and giving notice thereof to the parties on the said bill, then their failure to treat the said bill as dishonored, and to give notice accordingly of non-acceptance, did not discharge the drawer thereof from his liability to the plaintiffs. It is therefore considered by the court that the said judgment be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the said circuit court, with directions to award a venire facias de novo and to proceed therein according to law.

WISEMAN v. CHIAPELLA.

(23 Howard, 368-380. 1859.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Eastern District of Louisiana.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— The plaintiff in this action alleges that he is the holder and owner of a certain bill of exchange for $2,045.45, dated at Vicksburg, in the state of Mississippi, May 13, 1855, and payable on the 23d November, 1855, which had been drawn by John A. Durden and A. Durden on William Langton & Co., of New Orleans, and accepted by them, payable to the order of Langton, Sears & Co., and by that firm indorsed in blank. He further declares that the bill when it became due was intrusted to the defendant, Achille Chiapella, a commissioned notary public for the city of New Orleans, to demand payment of it from the acceptors, and to protest the same for non-payment should the acceptors dishonor it; and that, from his carelessness in not making a legal demand of the acceptors, and from not having expressed it in the protest, that the indorsers of the bill had been discharged from their obligation to pay it by a judgment of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi. He further alleges that the acceptors, payees and indorsers were insolvent, and that, from the insufficiency of the demand for payment to bind the drawers of the bill, the defendant had become indebted to him for its amount, with interest at the rate of five per cent. from the day that it became due — the 23d November, 1855.

§ 769. Presentment at the acceptor's place of business is sufficient.

The defendant certifies in his notarial protest that the bill had been handed to him on the day it was due; that he went several times to the office of the acceptors of it, in Gravier street, in order to demand payment for the same, and he found the doors closed, and "no person there to answer my demand." It also appeared that one of the firm by which the bill had been accepted had a residence in New Orleans; that no demand for payment had been made individually upon him; and that no further inquiry had been made for the acceptors than the repeated calls which the notary states he had made at their office. We think, under the circumstances, that such repeated calls at the office of the acceptors was a sufficient demand; that further inquiry for them was not required by the custom of merchants; and that the protest, extended as it had been, is in conformity with what is now generally considered to be the established practice in such matters in England and the United States. We say, under the circumstances, for, as there is no fixed mode for making such a demand in all cases, each case as it occurs must be decided on its own facts. We have not been able to find a case, either in our own or in the English reports, in which it has been expressly ruled that a merchant, acceptor of a foreign bill of exchange, having a notorious place of business, has been permitted to close it up during the business hours of the day, thus avoiding the obligation of his acceptance on the day of its maturity, and then that he was allowed to claim that the bill ought to have been presented to him for payment elsewhere than at his place of business. Though such conduct is not absconding, in the legal sense of that word, to avoid the payment of creditors, it must appear, when unexplained, to be an artifice inconsistent with the obligations of an acceptor, from which the law will presume that he does not intend to pay the bill on the day when it has become due.

§ 770. Where the acceptor's house is closed on the day of the maturity of a bill, it is evidence of an intention to dishonor the bill.

The plaintiff in this case does not deny that the office of the acceptors was closed, as the notary states it to have been. The only fact upon which he relies to charge the defendant with neglect is, that one of the firm of Langton, Sears & Co. resided in New Orleans, and that it was the duty of the notary to have made inquiry for him at his residence. No presumption, under such circumstances, can be made, that the acceptors had removed to another place of business, or that they were not intentionally absent from it on the day that they knew the bill was payable. This case, then, must be determined on the fact of the designed absence of the acceptors on that day; and that inference is strengthened by no one having been left there to represent them. All merchants register their acceptances in a bill book. It cannot be presumed that they will be unmindful of the days when they are matured. Should their counting-rooms be closed on such days, the law will presume that it has been done intentionally to avoid payment, and, on that account, that further inquiries need not be made for them before a protest can be made for non-payment. Cases can be found, and many of them, in which further inquiries than a call at the place of business of a merchant acceptor has been deemed proper, and in which such inquiries not having been made, has been declared to be a want of due diligence in making a demand for payment; but the rulings in such cases will be found to have been made on account of some peculiar facts in them which do not exist in this case. And in the same class of cases it has been ruled that the protest should contain a declaration by the notary that his call to present a bill for payment has been made in the business hours of the day; but in no case has the latter ever been presumed in favor of an acceptor, whose place of business has been so closed that a demand for payment could not be made there upon himself or upon some one left there to attend to his business.

Lord Ellenborough said, in the case of Crosse v. Smith, 1 Maule & S., 545: "The counting-house is a place where all appointments respecting business and all notices should be addressed; and it is the duty of the merchant to take care that proper persons shall be in attendance." It was also ruled in that case, that a verbal message, imparting the dishonor of a bill, sent to the counting-house of the drawer during the hours of business, on two successive days, the messenger knocking there, and making a noise sufficient to be heard within, and no one coming, was sufficient notice. In this case the facts were, that Fea & Co. had a counting-house at Hull, where they were merchants, and one lived within one mile and the other within ten miles of Hull. The Monday after Smith & Co. received the bill, their clerk went to give notice, and called at the counting-house of Fea & Co. about half after ten o'clock. He found the outer door open; the inner one locked. He knocked so that he must have been heard, had any one been there, waited two or three minutes, and went away; and on his return from the counting-room he saw Fea & Co.'s attorney, and told him. The next Monday he went again at the same hour, but with no better success. No written notice was left, nor was any notice sent to the residence of either of the parties. The court took time to consider, and then held, without any reference to the clerk having called at the counting-house two successive days, that going to the counting-house at a time it should have been open was sufficient, and that it was not necessary to leave a written notice, or to send to the residence of either of the parties. In Bancroft v. Hall, Holt, 476, the plaintiff received notice of the bill's dishonor at Manchester, 24th May. The same day he sent a letter by a private hand to his agent at Liverpool, to give defendant notice. The agent called at the defendant's counting-house about six or seven P. M., but the counting-house was shut up, and the defendant did not receive notice of the dishonor of the bill until the morning of the 27th—Monday. Two points were ruled: 1st. That sending by a private hand to an agent to give notice was sufficient. 2d. That it was sufficient for the agent to take the ordinary mode to give notice—the ordinary time of shutting up was eight or nine. Where the indorser of a note shut up his house in town soon after the note was made, and before it became due, and retired to his house in the country, intending, however, only a temporary residence in the country, it was held that a notice left at his house, by having been put into the key-hole, was sufficient to charge him. Stewart v. Elen, 2 Caines, 121.

This court held in Williams v. Bank of United States, 2 Pet., 96 (§§ 1003–10, infra), that sufficient diligence had been shown on the part of the holder of a note to charge the indorser, under the following circumstances: A notary public employed for the purpose called at the house of the indorser of a note, to give him notice of its dishonor; and finding the house shut and locked, ascertained from the nearest resident that the indorser and his family had left town on a visit. He made no further inquiry where the indorser had gone, or how long he was expected to be absent, and made no attempt to ascertain whether he had left any person in town to attend to his business, but he left a notice of the dishonor of the note at an adjoining house, requesting the occupant to give it to the indorser upon his return.

§ 771. It is no longer required, where an acceptor has removed from a town, to make effort to find out his new place of business or residence for the purpose of making demand.

In making a demand for an acceptance, the party ought, if possible, to see the drawee personally, or some agent appointed by him to accept; and diligent inquiry must be made for him, if he shall not be found at his house or place of business; but a demand for payment need not be personal, and it will be sufficient if it shall be made at one or the other place in business hours. Chitty, 274, 367. It was formerly the practice, if the house of the acceptor was shut up when the holder called there to present the bill for payment, and no person was there to represent him, and it appeared that he had removed, that the holder was bound to make efforts to find out to what place he had removed and there make a payment [demand]. Such, however, is no longer the practice either in England or in the United States, nor has it been in the United States for many years. It is now sufficient if the bill shall be taken to the residence of the acceptors, as that may be stated in the bill, for the purpose of demanding payment, and to show that the house was shut up, and that no one was there. Hine v. Allely, 4 Barn. & Ad., 624. It has been decided by the supreme court in Tennessee, that the protest of a foreign bill of exchange, drawn upon a firm in New Orleans, with no place of payment designated, where it appeared that the deputy of a regularly commissioned notary had called several times at the office of the acceptors to make demand of payment, but found no one there of whom the demand could be made, was sufficient to excuse a demand, and to fix the liability of the indorsers to whom notice had been given. Union Bank v. Fowlkes, 2 Sneed, 555. The supreme court of Louisiana, in Watson v. Templeton, 11 Annual, 137, declares "that a demand made within the usual hours of business, at the commercial domicile of a partnership, for the payment of a note or bill due by the firm, is a sufficient presentment; that it was not necessary to make a further demand at the private residences of individual persons. The place of business is the domicile of the firm, and it is their duty to have suitable persons there to receive and answer all demands of business made at that place." Going with a promissory note, to demand payment, to the place of business of the notary, in business hours, and finding it shut, is using due diligence. Shed v. Brett, 1 Pick., 413. In the case of the B. B. at Decatur v. Hodges, the supreme court of Alabama say: "The court below excluded the protest for non-payment, because the presentment is stated thereon to have been made of the bookkeeper of the drawees in their counting-room, they being absent. This was erroneous. The bill was presented at the place of business of the firm, at their counting-room. If they had intended to pay the bill, it was their duty to have been present on the day of payment, or to have left means for making such payment in charge of some one authorized to make it. The notary finding them absent from their place of business, and their bookkeeper there, might well make protest of the dishonor of the bill for non-payment upon presentment to, and refusal by, him." When, upon presentment for acceptance, the drawee does not happen to be found at his house or counting-room, but is temporarily absent, and no one is authorized to give an answer whether the bill will be accepted or not, in such case it would seem the holder is not bound to consider it as a refusal to accept, but he may wait a reasonable time for the return of the drawee. He may present the bill on the next day, but this delay is not allowable in a presentment for payment. This must be made on the day the bill falls due; and if there be no one ready at the place to pay the bill, it should be treated as dishonored and protested. Story on Bills, sec. 250; Chitty on Bills (9th ed.), 400.

§ 772. It will be presumed that a presentment was made at a proper hour of the day.

The supreme court of New York has ruled that where a notary's entry case states that presentment and demand were made at the maturity of a bill, at the office of C. & S., the acceptors, this language imports that the office was their place of business, and it will be presumed, in favor of the notary, that the time in the day was proper. Burbank v. Beach, 15 Barb., 326. The preceding citation is in conformity with what the supreme court of New York had ruled thirteen years before, in the case of the Cayuga Bank v. Hart, 2 Hill, 635. Its language is, that where a notarial certificate of a protest of a bill of exchange stated a presentment for payment at the office of an acceptor, on the proper day, and that the office was closed, but was silent as to the hour of the day of doing the act, that it was sufficient, and the regularity in that particular should be presumed.

We infer, from all the cases in our books, notwithstanding many of them are contradictory to subsequent decisions, that the practice now, both in England and the United States, does not require more to be done, in the presentment of a bill of exchange to an acceptor for payment, than that the demand should be made of a merchant acceptor at his counting room or place of business; and if that be closed, so in fact that a demand cannot be made, or that the acceptor is not to be found at his place of business, and has left no one there to pay it, that further inquiry for him is not necessary, and will be considered as due diligence; and that presenting a bill under such circumstances at the place of business of the acceptor will be prima facie evidence that it had been done at a proper time of the day. If that shall be denied, it must be shown by evidence. But whatever may have been the differences between cases upon this subject, both in England and the United States, there has always been a requirement in both countries, and everywhere acknowledged in the United States, which protects the defendant in this suit from any responsibility to the plaintiff. The requirement is this: that the protest was made in this case in conformity with the practice and law of Louisiana, where the bill was payable. Rothschild v. Currie, 1 Q. B., 43; 11 Smedes & M., 182. We are aware of the contrariety of opinion which prevailed for many years in regard to what should be considered due diligence in making a presentment of a bill of exchange for payment to an acceptor of it under such circumstances as are certified to by the notary in this case. We have carefully examined most of them, from the case of Cotton v. Butler, in Strange, 1086, to the year 1856, and we have adopted those of later years as our best guide, and as having a better foundation in reason for the practice and the commercial law of the present day, and because we think it has mostly prevailed in the United States for thirty years.

As the view which we have taken of this case disposes of it in favor of the defendant, we shall not notice another point made in the argument in his behalf, which was that the plaintiff's right of action, if he ever had one against the defendant, was excluded by the Louisiana law of prescription. We direct the affirmance of the judgment of the circuit court.

WALLACE v. AGRY.

(Circuit Court for Maine: 4 Mason, 336-348. 1827.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The brig Diana, Heddean, master, arrived at Havana, Cuba, and procured a partial cargo of sugar, to be carried to Bremen. To make out a full cargo the master bought of the plaintiffs one hundred and fifty boxes of sugar on account of the owners of the brig, defendants in this action. To pay for this sugar the master drew a bill for £348, 6s., 11d., dated June 18, 1825, payable at sixty days' sight, on one Williams, the agent in London of the owners. Williams had funds of theirs in his possession, although this was not known to the master or the plaintiffs, who expected the bill would be paid out of the proceeds of the sugar, which were to be remitted to Williams after it had been sold in Bremen. Insurance was arranged to be effected on the sugar by one Whitney, agent at Boston of plaintiffs. These proceedings were all ratified by the owners of the brig. The brig proceeded on her voyage, and, after notifying Williams of the drawing of the bill and the intended remittance, the master sold the sugar at Bremen and remitted the full amount to Williams, who received it August 19th. The bill was sent to Whitney at Boston, who received it July 7, 1825, with permission to sell it in Boston or remit it to London. He attempted to sell it, but thinking the price of exchange too low he retained it until September 29th, when he sent it to London, directing Williams to place it to his credit. The bill reached London October 31st, and was protested for non-acceptance. Protest and information of all the facts were sent Whitney, and reached him December 28th. He immediately informed defendants by mail of the protest for non-acceptance, but did not transmit the protest or a copy to them. Defendants at first made no objection to their liability to pay; then they expressed dissatisfaction at the long detainer of the bill in Boston, and finally expressed fears of their ability to pay. The action was assumpsit on the bill, and the declaration averred the presentment for acceptance, protest for non-acceptance, and due notice thereof to defendants; and also presentment for payment, and protest for non-payment, and due notice thereof. But no presentment for payment or protest for non-payment was proved in the case. Plea, general issue.

Charge by STORY, J.

Some of the questions of law, in this case, are of considerable importance, and require from the court an explicit opinion. The first objection to the plaintiff's right of recovery is, that no presentment for payment, or protest for non-payment, or due notice thereof to the defendants, is proved according to the allegations of the declaration. I agree that, under the circumstances of this case, the defendants stand in the same situation as if they were the drawers of the bill. They have adopted the acts of the master, and ratified the draft on Williams; and the plaintiff is therefore at liberty to consider them as subject to the same responsibility as if the bill were drawn by them, and no more. See Van Reimsdyk v. Kane, 1 Gall., 630; S. C., 9 Cranch, 155. But if they were drawers of the bill, there would be no necessity of proving the averments in the declaration of presentment for payment and protest, and notice for non-payment. The declaration contains a prior averment of a presentment and protest for non-acceptance, and due notice thereof to the defendants. The cause of action of the plaintiff was complete by such non-acceptance and notice, and it was wholly unnecessary afterwards to make any presentment for payment. The other averments, therefore, of presentment for payment, etc., are wholly immaterial, and may be rejected as surplusage. They constitute no part of the averments entitling the plaintiff to recover. The case is not like that of a material averment, more special than the law requires; there the whole must be proved as laid. But here the averments are distinct of matters foreign to the right of the recovery, and may be rejected without prejudicing the plaintiff's right. Utile per inutile non vitiatur. Such, upon principle, I take the law to be; and the authorities conform to it. Chitty on Bills, 300; 1 Starkie, 7; Mason v. Franklin, 3 Johns., 202.

Then it is said that there can be no recovery upon the money counts in this case, because the taking of the bill of exchange was a satisfaction, and consequently an extinguishment of the original contract for advances to purchase the sugars. And in corroboration of this position it is argued that, by the law of Massachusetts and Maine, the taking of a negotiable security for a debt amounts to an absolute, and not merely to a conditional, payment. The rule is certainly so in these states, with this limitation, that the taking of such security is only prima facie evidence of being an absolute payment; but the fact is open to explanation, and is not conclusive where the other circumstances qualify or repel the presumption. Thatcher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass., 299; Manceley v. M'Gee, 6 Mass., 143; Goodenow v. Tyler, 7 Mass., 36; Johnson v. Johnson, 11 Mass., 359; Chapman v. Durant, 10 Mass., 47; Varner v. Nobleborough, 2

Greenl., 121; Greenwood v. Curtis, 4 Mass., 93. Even with this limitation, however, the rule differs from that of the common law, which is adopted in many of the commercial states in the Union. By the common law a negotiable promissory note given by a debtor to his creditor for a subsisting debt is not a discharge of the debt. It is not, in a legal sense, a security of a higher nature. Rhoades v. Barnes, 1 Burr., 9. But if it be negotiated and outstanding in the hands of a third person at the time of a suit brought for the original debt, it may be pleaded in bar of the action. See Kearslake v. Morgan, 6 Term R., 513; The King v. Dawson, Wight., 32. A note or draft of a third person may, indeed, by express agreement of the parties, be taken as payment and thereby operate as a discharge of the debt; but unless there be such an agreement, or the creditor has been guilty of laches, if the note or draft be dishonored the creditor may resort to his original debt. Puckford v. Maxwell, 6 Term R., 52; Overton v. Morse, 7 Term R., 64. And this doctrine of the common law I take to be extensively adopted in our own commercial states. Tobey v. Barber, 5 Johns., 68; Schemerhorn v. Loines, 7 Johns., 311; Putnam v. Lewis, 8 Johns., 389; Johnson v. Weed, 9 Johns., 310; Pintard v. Tackington, 10 Johns., 104; Holmes v. D'Camp, 1 Johns., 34; Burdick v. Green, 15 Johns., 247; Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch, 253 (§§ 1406-7, infra). But if the doctrine of the Massachusetts and Maine courts were admitted to govern in this case, the circumstances are such as would repel any presumption that the bill was received as absolute payment so as to discharge the owners from personal responsibility in case of its dishonor. On the contrary, the bill seems to have been relied on as collateral security and intended to discharge the debt only upon payment out of the funds which were to be remitted from Bremen. If those funds were not remitted by the master, or the bill were not paid at maturity, it can scarcely be believed that the plaintiff meant to rely exclusively on the credit of the drawer of the bill. The case, however, does not call for any decision on this point because it is not to be governed by the law of Massachusetts or Maine.

§ 774. Transaction in Cuba governed by Spanish law.

It is a transaction originating in and consummated at Cuba, and is to be governed by the law of Spain and not by the law of America applicable to this subject. What is the law of Spain I have no accurate means of knowing, and it is the duty of the party who sets up the defense to establish it in evidence by competent proofs. If he fails so to do the court can take no legal notice of the point. There is, however, much reason to believe that the civil law, which is the law of Spain, does not make a bill of exchange an extinguishment of a prior debt unless the parties expressly so stipulated. See Pothier on Obligations, part 3, ch. 2, art. 4; 1 Domat., B. 4, tit. 3, § 1, p. 491.

§ 775. The protest of non-acceptance or copy thereof need not accompany the notice to the drawers.

Another objection is that the protest of non-acceptance did not accompany the notice to the defendants, and it is strenuously contended that, by our law the notice, without such accompanying protest, or a copy, is a mere nullity. The case of Blakeley v. Grant, 6 Mass., 386, contains a remark which certainly countenances the suggestion, but it was wholly gratuitous in that case, not being called for by any argument urged at the bar or by any facts in controversy. It is, indeed, somewhat questionable whether the remark itself attracted the close observation of the court. I can only say that, as at present advised, I think that the dictum is not law, and I have no reason to suppose that it has been actually conformed to in practice. See Stanton v. Blossom, 14 Mass., 116. The English rule as to foreign bills is directly the other way. It is the clear result of decisions in England purporting to be founded on the general law merchant, that the notice is sufficient though a copy of the protest is not sent. Chitty on Bills (5th ed.), 282; Robins v. Gibson, 3 Camp., 334; S. C., 1 Maule & S., 288; Cromwell v. Hynson, 2 Esp., 511; Chaters v. Bell, 4 Esp., 48. But this bill, being drawn in a foreign country, is, strictly speaking, to be governed on this point by the law of that country as to notice and protest. And in the absence of any other proof the court might well presume that the law of Spain does not differ from that acted upon in England. If it did, the learned counsel for the defendants would doubtless have established it by some competent evidence. See Pothier, Traite de Change, part 1, ch. 5, arts. 149, 150.

But the principal objection is, that there has been gross negligence in the remittance of the bill, and that this, at all events, would discharge the drawer, and by consequence the present defendants. There is a difference between the case of a bill of exchange, drawn payable at so many days after date, and one drawn payable at so many days after sight. In the former case the bill must be presented by the period of its maturity; in the latter it is sufficient if it be presented in a reasonable time. What that reasonable time is, depends upon the circumstances of each particular case, and no definite rule has as yet been laid down, or indeed can be laid down, to govern all cases. The question is a question of fact for the jury, and not of law for the abstract decision of the court. Such, as I take it, is the doctrine of the authorities. There is one other limitation, or rather illustration, of the principle, which is very material. It is this: that the holder is not at liberty to lock up the bill for any length of time in his own possession, but he may put it into circulation, and though it may remain a considerable time in circulation, if there be no unreasonable delay in any of the successive holders, the delay of presentment for acceptance is not fatal to the party in case of a dishonor. Muilman v. D'Eguino, 2 H. Black., 565; Goupy v. Harden, 7 Taunt., 159; Fry v. Hill, 7 Taunt., 397; Field v. Nickerson, 13 Mass., 131; Kyd on Bills, 117; Bayley on Bills (2d ed.), 60; Chitty on Bills (5th ed.), 208. In the present case the bill was not put into circulation, but was locked up in the hands of the agent of the plaintiff, at Boston, from the 6th of July to the 29th of September. It has been said that the plaintiff was bound to send it direct from Havana to England by some regular conveyance, and had no right to remit it to Boston for sale. I am of a different opinion. The party who receives a negotiable bill, payable after sight, has a right to sell it in the market where he resides, or to send it to any other place for sale. He is not bound personally to make a remittance of it or to send it directly to the country on which it is drawn. He is at full liberty to put it in circulation or to send it to any other place for sale or remittance; and the only limitation upon this right is, that he shall have it presented within a reasonable time, be the conveyance direct or indirect. To be sure, the usage of trade is to be consulted on this as on other occasions. The holder of such a bill is not at liberty to send it to very remote places, wholly out of the course of trade, if there be unreasonable delay thereby in the presentment for acceptance, and thus to fix the drawer with an indefinite responsibility. But, on the other hand, the transmission in a direct trade is not necessary. No one can doubt that, by the course of trade, many bills of exchange, drawn in the Havana on England, are sent to the United States for remittance or sale. The very testimony in this case establishes this fact. It would be a most inconvenient rule to hold that such a negotiation of bills was at the sole peril of the holder. I know of no rule of law reaching to such extent. In my judgment, the remittance of the bill to Boston for sale was not a discharge of the defendants.

Then as to the delay. The jury must, independent of the asserted agreement, look to all the circumstances. If the bill had been presented before the 19th of August, when the funds reached Williams, it would have been protested for non-acceptance. That it was in the contemplation of all the parties that the bill should or might be retarded, so as not to reach the drawee before the fund, is most manifest from all the circumstances of the case. The whole arrangement proceeded upon this as an implied basis; for otherwise, in case the bill were sold, it would be returned by the holder, with heavy damages against the prior parties, since his right of action would be complete by the dishonor, and he would not be obliged to wait for the funds. Now the bill itself would not have been paid, if it had been presented later than the 21st of August, for it would not have arrived at maturity, if presented at a later period, before Williams' failure, which was on the 24th of October. In reality, then, there were but two days for the presentment of the bill, in which acceptance and payment would have followed each other. The loss, therefore, which has been sustained, cannot have arisen from any want of due presentment, unless there was an unreasonable delay in not remitting the bill before the 21st of August. The evidence establishes the usual average time of remitting bills from Havana to London, by common conveyances, to be about fifty days; and calculating this to be the earliest period for remittance, where there is no delay, the bill, if sent on its passage on the 20th of June, would not have reached London sooner than the 10th of August; and supposing the remittance to Boston justifiable, not until the 25th of August. In this view there can scarcely arise the least doubt that there was no delay in not remitting the bill until after the funds reached London. The plaintiff, having sent the bill to Boston for sale, had a right to some time to look out for a purchaser; and in the uncertainty of the time when the funds might be expected to reach London, he ought to be allowed, for the benefit of all concerned, a liberal indulgence as to his calculations of time. The only real difficulty is, whether the subsequent delay to the 29th of September was not an unreasonable time, not because it actually occasioned the loss, but because it was a giving credit to the drawee, and thereby putting the bill at the risk of the plaintiff, as to the solvency of the drawee. In coming to a conclusion upon this point, the jury will weigh the whole evidence, and take into consideration the course of trade, and the understanding of the parties in this particular case. If there has been any act of the defendants, or their agent, adopting the delay, or recognizing their responsibility with full knowledge of the delay, that would be decisive of itself. But in the absence of such evidence, it will still be for them to say whether the delay be, upon all circumstances, unreasonable.

Hitherto I have considered the case as if it were governed by the rules of the common law; but as I have before observed, the case arose in Cuba, and in this, as in other respects, it must be governed by the Spanish law. It has been treated, however, as a question not varied by any thing peculiar to the law of Spain, and therefore the court has given its opinion accordingly. It is most probable that the Spanish law is quite as indulgent, if not more so than ours, to the rights of the holder. See Pothier's Traite du Contract de Change, part 1, ch. 5, § 2, art. 143; Locré's Esprit du Code de Commerce, 2 tom., p. 242; Code de Commerce, lib. 1, tit. 8, § 11, art. 160, etc. If there was any special agreement in the case, beyond what the other facts would naturally imply, it will, of course, be conclusive upon the point now under consideration. The testimony is in conflict, and it will be for the jury to decide upon the credit to which it is entitled.

ADAMS v. OTTERBACK.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MCLEAN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was a writ of error to the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia. This action was brought on a promissory note dated the 11th March, 1848, given by George W. Yellett, Henry Haw and William B. Scott, in the name of Haw, Yellett & Co., in which they promised to pay to Phillip Otterback, Esquire, or order, sixty days after date, the sum of $800 for value received; which note, before it became due, was assigned to the plaintiff. The general issue was pleaded, and the cause was tried by a jury.

The note was discounted by the Bank of Washington, the proceeds of which were drawn by the defendant.

The following facts appear in the bill of exceptions: The note was unpaid at maturity, and on Monday, the 15th of May, after three o'clock of that day, was delivered by the bank to George Sweeney, the notary employed by said bank, to demand payment thereof, and for protest if not paid. The notary stated that he demanded payment at the United States Hotel, and was answered "neither of the proprietors are within, and it cannot be paid." On the same day notice was left at the dwelling of the indorser. The witness further stated that he had been teller of the bank since the year 1836, and that after the decision of the case of Cookendorfer v. Preston, by the supreme court, in 1846, 4 How., 317, the said bank changed the usage and custom which had theretofore prevailed therein, in regard to the demand and protest of negotiable paper held and discounted by it; and in all cases of discount they thereafter held the paper until the fourth day of grace; and if the said fourth day fell on Sunday, it was under the said change the custom of the bank to retain it until Monday, and on that day to deliver the same to the notary to demand payment and give notice; and Sylvester B. Bowman, bookkeeper of the bank, states that since the decision of said case, the usage had been changed by the bank, as above stated. No notice of such change had been given, so far as the witness knew; and it was further stated, that four cases had occurred in which the notes becoming due on Sunday, the notice was given on Monday. On the evidence, this court instructed the jury that the plaintiff had not used due diligence in demanding payment and giving notice of non-payment to the indorser—to which the plaintiff excepted.

§ 777. Usage as to making demand sanctioned.

This court, by several decisions, have sanctioned the usages of banks in this District, in making demand and giving notice of non-payment, varying from the law merchant (Rennér v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 587, 588; Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 431), and in some instances where, in this respect, notes left in a bank for collection, have been placed on a different footing from notes discounted. Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How., 324.

§ 778. Usage must be of long standing and general notoriety.

But these usages had been of long standing and of general notoriety. Rights had grown up under them which could not be disregarded without injury to commercial transactions. In the case before us, the usage relied on, and under which notice to the indorser was given, had been adopted by the bank two years before the note in question was discounted, but it seems only four cases had occurred under it. No public notice was given at the time of its adoption, and no presumption can arise, from the facts stated, that the indorser could have had notice of the usage. It is said, if a bank may establish a usage, it may change it; and that there must be a beginning of acts under it. This may be admitted, but it does not follow that a usage is obligatory from the time of its adoption. To give it the force of law, it requires an acquiescence and a notoriety, from which an inference may be drawn that it is known to the public, and especially to those who do business with the bank. It is unnecessary to consider whether a usage adopted might acquire force from public notices generally circulated. No such notice was given in this case.

§ 779. Usage must be of a place, not of a bank.

But to constitute a usage, it must apply to a place, rather than to a particular bank. It must be the rule of all the banks of the place, or it cannot, consistently, be called a usage. If every bank could establish its own usage, the confusion and uncertainty would greatly exceed any local convenience resulting from the arrangement. In this country and in England, three days of grace are given by the general commercial law, and the day the note matures is not one of them. In Hamburg, the day the bill falls due makes one of the days of grace. Notice must be given to the drawer or indorser on the day the dishonor takes place, or on the next day. If notice be given through the post-office, it must be forwarded by the first mail after the demand of payment. If the note fall due on Sunday, under the general law, the demand of payment must be made on Saturday. The usage is not proved in this case. Four instances, in the course of two years, are insufficient to establish a usage. Such a rule would, in effect, abolish the commercial law, in regard to demand and notice on promissory notes and bills of exchange. There is ground to doubt whether any deviation from the general law has not been productive of inconvenience.

§ 780. A demand made for payment at a hotel, without explanation, is insufficient.

No explanation is given why the demand of payment on the note was made at the United States Hotel, in this city. Such a demand would seem to be insufficient.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that there was no error in the instructions of the court to the jury; the judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed.

MITCHELL v. DEGRAND.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 1 Mason, 176-182. 1817.)

Opinion by STORY, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action on a bill of exchange brought by the payee against the drawer. The bill was payable five days after sight, and was presented at the counting room of the drawee for acceptance on the 30th of September. No acceptance was then made, the drawee being absent on military duty, and his clerk expressing only an opinion that it would be accepted by the drawee.

§ 781. Where the holder of a bill elects to consider it dishonored for non-acceptance, and has it protested, he is bound to give the drawer notice.

I do not say that, under these circumstances, the holder was bound to treat what passed between him and the clerk as a non-acceptance of the bill. On the contrary, he might properly have waited until the next day as a reasonable time to ascertain the intentions of the drawee, and such delay could not have been deemed laches on his part. But he elected to consider the bill as dishonored on the 30th of September, and protested it accordingly for non-acceptance. And the question now is whether, as to all the other parties to the bill, he is not bound by that act; and I am very clear that he is. When a bill is once dishonored, the holder is bound to give notice, by the next practicable mail, to the parties whom he means to charge for the default. Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat., 377. By the legal construction of the contract they have a right to such notice, and the omission to give it with due and seasonable diligence discharges them from every legal liability upon the bill. No such notice was given in this case, and therefore the drawer was absolved from all liability.

But it is said that on the 1st of October, and before the mail for Boston was closed on that day, the drawee accepted the bill, and thereby notice became unnecessary. Assuming that the evidence in this case clearly shows an acceptance, still in my judgment it does not change the previous legal predicament of the parties. When once a bill is dishonored, the right of the other parties to notice immediately and absolutely attaches, and no subsequent acts between the holder and drawee can vary that right. Whatever is afterwards done by the holder is at his own peril, and cannot change the responsibility of others. A holder cannot elect to treat a bill as dishonored and afterwards as duly honored. The consequences of such a doctrine would be the most mischievous to the commercial world; and I have no difficulty in holding it not to be law.

§ 783. Payment must be demanded upon the day when the instrument falls due. An acceptance takes effect from the time when done.

But supposing this point were doubtful, there is another, which is decisive against the plaintiff. The acceptance, if any, was certainly not made before the 1st day of October; and upon that supposition, the bill being payable five days after sight, was payable on the 9th, and not on the 8th, day of October; payment was, therefore, demanded a day before the bill became due. To avoid this conclusion, it is argued that the acceptance may be considered as relating back to the 30th of September, when the bill was first presented. But neither of these grounds can be maintained. The doctrine of relation cannot apply to cases of this nature. The acceptance or non-acceptance of a bill is a single act, taking effect from the time when done, and having no retroactive operation. How can it be possible to say that this bill was accepted on the 30th of September, when the party has expressly protested it for non-acceptance on that day?

§ 784. Where a bill is payable so many days after sight, the time begins to run from the presentment and acceptance.

There is as little foundation for the other suggestion. A bill, payable in so many days after sight, means after so many days legal sight. Now, it is not merely the fact of having seen the bill or known of its existence that constitutes a presentment to the drawee in legal contemplation. It must be presented to him for acceptance, and the time of the bill begins to run, not from the presentment, but from the presentment and acceptance. If the acceptance be general, it is in legal construction an agreement to pay in so many days after the acceptance, for that is the sight which the drawee admits and refers to. A different doctrine is supposed by Mr. Justice Bayley (Bayley on Bills, 67; but see id., 53) to be asserted by Beawes (Beawes on Bills of Exchange, sec. 252, 1 vol., 455, edit., 8vo., 1795); and if it be so (which is not admitted), I should not incline to uphold his authority against that of Marius (Marius on Bills, 19), who holds the doctrine I have asserted, and which, I think, stands sustained upon principle as well as authority.

Plaintiff non-suited.

DOREMUS v. BURTON.

(Circuit Court for Wisconsin: 5 Bissell, 57-59. 1860.)

Opinion by MILLER, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—At the trial of this cause, which is a suit against the defendant as indorser of several promissory notes, it was objected that one of the notes became payable on Sunday, and that it was protested on Saturday previous for non-payment. These notes were negotiable, without days of grace. The court advised the jury to include this note in their calculation of the damages, and on a motion for a new trial the question could be considered, and if the assessment was found not to be legal, the plaintiff might remit the amount or a new trial would be ordered. On the motion for that purpose, I have examined the subject.

§ 785. Note falling due on Sunday; demand to be made on Saturday.

The law is universal in this country and in England that where the last day of grace falls on Sunday, demand and notice must be made on the Saturday previous. Such is the law of the supreme court of the United States. Lindenberger v. Beall, 6 Wheat., 104. In Chitty on Bills, 377, it is stated that, "In this country [England], at common law, if the day on which a bill would otherwise be due falls on Sunday, or a great holiday, as Christmas day, the bill falls due on the day before; and where a third day of grace falls on a Sunday, the bill must be presented on Saturday, the second day of grace; whereas, otherwise, a presentment on a second day of grace, being premature, would be a nullity." The reason of the rule as to notes in which days of grace are allowable is that as the allowance of days of grace is a mere indulgence to the maker, it shall be granted only in cases where it will not work any extra delay to the holder of the note, who is entitled to strict payment. If any other rule were adopted, he would be compelled to lose the use of his money for four days. But in practice, and in fact, according to the law of this state, a note for thirty days, where days of grace are not waived, as in this note, is a note for thirty-three days,—so understood when the note is given and received, such is the contract. Now the question is, does the waiver of the days of grace extend to the maker one additional day when the day of payment falls on Sunday? At the trial I was inclined to place the note in this respect as a non-negotiable contract, which it was understood would not be payable until the Monday following. In a note to section 220, Story on Promissory Notes, the above remark of Chitty is copied. This seems to confirm the principle that, at common law, this note would be payable on Saturday. In the case of Banker v. Parker, 6 Pick., 80, it is stated by the court that the note in suit fell due on Sunday, and, having been made in 1824, was not entitled to grace, the statute allowing grace on promissory notes not having been passed until 1825. The note became due, therefore, on the 13th of November, 1825, and should have been demanded on the 12th, as the day of payment, according to the note, was Sunday. Reference is made to Jones v. Fales, 4 Mass., 245. Such seems to have been the common law of Massachusetts. In the case of Avery v. Stewart, 2 Conn., 69, the note sued on was for a certain sum in cotton yarn and was not negotiable. It fell due on Sunday, and a tender of the yarn was made on the Monday following. The court, six judges to three, decided that the tender on Monday was good and in time. The supreme court of New York, in the case of Salter v. Burt, 20 Wend., 205, decided that the check in suit having been protested, which was payable on the day of its date, which was Sunday, could not be demanded until the Monday following. It is apparent that it could not be presented at the bank for payment on Saturday, as it did not bear date on that day, but on the day following. It did not purport to have been written on Saturday. The reason given by the court favors the idea that this note was payable on Monday; but although the decision was correct, the reasoning may possibly be wrong. It is very certain that a presentment of the check on Saturday would be premature.

The note in suit being a negotiable note, with grace waived, is to be considered the same in regard to Sunday being the day of payment as if the waiver had not been made. When the note was made the maker may possibly have known that the day of payment would fall on a day on which it would be illegal to make demand. At all events, the instrument is to be considered against the maker, and upon such principles is not to be so construed as to allow an indorser to escape. The motion for a new trial will be overruled and judgment entered on the verdict.

MARTIN v. WINSLOW.

(Circuit Court for Rhode Island: 2 Mason, 241-243. 1821.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action of assumpsit on a promissory note,—indorsee against indorser. The note was made by Rousmaniere, and was payable on demand at the New England Commercial Bank, Newport. General issue. Plaintiff admitted on the trial that he never left the note at the bank, and never demanded payment of Rousmaniere. Rousmaniere died insolvent, and demand was at once made upon his administrators, and notice given to defendant and payment demanded. It appeared that defendant admitted the notice, but that he was insolvent and had no objection to the notes coming in with his other debts. Whether he had notice at the time that payment had never been demanded of the maker did not appear. The note was given in renewal of another note payable in nine months.

§ 786. Time of presentation of demand note.

Charge by STORY, J.

I have no hesitation in saying that a note payable on demand must be demanded within a reasonable time, otherwise the indorser is discharged. What shall constitute a reasonable time is not a matter of absolute certainty as to which a definite rule can be laid down. It must depend upon circumstances. But unless there be circumstances in the case which account for the delay, a neglect to demand payment of such a note for more than seven months is an unreasonable delay, and discharges the indorser. If the fact of such delay for such a length of time appear naked of all circumstances, it is a discharge of the indorser. And the onus to establish any justification or excuse for such delay lies on the plaintiff. It makes no difference in the case that the indorsement was in lieu of a former security between the same parties, or was for the accommodation of the maker, unless the indorser assented to the delay. It will be for the jury to decide whether there are any circumstances in this case from which an assent to this delay can be inferred.

§ 787. Indorsers are not bound by a new promise to pay, unless made with a full knowledge of all circumstances attending the delay.

Then, as to the second point, a promise to pay with a full knowledge of all the facts is binding upon the indorser, although he might otherwise be discharged. But if he promise in ignorance of material facts affecting his rights, it is not a waiver of those rights. The question then is, whether the indorser in this case had such knowledge. It may be inferred from the connection between the parties, their near relationship and the deep interest which the defendant had in this particular case to ascertain, after the death of the maker, his own responsibility as indorser. It may also be inferred from the language used by him on this occasion. He did not object to the delay, though he knew the length of time which had elapsed since the note was given. As no objection of this sort was made, it leads to the presumption either that the indorser understood originally that the note was to lie unpaid for a period at least as long, or that under all the circumstances he did not deem it an unreasonable delay. He had no ground to presume that any demand of payment was made of the maker in his life-time, and the fact that the first known demand was on the administrators, and the first notice given to him after that demand, would strongly lead him to the conclusion that there had been no prior demand. And in fact no prior demand was made. But as these are mere presumptions of fact arising from circumstances, the jury will give them what weight they think them entitled to.

BRENT v. BANK OF METROPOLIS.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was a suit brought in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia on a note made by G. A. Carroll, and indorsed by William Carroll and Robert Brent, the testator of the plaintiffs in error, and made negotiable in the Bank of the Metropolis. The declaration set out the note, and averred a demand of the same “at the Bank of the Metropolis,” where the said note was negotiable. At the trial the plaintiffs below proved that the accommodation given by the bank to said G. A. Carroll, on a note similarly drawn and indorsed with the present, was given by the bank about three years before the date of the note on which this suit was brought, and was given with the knowledge of the indorsers thereon, and in consequence of their solicitation. For the purpose of showing an agreement between the bank and the maker of the note, that the note to be discounted, and those thereafter to be made for its renewal, should be payable at the Bank of the Metropolis, and there demanded, the bank proved by parol testimony that the said G. A. Carroll did not reside in the district after the winter of 1817, in which W. Carroll lived in Washington, but resided at Port Tobacco, in Maryland, about twenty miles from the city, which he occasionally visited; that many of the notes taken for the continuance of the accommodation were expressed to be payable at the said bank; and that all the notes previous to that on which this suit was brought were there demanded, which demand was acquiesced in as sufficient, and subsequent notes given in renewal of those so demanded. The bank also proved that it was its custom, in all cases where the maker was a non-resident, to require an agreement to pay such notes at the bank, and that they never would have agreed to discount the said notes but on this condition. The counsel for the defendants below objected to this testimony, but the court permitted it to go to the jury. The counsel for the defendants below then prayed the court to instruct the jury that, to enable the plaintiffs to sustain their action, it was necessary to prove that a personal demand had been made on the maker of the note. The court refused to give this instruction, but did instruct the jury that, if they should be satisfied from the evidence that it was agreed by all the parties whose names appear on the notes that the payment should be demanded at the Bank of the Metropolis, and that it was so demanded, then a personal demand on the maker was not necessary. An exception was taken to these opinions of the court, and their correctness is now to be examined.

§ 788. Parol evidence admissible to show agreement as to place of demand.

The plaintiffs in error contend that the testimony ought not to have been admitted, because it is an attempt, by parol proof, to vary a written instrument. But this is not an attempt to vary a written instrument. The place of demand is not expressed on the face of the note, and the necessity of a demand on the person, when the parties are silent, is an inference of law which is drawn only when they are silent. A parol agreement puts an end to this inference, and dispenses with a personal demand. The parties consent to a demand at a stipulated place, instead of a demand on the person of the maker; and this does not alter the instrument, so far as it goes, but supplies extrinsic circumstances, which the parties are at liberty to supply.

No demand is necessary to sustain a suit against the maker. His undertaking is unconditional, but the indorser undertakes conditionally to pay, if the maker does not; and this imposes on the holder the necessity of taking the proper steps to obtain payment from the maker. This contract is not written, but is implied. It is, that due diligence to obtain payment from the maker shall be used. When the parties agree what this due diligence shall be they do not alter the written contract, but agree upon an extrinsic circumstance, and substitute that agreement for an act which the law prescribes only when they are silent. We think, then, that there was no error in admitting the parol evidence which was offered to sustain the action. If the testimony was admissible, there is no error in the instruction given by the court. It was, that if the jury believed, from the evidence, that it was agreed by all the parties that the demand should be made at the Bank of the Metropolis, and that it was so made, then a demand of the maker was not necessary. This point is, we think, involved in the question respecting the admissibility of parol testimony to establish the agreement. Had the note purported on its face to be payable at the Bank of the Metropolis, that express agreement would undoubtedly have dispensed with a personal demand. If that agreement can be made by parol (and, unless it can, the testimony was inadmissible), the effect of the parol contract is the same on this point as if it had been in writing. The only inquiry, therefore, is whether the testimony was sufficient to be submitted to the jury for the purpose of proving the agreement. We think it was.

§ 790. Agreement to dispense with demand on the maker.

The circumstances that the indorsers were themselves active in procuring the accommodation for the maker of the note; that the accommodation had been continued for years without a demand on the person of the maker; that it was the invariable usage of the bank, when the maker of an accommodation note resided out of the city, to require, as the condition of the loan, a stipulation that a demand at the bank should be sufficient; that this accommodation would not have been continued after the removal of the maker out of the city, but on this condition; that the note purports, on its face, to be negotiable at the Bank of the Metropolis,—are facts from which the jury might justifiably infer the agreement of the parties to dispense with a demand on the person of the maker.

§ 791. Demand on maker must be made or excused to charge indorser.

A verdict having been rendered for the bank, the defendants in the court below filed errors in arrest of judgment. The error alleged is that the first count in the declaration neither charges a personal demand on the maker of the note, nor excuses the omission to make such demand. The declaration certainly does not charge a demand on the person of the maker; but this was not necessary, if the parties had agreed that a demand at the bank should be substituted for a demand on the maker. The plaintiffs in error contend that the agreement is not alleged in the declaration, and we admit that the omission to make this averment would be fatal. In that event, the plaintiff below would have shown no cause of action. But the declaration avers a demand of the note "at the Bank of the Metropolis," where the said note was payable. The note is set out in the declaration, and does not purport, on its face, to be made payable at the bank. But the averment in the declaration, that it was payable there, cannot be true, unless there was an agreement of the parties to that effect. It is an averment which must have been proved at the trial, or the plaintiff below could not have obtained a verdict and judgment. After a verdict, it is, we think, sufficient to sustain the judgment. There is no error, and the judgment is affirmed, with costs.

COX v. NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Kentucky.

§ 792. Nature of bills of exchange; place of presentment.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Bills of exchange are written orders or requests from one party to another for the payment of money to a third person or his order, on account of the drawer, and, if payable at sight or at a date subsequent to the acceptance by the drawee, the instrument must be duly presented for payment, else the parties to the same conditionally liable for the payment of the amount will be discharged. Different rules prevail as to the place where the presentment for payment must be made, dependent upon the form of the instrument and the place where and the terms in which it was accepted.

§ 793. Acceptance and protest.

Such an instrument must first be accepted; and if, when presented for that purpose, the drawee refuses to accept the same, it must, if it is a foreign bill, be protested for non-acceptance, the rule being that the place of protest is the place where the same is required to be presented for acceptance, unless it is in terms payable at some other place. Due presentment for payment must also be made, the general rule being that the place of payment is the place where the acceptor resides, or where on the face of the bill it is addressed to him, unless some other place is specifically designated in the instrument. Story, Bills, secs. 48, 282.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Sufficient appears to show that the subject matter of the present controversy is a bill of exchange drawn by the defendant first named, the address to the drawees being “Messrs. Cox & Cowan, New York, N. Y.,” for the sum of $5,000, payable eighty days from date, value received, and the indorsement on the face of the bill is as follows: “Accepted. Cox & Cowan.” That the bill was duly presented for acceptance, and that it was accepted by the drawees in the manner described, is admitted; nor is it denied that it was duly indorsed by the payee, nor that the plaintiff bank became the bona fide holder of the bill by virtue of the second indorsement exhibited in the record. Payment of the bill at maturity being refused, the plaintiff bank, as the lawful holder of the same, caused it to be protested, and instituted the present action against the drawer, the acceptors and the payee as the first indorser, to recover the amount. Process was served, and the drawer and indorser appeared and filed separate answers. Though the answers are separate, yet the material defenses in each are the same, and may be considered together. They are as follows: 1. That the bill was not duly presented to the acceptors for payment. 2. That it was not duly protested for non-payment. 3. That due notice was never given to the drawer of the dishonor of the bill or of the failure of the acceptors to pay the same at maturity. Amended answers having subsequently been filed by the same parties, they went to trial, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff bank against the drawer, acceptors and indorser for the amount specified in the transcript. Exceptions were filed by the defendants, and they sued out the present writ of error.

Since the cause was entered here, the defendants have assigned for error the following causes: 1. That the circuit court erred in instructing the jury that the bill, being addressed to the drawees, “New York, N. Y.,” is in law payable in New York city. 2. That the circuit court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the acceptance of the bill, as shown in the transcript, was a general acceptance, which made the bill payable at no particular place. 3. That the circuit court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that, in order to charge the defendants, the officers of the plaintiff bank, if they knew at the maturity of the bill where the residence and place of business of the acceptors were, as stated in the answers, must show that the bill was presented and that payment was demanded at their residence or place of business. 4. That the circuit court erred in instructing the jury that if the notary made reasonable and diligent inquiry for the acceptors and their place of business in the city of New York, and could not find either their residence or place of business, and that he then demanded payment during business hours at the place or places frequented by them when in said city, that such a demand was a sufficient presentment to maintain the action. Evidence was introduced by the defendants tending to show that throughout the transaction they were all residents of the state of Kentucky, and that the bill in question was drawn and indorsed in the state; that it was sent by one Thompson to the firm of Wright & Co., who delivered the same to the plaintiff bank or their officers, who were informed where the bill was executed by the drawer and indorser. They also introduced testimony showing that the officers of the bank, when they took the bill, knew where the drawer resided when it was forwarded, and afterwards when it was accepted by the drawees. Explanatory evidence was also given by the plaintiff bank showing that no sort of agency existed between the person by whom the bill was forwarded and the firm by whom it was delivered and the plaintiff bank, and that the former never had any communication with the bank, and never informed either the bank or the said firm of the postoffice address of any one of the defendants.

§ 794. Rule as to presentment, protest and notice.

Commercial rules everywhere require that to fix the liability of the drawer of a bill of exchange or the indorser of a bill or note, there must be a legal presentment of the instrument to the acceptor or maker, or payment must be demanded of such a party on the day the instrument becomes payable. That payment must be demanded from the maker of a note and notice of its non-payment forwarded to the indorser in due time, in order to render him liable, is so firmly settled, says Marshall, C. J., that no authority need be cited to support the proposition. Magruder v. Bank, 3 Pet., 87, 90 (§§ 752, 753, supra); Juniata Bank v. Hale, 16 Serg. & R. (Pa.), 157. Nobody doubts the correctness of that rule; and it is equally well settled that when a note or bill is expressed to be payable at a particular place, a demand there is always sufficient to charge the indorser. Story, Bills (4th ed.), sec. 357; Chitty, Bills (13th Am. ed.), 407; Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B., 165; Picquet v. Curtis, 1 Sumn., 478. Text-writers of undoubted authority state that an acceptance is an engagement to pay the bill according to the tenor of the acceptance, and that a general acceptance is an engagement to pay according to the tenor of the bill. Bayley, Bills (5th ed.), 154; Chitty, Bills (13th Am. ed.), 342. Cases arise where the drawer of a bill of exchange designates in the instrument the place of payment, and the decisions are that in such a case both the drawer and the indorser will be discharged unless the bill be there presented for payment at maturity; but the same decisions hold otherwise as to the maker of a note and the acceptor of a bill, the rule being that, unless the restrictive words "only and not elsewhere" are added, no presentment there at maturity or afterwards is necessary to charge such a party. Foden v. Sharp, 4 Johns. (N. Y.), 183; Wolcott v. Van Santvoord, 17 id., 248.

§ 795. As to place of presentment.

Where no place of payment is expressed in a bill or note, the general rule, in the absence of any agreement or circumstances fixing or indicating a different intention, is that the place of presentment is the place where the acceptor or maker resides, or at their usual place of business. Circumstances, however, may control the usual inference arising from the want of any such expression in the instrument which may warrant a very different conclusion. Thus, if a bill were drawn upon a merchant when abroad, and should be addressed to him at Paris or at London, the place of payment would be the place where the drawer accepted the instrument, whether Paris or London, and not the place of his residence when the bill was drawn or at its maturity. 1 Daniel, Negotiable Securities (2d ed.), sec. 90. Provided no place is designated or agreed or indicated in the form of the address or the terms of the acceptance, the rule then is that the presentment for payment must be made at the home or domicile of the acceptor or maker, or at their usual place of business during business hours. Id., sec. 635. Parol testimony to show such an agreement is admissible, it being settled law that the introduction of such testimony is not inconsistent with the rule that a written instrument cannot be varied by parol evidence. Brent v. Bank of Metropolis, 1 Pet., 89, 92 (§§ 788-791, supra).

§ 796. Liability of makers and acceptors.

Unlike the indorser, the maker of a promissory note is liable without any demand of payment. His undertaking is unconditional; but the indorser only undertakes to pay if the maker does not, which makes it necessary for the holder to take proper steps to obtain payment from the maker, from which it follows that his contract is that due diligence shall be used to that end; and when the parties agree what shall constitute due diligence in the particular case, says Marshall, C. J., they do not alter the written contract, but agree upon an extrinsic circumstance, and substitute that agreement for an act which the law prescribes as such when they are silent. Acceptors of a bill of exchange stand in the same relation to the drawee of the bill as the maker of a note does to the payee, the acceptor being the principal debtor in a bill precisely as the maker is of a promissory note, the rule being that the liability of the acceptor is governed by the terms of his acceptance, just as the liability of the maker of a note is defined and governed by the terms of a note; nor can the place of payment be of any more importance in the one case than in the other.

§ 797. Bills payable at a particular place.

When a note or bill is made payable at a particular bank, as is frequently the case, it is well known that, according to the usual course of business, the note or bill is usually lodged in the bank for collection; and if the maker or acceptor calls to take it up when it falls due, and it is delivered to him, and he pays the amount, the business is closed; but if he does not find the note or bill at the bank, he can deposit the money to meet the same when it shall be presented, and the proof of such tender and deposit, in case of a subsequent suit, will exonerate him from all costs and damages. Or should the note or bill be made payable at some other place than a bank, and no deposit should be made, or he should choose to retain the money in his own possession, an offer to pay at the time and place would protect him against interest and costs on bringing the money into court. Rules of a different character have sometimes prevailed in other jurisdictions, but the principles to be applied in such a case are settled in this court; nor is it necessary, where the note or bill is payable at a specified time and place, to aver in the declaration or prove at the trial that a demand was made at that place, in order to maintain the action, the established rule being that if the maker or acceptor was at the place at the time designated, and was ready and offered to pay the money, it is matter of defense to be pleaded and proved. Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet., 136, 150; 1 Daniel, Negotiable Securities (2d ed.), sec. 643; Edwards, Bills (2d ed.), 150; Rowe v. Young, 2 Bl., 391, 395. Beyond doubt, these principles are applicable, as determined by this court, where the suit is against the maker of the note or the acceptor of the bill; but when recourse is had to the indorser of the note or the drawer of the bill, very different considerations arise, as they are not the principal debtors to the holder of the instrument. Their undertaking is not absolute, like that of the maker of the note or the acceptor of the bill, but conditional, that if the maker in the one case, or the acceptor in the other, refuses to make good the undertaking, they will pay the amount. Hence, the holder is bound to use due diligence to obtain payment from the maker or acceptor, as a condition precedent to his right to recover of the parties only conditionally liable. Consequently, when a place of payment is designated in the body of the note or bill, the drawer or indorser has a right to presume that the maker or acceptor has provided funds at such place to pay the note or bill, and to require the holder to apply for payment at such place, unless when the place designated is a bank, and the bank is the holder of the instrument, when the rule does not apply. In all other cases the obligation is absolute, that the holder must aver and prove a presentment at the designated place, unless the necessity is obviated by agreement, or something appearing in the instrument to indicate a different intention. Bank of United States v. Smith, 11 Wheat., 171, 175. Suppose that is so, then there never need be any difficulty in determining the rights of the parties in such a case where the place of payment is specifically designated in the bill, or where the terms of the instrument contain no such designation whatever, as the rule of procedure in each case, though different, is equally plain and unmistakable. Nor do the parties here differ in respect to those rules; but the plaintiff bank contends that the bill in question brings the case within the category of the first case, but the defendants insist that it falls within the second, where no place of payment is designated.

§ 798. The place indicated in the address of a bill of exchange is fixed as the place of payment by that address.

Looking at the terms of the bill, independent of the address to the drawees and the acceptance written across the face of the bill, it would seem that the theory of the defendants is correct; but the bill is addressed to "Messrs. Cox & Cowan, New York, N. Y.," as drawees, and is by them accepted without explanation or condition, from which it follows as a reasonable inference that they accepted the bill as if they were at the time in the city of New York; and having so accepted it without explanation or condition, the legal construction of the instrument is that it became payable when it fell due at the place designated by the address as the place where the acceptance took place. Halstead v. Skelton, 5 Q. B., 86; 1 & 2 Geo. IV., c. 78; 38 British Stats., 291. Bills of exchange, like other written instruments, are subject to legal construction in order to ascertain the intent and meaning of the parties, unless the language employed to express such intent and meaning is clear and unambiguous. Enough has already been remarked to show that when a bill or note is expressed to be payable at a particular place on demand, it is always sufficient to prove that it was presented there to charge the acceptor or the indorser. Evans v. St. John, 9 Port. (Ala.), 186, 193; McClane v. Fitch, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.), 599. Where a bill is drawn on a firm, as W. M. & Co., at a particular number and street, as at 263 Washington street, New York, the presentment should be made at their place of business, as presumable from such address, or at the residence of either of the firm. Otsego County Bank v. Warren, 18 Barb. (N. Y.), 291, 293. If the instrument is payable in a particular town, and the residence of the maker or acceptor is elsewhere, the holder is not bound to make demand anywhere except in that town. Smith v. Little, 10 N. H., 526, 530; 1 Am. Lead. Cas. (5th ed.), 454.

Views equally explicit are expressed by Judge Story, who says that if the bill is drawn upon the drawee domiciled in one place and is payable in another place, and is accepted by him, meaning without qualification, the presentment should be made at the latter place. Thus, if a bill is drawn on the drawees at Liverpool, payable in London, and is accepted, without explanation, the presentment for payment must be in London, if any particular place is there pointed out where demand may be made, and if none, and no one can be found to pay the bill, it may be protested there for non-payment for that very cause. Story, Bills (4th ed.), sec. 353; Boot v. Franklin, 3 Johns. (N. Y.), 208; 2 & 3 Wm.

IV., 50 British Stats., c. 98, p. 587; Chitty, Bills (13th Am. ed.), 390. So where a bill is directed to the drawee at a particular house, and is by him accepted without condition, the going to that house with the bill on the day of payment and finding it closed is a sufficient presentment. Bayley, Bills (5th ed.), 200; Hine v. Allely, 1 Nev. & M., 433; Chitty, Bills (13th Am. ed.), 330. American authorities almost universally hold that in such a case no presentment is necessary to charge the acceptor of the bill or the maker of the note,—the only effect of the neglect as to such a party being that it relieves him from cost and damages if he was ready at the time and place named to pay the amount and there was no one to receive it. Such readiness is equivalent to a tender, and an answer pleading that fact and payment of the money into court will be a bar to the recovery of interest and cost. Hills v. Place, 48 N. Y., 520; Caldwell v. Cassidy, 8 Cow. (N. Y.), 271.

§ 799. Due diligence required to find proper place to present bill.

Want of due diligence cannot be successfully set up in this case, as the protest was given in evidence, and shows to a demonstration that everything the law requires was done to find the acceptors or their place of business, without success, and that the protest was finally made at the only place in the city of New York where they were accustomed to transact any business. Diligence is doubtless required of the holder to ascertain the proper place to present the bill for payment; but it is not necessary to give that issue much consideration in this case, as it is not controverted that every needful effort in that regard was made, if the true theory of the bill is that it was payable in the city of New York, which is asserted by the plaintiff bank and denied by the defendants. Nothing need be added to what has already been remarked to explain the views of the court upon that subject, which are, that the bill having been addressed to the drawees at the city of New York, and they having accepted the same without qualification, explanation or condition, the bill became payable in that city, even though no mention was made of any dwelling, store or place of business where the bill should be presented. Freese v. Brownell, 35 N. J. L., 285; 1 Bell, Com. (5th ed.), 412.

§ 800. Demand of acceptor not required.

Nor is it necessary to repeat the views heretofore expressed, that the acceptor of the bill, like the maker of a note, is the promissory debtor in such a case, and that in respect to such a party to a bill no presentment or demand of payment need be made at the specified place in order to render him liable to an action on the instrument. Story, Notes (7th ed.), sec. 228; 1 Parsons, Bills and Notes, 425-429; Thompson, Bills (2d ed.), 294. Our decisions are decisive to that effect; and it is equally clear in this case that every step necessary to bind the drawer and the indorser was also taken by the holder of the bill described in the declaration. Story, Notes (7th ed.), 236; Carter v. Smith, 9 Cush. (Mass.), 321. Presentment at the specified place as against the acceptor of a bill is not necessary, the rule being that, if he was ready at the time and place to pay, he may prove that as a defense; but the rule is otherwise as against the drawer and indorsers. 3 Kent Com. (12th ed.), 100, 104.

Five other assignments of error are set forth in the brief of the defendants; but it is unnecessary to pursue the discussion, as the remarks already made are sufficient to show that there is no error in the record, and that the judgment should be affirmed. Exactly the same questions are also involved in the second of the above entitled cases. Both were argued and submitted at the same time, and must be decided in the same way. In each case judgment affirmed.

M'GRUDER v. BANK OF WASHINGTON.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes up from the circuit court of the District of Columbia, in which a suit was instituted against the plaintiff here, as indorser of one Patrick M'Gruder. The facts are exhibited in a stated case, upon which, by consent, an alternative judgment is to be entered. The judgment below was for the plaintiffs in the action, and the defendant brings this writ of error to have that judgment reversed, and a judgment entered in his favor. The leading facts in the cause are so much identified with those in the case of Renner v. The Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 581 (§§ 754-759, supra), decided at the present term, on the question relative to the days of grace, that the decision in that cause disposes of the principal question raised in this. But there is another point presented in the present cause. There was no actual demand made on the drawer of this note, and the question intended to be presented was, whether the facts stated will excuse it.

§ 801. Removal from jurisdiction excuses demand.

At the time of drawing the note, and until within ten days of its falling due, the maker was a housekeeper in the District of Columbia. But he then removed to the state of Maryland, to a place within about nine miles of the District. The case admits that neither the holder of the note, nor the notary, knew of his removal or place of residence; but the circumstances of his removal had nothing in them to sanction its being construed into an act of absconding. The words of the admission to this point are, that he "went to the house where the said Patrick had last resided, and from which he had removed as aforesaid, in order there to present the said note, and demand payment of the same; and not finding him there, and being ignorant of his place of residence, returned the said note under protest." The alternative in which the judgment of the court is to be rendered is not very appropriately stated; but since the absurdity cannot have entered into the minds of the parties, that, not knowing of the removal or present abode of the drawer, the holder was still bound to follow him into Maryland, we will construe the submission with reference to the facts admitted; and then the question raised is, whether the holder had done all that he was bound to do, to excuse a personal demand upon the maker. On this subject the law is clear; a demand on the maker is, in general, indispensable; and that demand must be made at his place of abode or place of business. That it should be strictly personal, in the language of the submission, is not required; it is enough if it is at his place of abode or generally at the place where he ought to be found. But his actual removal is here a fact in the case, and in this, as well as every other case, it is incumbent upon the indorsee to show due diligence. Now, that the notary should not have found the maker at his late residence was the necessary consequence of his removal, and is entirely consistent with the supposition of his not having made any one of those inquiries which would have led to a development of the cause why he did not find him there. Non constat, but he may have removed to the next door, and the first question would, most probably, have extracted information that would have put him on further inquiry. Had the house been shut up, he might with equal correctness have returned "that he had not found him," and yet that clearly would not have excused the demand, unless followed by reasonable inquiries.

§ 802. Mere distance does not excuse demand of payment.

The party must then be considered as lying under the same obligations as if, having made inquiry, he had ascertained that the maker had removed to a distance of nine miles, and into another jurisdiction. This is the utmost his inquiries could have extracted, and marks, of course, the outlines of his legal duties. Mere distance is, in itself, no excuse from demand; but, in general, the indorser takes upon himself the inconvenience resulting from that cause. Nor is the benefit of the postoffice allowed him, as in the case of notice to the indorser. But the question on the recent removal into another jurisdiction is a new one, and one of some nicety. In case of original residence in a state different from that of the indorser, at the time of taking the paper, there can be no question; but how far, in case of subsequent and recent removal to another state, the holder shall be required to pursue the maker, is a question not without its difficulties. We think that reason and convenience are in favor of sustaining the doctrine that such a removal is an excuse from actual demand. Precision and certainty are often of more importance to the rules of law than their abstract justice. On this point there is no other rule that can be laid down which will not leave too much latitude as to place and distance. Besides which, it is consistent with analogy to other cases, that the indorser should stand committed in this respect by the conduct of the maker. For his absconding or removal out of the kingdom, the indorser is held, in England, to stand committed; and, although from the contiguity, and, in some instances, reduced size of the states, and their union under the general government, the analogy is not perfect, yet it is obvious that a removal from the seaboard to the frontier states, or vice versa, would be attended with all the hardships to a holder, especially one of the same state with the maker, that could result from crossing the British channel. With this view of the subject, we are of opinion that the judgment below, although rendered on a different ground, must be sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

RAY v. SMITH.

ERROR to U. S. District Court, Middle District of Alabama.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Smith, of New York, sued Ray, of Alabama, as indorser of notes which fell due in 1862. They were not protested, on account of the state of war then in existence, but were presented to the maker and dishonored in 1866. There was evidence that the indorser had been provided with funds to pay the notes, and would have paid them if they had been protested sooner. There was judgment for the plaintiff.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

Whether timely presentment of the notes was made to the maker, and whether due notice of their dishonor was given to the defendant who had indorsed them, are questions which were not submitted to the jury. The court below appears to have been of opinion that, in view of the facts given in evidence, neither demand of payment nor notice to the indorser was necessary to justify a recovery against him. The jury was instructed, in substance, that even if there was no legal demand and notice, the want of them was sufficiently excused; and that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for the amount of the notes with interest from the dates when, according to their terms, they fell due. It is necessary, therefore, to inquire whether the evidence, as exhibited in the bill of exceptions, warranted such instructions.

§ 803. Demand excused by state of war, but must be made after it ceases.

It is undoubtedly the law, that though the plaintiff was relieved by the war from obligation to make demand upon the maker of the notes when they came to maturity, it was necessary for him, in order to charge the indorser, to make such demand within a reasonable time after it became possible; that is, after the close of the war; unless he was excused by the fact that the indorser had sufficient funds of the maker in hand, which he had received in the course of a current business, and which he had authority to apply to the payment of the notes at their maturity. And whether that alone constituted a sufficient excuse, is the real question now.

An indorser of a promissory note is only secondarily liable. His responsibility is, in its nature, a contingent one, and ordinarily, performance of the condition to make demand of the maker and give notice of his default in due time is an essential part of the title of one who asserts an indorser's liability. It has often been regretted that courts have dispensed with the performance of that condition for any cause. Still, the principal reason for the requirement of demand and notice is, that the indorser, if looked to for payment, may have the earliest opportunity to take steps for his own protection. Hence, it has been said, in some cases, that when by no possibility a failure to make demand and give notice could have injured him, or rather, when they could by no possibility have enabled him to protect himself, proof of demand and notice are not necessary. It must be admitted there has been much inconsistency in the decisions respecting the application of this rule. In some it has been held that if an indorser has taken an indemnity from the maker, he is not entitled to notice of default. But this is not sustained by sound reason, and the best-considered cases assert the contrary doctrine. The indemnity may prove insufficient. At all events, it is not inconsistent with the existence of a remedy over against the maker, and the correct rule, as stated by Bailey, J., in Brown v. Maffey, 15 East, 222, is that every indorser ought to have notice whenever he has a remedy over. All the cases agree, however, that when, by arrangement between the maker and the indorser, the latter has become the principal debtor, and primarily liable, he may not insist upon notice. Presentment to the maker, followed by notice to himself, can be of no service to him, for he has no remedy over. And he becomes the principal debtor when, either before or at the maturity of the note, he is supplied by the maker with sufficient funds for the purpose of paying it. Receiving the funds for such an avowed purpose, he assumes an obligation to take up the note; and, as has been said, he may be regarded as an agent who has undertaken to pay, and who, therefore, cannot be disappointed if his principal, trusting to his obligation, takes no further steps for the payment.

In the present case, the evidence does not necessarily establish that the funds which the indorser held were placed in his hands for the purpose of paying the notes. They were derived from the profits of the business, in conducting which he was a partner of the maker; and he was merely authorized to apply them to the payment of the notes, at their maturity. Whether this proved the existence of an obligation assumed by him to take them up, or, in other words, whether, as between him and the maker, he thus became the primary debtor, is a question which the court could not correctly answer in the affirmative as a conclusion of law. If it did establish such an obligation, absence of demand and notice were immaterial, and the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict. But if it did not, if the indorser, as between himself and the maker, had not become the principal debtor, if the authority to pay the notes out of the fund in his hands was only an arrangement for his indemnity, we think he was at liberty to pay them to the maker at any time after the maturity of the notes, and before he had any notice that they remained unpaid. In such a case, his liability to the holder remained contingent, and consequently, unless there was a legal demand and notice, he cannot be charged. It follows that the judge of the court below erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. The most that could properly be claimed by the holder of the notes was that the evidence should be submitted to the jury to find whether it proved that the defendant had become the principal debtor by arrangement between him and the maker, with instructions that if it did, the plaintiff was entitled to recover; and that if it did not, the indorser could not be held liable without proof of reasonable demand upon the maker, and notice.

§ 806. A deposition read without objection at the trial cannot be objected to in an appellate court.

Nothing more need be said respecting the charge given to the jury. But as the case goes back for another trial it is proper to notice an exception taken to the refusal of the court to suppress the deposition of the plaintiff. The deposition had been taken de bene esse, and before the trial the defendant moved to suppress it. But when it was offered at the trial, it was read without objection, and without exception. It may be that had it been objected to then, it should not have been received. But after having permitted it to be read at the trial without opposition, we think it cannot be objected now that the court received it.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

IN RE BROWN.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 2 Story, 502-525. 1848.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Petition by assignee in bankruptcy to expunge from the list of proved debts against the estate the claim of payees of checks of the bankrupt, upon the grounds stated in the opinion of the court. There was a counter petition by the claimants. The drawer had a balance to his credit at the bank when the checks were made of $30.89; on the 18th, 19th, 20th and 21st days of May of $6.11, and on 10th, 11th, 12th and 13th of June, of $20.72.

Opinion by STORY, J.

I cannot say that I entertain any doubt upon either of the questions which have been argued in this case, although they are presented under somewhat novel circumstances. The argument for the assignee resolves itself into these points: 1. That these instruments, although in the form of checks, are, in fact, inland bills of exchange, and governed by all the rules thereof as to presentment and notice. 2. That here no due notice was given to the drawer of the presentment and dishonor of these checks; and that the circumstances relied on as a waiver do not justify the conclusion. 3. That the facts relied on in the petition of Messrs. Courtis do not change the legal posture of the case or entitle them to any relief in equity.

§ 807. Checks payable at a future time are not inland bills of exchange.

In respect to the first point, the argument pressed is that checks are always, and properly, payable on demand, and that when payable at a future time they become, to all intents and purposes, inland bills of exchange. But I am not by any means prepared to admit the validity or force of this distinction, and no case has been cited which, in my judgment, satisfactorily establishes it. A check is not less a check because it is post-dated and thereby becomes, in effect, payable at a future and different time from that on which it is drawn or issued. This is sufficiently apparent from the case of Allen v. Keeves, 1 East, 435. That it may be declared upon as a bill of exchange is no proof that it may not also be declared upon as a check. In many cases they are identical in their legal results, but by no means in all. Mr. Chitty very properly says that a check nearly resembles a bill of exchange; but, he adds, it is uniformly made payable to bearer, and should be drawn upon a banker or a person acting as such. Chitty on Bills, 8th ed., ch. 11, p. 545. I agree that it nearly resembles a bill of exchange, but nullum simile est idem. It is commonly, although not always, made payable to the bearer; but I conceive it to be still a check, if drawn on a bank or banker, although payable to a particular party only by name, or to him or his order. It is usually, also, made payable on demand, although I am not aware that this is an essential requisite. The distinguishing characteristics of checks, as contradistinguished from bills of exchange, are (as it seems to me) that they are always drawn on a bank or banker; that they are payable immediately on presentment, without the allowance of any days of grace; and that they are never presentable for mere acceptance, but only for payment. Mr. Chancellor Kent, in his learned Commentaries (3 Kent's Comm., 75, 4th ed.), says: "A check upon a bank partakes more of the character of a bill of exchange than of a promissory note. It is transferable like a bill of exchange. It is not a direct promise by the drawer to pay, but it is an undertaking on his part that the drawee shall accept and pay, and the drawer is answerable only in the event of the failure of the drawee to pay." But he has more fully explained his real meaning in a note to the index of the fourth edition of his Commentaries (4 Kent's Comm., p. 549, note, 4th edition), which I adopt with entire confidence as expressive of my own opinion. "A check," says he, "differs from a bill of exchange in this: that it has no days of grace, and requires no acceptance distinct from prompt payment. The drawer of a check is not a surety, but the principal debtor, as much as the maker of a promissory note. The check is the acknowledgment of a certain sum due. It is an absolute appropriation of so much money in the hands of his banker to the holder of the check, and there it ought to remain until called for; and unless the drawer actually suffers by the delay, as by the intermediate failure of his banker, he has no reason to complain of delay not unreasonably protracted. If the holder does so unreasonably delay, he assumes the risk of the drawee's failure, and he may, under circumstances, be deemed to have made the check his own, to the discharge of the drawer. But this is quite distinct from the strict rule of diligence applicable to a surety, in which light stands the indorser, who has a right to require diligence on the part of the holder to relieve him from responsibility. It is true, however, that there is so much analogy between checks and bills of exchange and negotiable notes that they are frequently spoken of without discrimination." S. P., 3 Kent. Comm., s. 44, p. 104, note, 5th ed.; Little v. Phoenix Bank, 2 Hill (N. Y.), 425; Kemble v. Mills, 1 Mann. & G., 757.

The case of Cruger v. Armstrong, 3 Johns. Cas., 5, does not inculcate any different doctrine when correctly considered. And the case of Conroy v. Warren, 3 Johns. Cas., 259, expressly distinguishes between checks and bills of exchange, and puts the doctrine of the necessity of presentment for payment upon its true and reasonable ground, whether any damages have been sustained by the drawer by the delay or not; and I conceive that the point as to notice of the dishonor of a check would mainly turn upon similar considerations.

We all know, from the history of inland bills of exchange, that, originally, they were not entitled to days of grace; and that days of grace were first established, as applicable to them, by the statutes 9th and 10th Will. 3, ch. 17, and 3d and 4th of Ann, stat. 2, ch. 9. 2 Black. Comm., 467. In Massachusetts days of grace were not formerly allowed upon promissory notes payable at a future time (Putnam v. Sullivan, 4 Mass., 45; Jones v. Fales, 4 Mass., 245); and the like rule was supposed to apply to inland bills of exchange, or, at least, the contrary was not established. This rule in Massachusetts was altered by the stat. of 1824, ch. 130, and by the Revised Laws of 1835, stat. 12, ch. 33, §§ 5, 6, which allow days of grace upon all bills of exchange payable at sight or at a future day certain, and on all promissory negotiable notes, orders or drafts payable at a future day certain. But no mention whatsoever is made in either statute of checks; but they are silently left to the known rules, practice and usages of banks, which I believe to be invariable, never to accept them prior to payment, and always to pay them on presentment on or after the day stated for payment by the date or upon the face of the check. Thus, if a check be dated on the 1st of December, and be payable on the 10th of December, it is presentable on the latter day, and on presentment on that day it will be paid by the bank. It is never presented for acceptance, and no days of grace are ever allowed upon it. In short, it is always treated as payable on the very day designated as the day of payment. If it be asked, What is the reason of all this? the true answer is that it is the usage of banks and the understanding of the parties to the check, and being the constant habit of business, it becomes, like all the other usages of merchants, the lex et norma by which to expound the contract. The parties have, in the present case, used the common form of a bank check, and by so using it they impliedly authorize the bank to treat it as a check, and pay it as a check, payable on the very day on which it is dated, or on which it purports to be payable, without any grace. The words of both these instruments are precisely alike, except as to sums and times of payment. The first one is: "Granite Bank, Boston, April 18, 1841. Pay to W. Courtis & Co., 18 May, or bearer, seven hundred and three dollars and 50-100. Ephraim Brown, by J. W. Green. To the Cashier." The second is dated on 18th of April, and is to "Pay to W. Courtis & Co., 10 June, or bearer, seven hundred and seventy-six dollars 52-100." Signed in the same manner and addressed in the same way "To the Cashier" of the Granite Bank. No one can doubt that it is entirely competent for the parties to agree that an instrument shall be treated to all intents and purposes as a check, and to have all the attributes and incidents thereof, and to declare that it shall not be deemed a bill of exchange. In fact, by the forms here adopted the parties do so declare; and, as I understand it, the banks uniformly act upon this understanding, and always pay such checks upon the day fixed for payment, without any allowance of grace, if they have funds; and this is done without any suspicion that it is a misuser or misapplication of the funds of the drawer.

I am aware of the case of Brown v. Lusk, 4 Yerg., 210, in which it was held that a check drawn in Nashville on the Branch Bank of the United States at Nashville, on the 13th of December, 1827, payable to A. B., or bearer, on the 14th of January following, was held to be an inland bill of exchange, and entitled to the days of grace. This case was decided in the absence of Mr. Chief Justice Catron, and not only was no authority cited for the position, but the very citation from Chitty on Bills which was relied on to support it distinctly shows that there is a marked distinction between checks and bills of exchange. Mr. Chitty there says (Chitty on Bills, p. 322, 7th Amer. ed.; S. P., Chitty on Bills, ch. 11, p. 546, 8th London ed., 1833): "They (checks) are not due before payment is demanded, in which they differ from bills of exchange and promissory notes payable on a particular day." Now, the most that this position proves is, that checks are not governed in all cases by the same rules as bills of exchange and promissory notes. They are not payable until presentment. But how does this show when they are presentable, or that they may not be made payable on any other day certain than the day of the date? Or that days of grace are to be allowed upon them if payable on a day certain? The learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in Brown v. Lusk, added: "They (checks) are appropriations of money in the hands of a banker and are payable on presentment." In this remark he but followed out what was intimated by Lord Kenyon in Boehm v. Sterling, 7 Term R., 423, 429, and has been since often recognized as sound law. Cruger v. Armstrong, 3 Johns. Cas., s. 7, 9; Conroy v. Warren, 3 Johns. Cas., 259. But we all know that at law neither a bill of exchange, until acceptance, nor a promissory note, is any appropriation of the money of the drawer or maker in the hands of any one. In truth, a check is an instrument sui generis, and is construed exactly as the parties intend it. It is supposed to be drawn upon funds in the hands of a bank or banker, and it appropriates the amount to the holder of the check. And I agree with Lord Kenyon in holding that the drawer cannot honestly alter the state of his accounts with the bank or banker, so as not to leave in his hands sufficient to pay the check on the very day on which it is presentable and payable; for that would be a fraudulent misapplication of the appropriated funds.

The like distinction between checks and bills of exchange was stated by Mr. Justice Sutherland in Murray v. Judah, 6 Cow., 490. He there said: "As a general rule, therefore, a check is not due from the drawer until payment has been demanded of the drawee, and refused by him. As between the holder of a check and an indorser or third person, payment must be demanded within a reasonable time. But as between the holder and maker, or drawer, a demand at any time before suit brought is sufficient, unless it appear that the drawee has failed, or the drawer has in some manner sustained injury by the delay." The same doctrine has been fully recognized in other cases. Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 10 Wend., 304, 306; S. C., 13 Wend., 133; Cruger v. Armstrong, 3 Johns. Cas., 5; Conroy v. Warren, 3 Johns. Cas., 259. It is a natural, even if it be not a necessary, consequence of the fact that a check is an appropriation of the funds of the drawer in the hands of the bank or banker to the amount of the check; and, consequently, the drawer has no right to withdraw the same. And if the drawee, upon the presentment, refuses to pay the check, because he has no funds, then the drawer is not injured; and if he has funds, and refuses to pay, then, if the bank is still in good credit, as the drawer has sustained and can sustain no loss, there is every reason to hold him liable therefor. Every check is prima facie presumed to be given for value received by the drawer; and if, by reason of the want of due presentment or want of due notice of the dishonor, he is to be totally exonerated, he pockets both the original consideration and his funds in the hands of the bank or banker. In such a case, can it be said, with truth or justice, that he is to be enriched at the expense of the holder of the check? Or that he shall not be deemed to hold the money, as money had and received for the use of the holder, either because he had no funds in the bank, or because he still retains those funds, appropriated to the use of another, for his own use? I am aware that Mr. Justice Cowen, in his elaborate opinion in Harker v. Anderson, 21 Wend., 372, has endeavored to support the opinion that a check is to be deemed, to all essential purposes, to be a bill of exchange, and, therefore, that all the rules applicable to the latter are of equal force in relation to the former. Notwithstanding the array of authorities, so fully and learnedly brought forth by him in support of that opinion, my own judgment is that they wholly fail of the purpose. It appears to me to be a struggle on the part of the learned judge to subject all the doctrines, applicable to all negotiable instruments, to some common and uniform standard. I hope and trust that such an effort will never prevail. In my judgment, it is far better that the doctrines of commercial jurisprudence should, from time to time, adapt themselves to the common usages and practices and understanding of merchants, and vary with the varying courses of business, so as at once to subserve public convenience, and to mould themselves into the common habits of social life, than to assume any artificial forms, or to regulate, by any inflexible standard, the whole operations of trade and commerce. As new instruments arise in the course of business, they should be construed so as to meet and accomplish the very purposes for which they were designed by the parties, and not to defeat them. Checks are as well known now as bills of exchange, as a class of distinct instruments in commercial negotiations; and he who seeks to make them identical in all respects with bills of exchange may unintentionally be introducing an anomaly, instead of suppressing one. Upon the whole, my judgment is precisely in coincidence with that of Mr. Chancellor Kent, already cited on this subject. I hold that the instruments in the present case are strictly checks, and subject to all the incidents thereof; that they were payable on the very day on which payment was upon their face demandable, without any days of grace; and that both parties intended throughout that they should be treated as checks, and that they should be paid by the bank on the very day designated, or at any reasonable time thereafter.

But assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that this is not entirely correct (which I maintain, however, to be entirely correct), still, in this case, in my judgment, the checks are a good debt against the bankrupt. And this for two reasons, either of which would be conclusive. In the first place, it is manifest that these checks were drawn without the drawer having any right to draw. He had no funds in the bank at the time when the checks were due and payable, or indeed for aught that appears, at any time since, to discharge them or either of them. Now, in the case of a check, I take it to be clear that the drawer impliedly engages that at the time when the check is due and payable, he has and will have then, and at all times thereafter, sufficient funds in the bank to pay the same upon presentment; and by the draft he appropriates those funds absolutely for the use of the holder. Now the bank is not bound to pay, unless it is in full funds; and it is not obliged to pay or to accept to pay, if it has partial funds only, for it is entitled to the possession of the check on payment; and, indeed, in the ordinary course of business, the only voucher of the bank for any payment is the production and receipt of the check, which the holder cannot safely part with unless he receives full payment, nor the bank exact, unless under the like circumstances. The holder is not bound to accept part payment, even if the bank is willing to pay in part, for he has a claim to the entirety. Now the circumstance that the drawer had no right to draw these checks, and had no funds there at any time to pay the same, seems to me decisive that he has no right to complain of the want of due presentment, or of the want of due notice. Not of the want of due presentment, for the checks were demandable not merely on the days on which they were respectively due, but as against him at any reasonable time afterwards, and he ought to have had funds at all times in the bank to pay the checks after they were due. Not of the want of notice, for as he never had any funds in the bank to pay the checks, he had no right to believe they would be paid, and strictly speaking, his conduct was an actual or constructive fraud upon the holders. In both views, the case of Conroy v. Warren, 3 Johns. Cas., 259, is a direct authority to the purpose. And it may be further added, that it was held in that case, in which I entirely concur, that if the drawer sustains no damage by want of due presentment or due notice, and the non-payment of the checks arise from his own default, or from his want of funds, he is liable to the holder to the full amount of the checks. If the bank had funds, and had failed in the intermediate time, that might have furnished a different ground for defense. It would then be like the case of a note or acceptance, payable at a bank, where the bank had at the time funds to pay, and had failed after it became due, and there had not been a due presentment for payment. It appears to me equally clear, upon principle and authority, that the drawer is liable in all cases for the dishonor of checks, whether they have been duly presented or not, or whether he has had due notice of the dishonor or not, in all cases where he has sustained no damage on account of the omission.

§ 809. The fact that a drawer has in bank a part of the funds necessary to pay his check does not entitle him to presentment and notice.

But it is said that, in cases of bills, due presentment and due notice are necessary whenever the drawer has any funds in the hands of the drawee; and the same reasoning applies to cases of checks. Now, I deny both the premises and the conclusion. In the first place, as I understand it, the true doctrine is this: that if the drawer has a right to draw, in the belief that he has funds, or in the expectation that he shall have funds at the time of the presentment for acceptance, by reason of arrangements with the drawee, or putting his funds in transitu, then and in such cases he is entitled to due notice. But according to the doctrine now contended for, if the drawer knows that he has but $1 in the hands of the drawee, and he has no expectation of any more being added, and has no right to believe that a bill for more will be honored, he may, nevertheless, draw a bill on the drawee for $10,000; and if it is dishonored (as he knows it will be) he is still entitled to strict notice; whereas, if he had not the $1 in the drawee's hands, he would not be entitled to any notice at all. Now, I do not understand the law to involve any such strange anomaly, not to call it an absurdity. In each case the same reason applies; the draft is a fraud upon the holder; and in each case a meditated fraud shall not be sheltered behind a rule intended to protect the innocent and trustworthy. Bickerdike v. Bollman, 1 Term, 405. The two cases relied on at the bar to establish the opposite doctrine turn upon the very considerations which I have already suggested. In Hammond v. Dufrene, 3 Camp., 145, the bill was drawn by the party having no funds at the time; but the drawees accepted the bill, and afterwards, and before the bill became due, the drawer paid a larger sum on account of the acceptors; and Lord Ellenborough held that the drawer was entitled to strict notice of the dishonor when the bill became due. Why? Because the drawer had a reasonable expectation that the bill would be accepted (and it was accepted), and that it would be paid at maturity by the acceptors, as he was then in advance for them to a larger amount. In Thackeray v. Blackett, 3 Camp., 163, the two bills drawn were accepted, and were dishonored at their maturity by the acceptors; but due notice thereof was not given to the drawer. The bills were, in fact, drawn for the accommodation of the drawer; but, before they became due, he had contracted engagements on account of the acceptors to the amount of about 1,000*l.*, the bills amounting to upwards of 3,600*l.* Lord Ellenborough held the drawer entitled to strict notice; but it was upon the ground that there was an open account between the parties, and, therefore, the drawer could not necessarily have been aware beforehand that either of the bills would be dishonored; so that the case was put upon the clear ground that the drawer had a right to draw, and had a right to believe that his drafts would be honored. Indeed, in cases of a fluctuating balance between the parties, this may well constitute a ground upon which, without knowing the exact state of the balance, the drawer may reasonably draw. And this is the very ground upon which the doctrine was put in the case of Orr v. Maginnis, 7 East, 358, where the court thought that, in cases of a shifting balance, notice was necessary, because the drawer could not, or might not know, that he was drawing without any right to draw. See, also, Chitty on Bills, ch. 8, p. 358, 8th ed., 1833. The same doctrine was upheld in Legge v. Thorpe, 12 East, 171, and was there expounded upon the principles which I have stated.

In the next place, independently of the ground already suggested, there is another one, which, in my judgment, would be decisive of the whole merits of the case. It is, that there was an express waiver, on the part of Brown, of due presentment and of due notice of the dishonor of the checks, and, indeed, a request that they should not be presented when due and payable, as there would be no funds in the bank to meet them. It is true that this waiver and request were not made by Brown personally; but they were made through the instrumentality of his general agent, Green. I say his general agent, for such, upon the evidence, he clearly appears to have been; and he was duly authorized by Brown to draw checks on the Granite Bank in his name, and this would incidentally clothe him with full authority to make any arrangements with reference to the presentment of the checks, for the benefit of his principal. But it is not necessary to put the case upon this narrow ground. It seems clear that Green was not only the general agent of Brown in this business, which would confer on him this incidental authority, but in point of fact, that he transacted "almost all the business that was done for him."

§ 811. An accommodation maker of a note may prove his claim against the estate of the person accommodated.

Passing from these grounds, either of which would alone dispose of the case, let us now proceed to the consideration of the facts presented upon the petition. It there appears that these checks were, in fact, given to the Messrs. Courtis as collateral security for a promissory note, made by them, payable to Brown or order, for the sum of $1,450, in four months, at his request, and for his accommodation. That note was discounted for the benefit of Brown at the Grand

Bank in Marblehead, and not being paid by Brown at its maturity, it was paid by the Messrs. Courtis to the bank. Here, then, is a clear case of money paid at the request and for the use of Brown; and it is recoverable from Brown's estate as a debt, unless some legal discharge thereof has occurred. Now, the only pretense to allege a discharge is that the checks above stated have not been duly presented, or due notice given thereof, and therefore that the drawer is discharged therefrom. Assuming this to be true, and that no action would lie by the holders on these checks against the drawer, what answer is that to the claim for the money paid for the drawer on the promissory note discounted at the Grand Bank? That is an independent debt, not growing out of the check, but collateral to it. Besides, I understand the true doctrine to be, in all cases where the notes or bills of third persons are taken as collateral security for a debt or indemnity, that the party receiving them is a mere bailee to collect the amount, and like other bailees, where the bailment is for the mutual benefit of the creditor and the debtor, that the bailee is bound only to ordinary diligence for the collection; and therefore, unless some loss has accrued to the bailor, by reason of the want of ordinary diligence in the collection, the bailee is not liable; and his rights as a creditor remain unchanged. This rule is frequently applied in cases of notes and bills of exchange of third persons, taken from the debtor without his indorsement thereon, and also in cases of guaranty. The debtor must show that he has sustained some loss or damage by the omission to collect the notes or bills, or by the want of due presentment, or due notice of the dishonor of them. Story on Bills of Exchange, s. 372; Chitty on Bills, s. 372; Chitty on Bills, ch. 10, p. 474, 8th ed., 1833; id., p. 529; Bayley on Bills, ch. 7, s. 2, pp. 286 to 290, 5th ed., 1830; Oxford Bank v. Haynes, 8 Pick., 423, 428. The rule would seem equally to apply to all cases, where, although the debtor should indorse such notes or bills, yet at the time of the indorsement he knew, or had reason to believe, that they would not and ought not to be paid; for then the indorsement and delivery of the notes or bills would be a mere fraud or imposition upon the creditor. Farmers' Bank v. Vanmeter, 4 Rand., 553. If this would be true in the case of the notes or bills of third persons, it must, a fortiori, be true in relation to a check, drawn by the very debtor himself, on a bank where he has no funds, or none but nominal funds, utterly inadequate to pay the debt, and which he knows, therefore, must be dishonored. Any other doctrine would allow the drawer to take advantage of his own gross laches, or gross fraud. In the present case the drawer would thereby retain in his own hands the amount of the checks, for which he had received a full consideration; and he would escape the repayment of the very money paid for him in good faith by the Messrs. Courtis, without his having sustained any loss or damage by the non-presentment of the checks or the want of due notice of the dishonor. A more equitable defense against a just debt can scarcely be imagined. It is precisely what a court of equity would feel itself bound to redress by the fullest exercise of its powers, by granting full relief to the petitioners for the amount of the debt paid by them for Brown.

Upon the whole, my judgment, upon all the questions in the case, is in favor of the petitioners; and I shall accordingly direct it to be certified to the district court: (1) Upon the first question, that the proof of the debt of the Messrs. Courtis ought not to be expunged, but ought to stand as good and valid. (2) That the petitioners (the Messrs. Courtis) are entitled to be relieved in equity to the full amount of the debt proved by them, for which the checks in the case were given by the bankrupt.

§ 814. Agent's delay to demand.—An agent to present a bill for acceptance or payment has no right to neglect to do so for any reason seeming sufficient to him. Olshausen v. Lewis,* 1 Biss., 419.

§ 815. Note payable in money or cotton; time fixed; no demand necessary.—An action was brought on a note reading thus: "On or before the 1st of June, 1827, I promise to pay B. C., or order, $200, which may be discharged in cotton at the market price in the fall of 1826." Held, that this note gave the maker an election to pay in property or money; that no demand need be made, the time of payment being fixed; that the note could not be discharged by payment of property after the day of payment passed; that the place of paying the property would be the residence of the maker, unless a different place were named, and that upon a failure to discharge the note by delivering or tendering the cotton, the amount to be paid was to be ascertained by the note itself, and that evidence of the value of the cotton was not admissible. Campbell v. Clark,* Hemp., 67.

§ 816. A check must be presented for payment like a bill, before the drawer can be sued. Clark v. Nat. Metropolitan Bank,* 2 MacArth., 249. See §§ 47, 48, 200, 335, 358, 493.

§ 821. McConnell*, 13 Pet., 136 (§§ 1539-43).

§ 822. Note payable at a bank.—Where a note is made negotiable at a bank, it is not necessary to demand payment at the bank in order to hold the indorser. Beeding v. Thornton,* 2 Cr. C. C., 693.

§ 823. It is sufficient evidence of demand on a note made payable at a particular bank that the note was at the bank, was its property, and was not paid at maturity. Fullerton v. Bank of United States, 1 Pet., 604 (§§ 1200-1204).

§ 824. An agreement was made that a note was to be sent to a certain bank for collection. Held, that it was complied with by presenting the note and demanding its payment at maturity by the holders at such bank within banking hours. The note need not be placed under the management of the bank itself. Camden v. Doremus, 3 How., 515 (§§ 585-588).

§ 825. A note was made payable at the Commercial Bank of Columbus, Mississippi. By an agreement between the parties it was stipulated that it should be sent to that bank for collection. Held, that if any custom or practice other than general commercial usage were to control the management of the note, it was the usage of the Bank of Columbus and not that of other banks not mentioned in the contract. Ibid.

§ 826. If a note is payable at a particular bank and is held by it at maturity, all it need do is to examine the maker's account for funds to pay it. This is a sufficient demand. U. S. Bank v. Smith, 11 Wheat., 171.

§ 827. The presence of a bill in a bank, if unknown to the cashier, is not a sufficient presentment and demand. Chicopee Bank v. Philadelphia Bank, 8 Wall., 641 (§§ 1048-52).

§ 828. A bank was the holder of a note payable at its office. After banking hours the note was delivered to a notary by the officers of the bank, who informed him that they had no funds to pay it. Held, a sufficient demand, no formal demand being necessary. Bank of United States v. Carneal, 2 Pet., 543 (§§ 964-971).

§ 829. A note payable at a bank was deposited in it for collection. The teller of the bank was clerk of the notary, and when the note became due he inquired of the book-keeper whether any funds had been deposited to pay the note, who replied, after examining the books, that no such deposit had been made. The teller at the time held the note in his hands, presenting it to the book-keeper. Held, a sufficient demand. Browning v. Andrews, * 3 McL., 576. Citing Bank of Utica v. Smith, 19 Johns., 231.

§ 830. By notary's clerk.—The demand may be made by the clerk of the notary with the consent of the plaintiff. Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, * 2 Cr. C. C., 5. See § 717.

§ 832. Where there are two makers of a note not partners, demand should be made of each in order to hold an indorser. Taylor v. Davidson, * 2 Cr. C. C., 434.

§ 834. Demand on widow.—The maker of a note died before it matured. Demand was made on his widow at his last dwelling place. The notary did not know whether there were executors or administrators. Held, that the demand was sufficient, presumptively, to charge the indorser. But if there is an executor or administrator, there must be a demand on him. Bank of Washington v. Reynolds, 2 Cr. C. C., 289.

§ 835. Verbal.—Where a note was due on the 17th, and the notary on the 18th gave verbal notice that it would be protested if not paid on that day, and that he had demanded payment of the maker on the 17th, held insufficient. The Bank v. Barry, * 2 Cr. C. C., 307.

§ 836. Both note and coupons need not be presented.—Where the interest on notes was to be paid upon the presentation of coupons, it is not necessary for the notary to present both notes and coupons at the time of demanding payment. Codman v. Vermont & C. R. Co., 17 Blatch., 1.

§ 837. Certificates of deposit; bankruptcy; dishonor.—After bankruptcy a bank's certificates of deposit occupy the position of dishonored paper. They stand upon the same footing as a claim proved for an open account. In re Sims, 3 Saw., 305; 12 N. B. R., 315. See §§ 37, 214.

§ 838. Dishonor; effect.—By dishonor a promissory note does not lose its character as such, nor cease to be negotiable. The only effect of dishonor upon negotiability is to let in the defenses of the maker as against the payee. Varner v. West, 1 Woods, 493.

§ 839. Check; time or demand.—No negligence can be imputed to the holder of a check who demands it on the day after he received it. Clark v. National Metropolitan Bank, * 2 MacArth., 249. See §§ 47, 48, 200, 353, 358, 483, 816.

§ 843. Evidence of the particular custom of banks and merchants in Washington to make demand, protest and notice on the day after the last day of grace is admissible, though not averred in declaration. *Coyle v. § 846. Notes negotiated by banks in Washington are, by local usage, entitled to four days' grace. Hill v. Norvell, * 3 McL., 583; Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, 2 Cr. C. C., 5; Brent v. Coyle, id., 287.

§ 847. If a person who indorses a note which is discounted at a bank had knowledge of the custom of the bank as to the time for demand, notice and protest at the time of making the indorsement, he is bound thereby. Bank of Columbia v. McKenney, 3 Cr. C. C., 331.

§ 848. Where it is the custom of banks to demand payment of notes discounted by them on the day after the third day of grace, and the indorser has been an indorser of notes discounted at the same bank previously, the jury may infer that he had knowledge of such usage at the time he indorsed the note. Bank of Washington v. Reynolds, 2 Cr. C. C., 289.

§ 849. Notice of a usage to allow four days' grace is presumed from the fact of making a note payable at a bank where such a usage prevails. Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 481 (§§ 958-963).

§ 850. Demand and notice on the day after the expiration of the days of grace is sufficient. Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson, * 2 Cr. C. C., 5.

§ 851. Where a note is due the 23d and 26th, demand and notice on the 27th is sufficient — too late after the 23th. Lenox v. Wright,* 2 Cr. C. C., 45.

§ 852. Where a note is due on the 1st and 4th, demand of payment on the 5th is too late; insolvency of the maker not an excuse. Neale v. Peyton,* 2 Cr. C. C., 813.

§ 853. Where the last day of grace is Sunday, demand must be made on Saturday, and notice may be given on Monday. Irwin v. Brown,* 2 Cr. C. C., 314; McElroy v. English,* 2 Cr. C. C., 528.

§ 854. The last day of grace falling on Sunday, demand and notice were properly made on Saturday; and protest being made after bank hours, a suit brought the same day was not premature. Mandeville v. Rumney,* 3 Cr. C. C., 424. See, also, Bussard v. Levering,* 6 Wheat, 102.

§ 855. Where the last day of grace falls on Saturday, a demand on Monday is too late. Thornton v. Stoddert,* 1 Cr. C. C., 534.

§ 856. A note was received by a bank to be collected, "according to the known and established mode of transacting business in the bank." The third day of grace fell on Sunday. It was the custom of the bank in such cases not to demand payment till Monday. Held, that the bank was not liable for damages for failure to make demand on Saturday. Patriotic Bank of Washington v. Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, 2 Cr. C. C., 560.

§ 857. Demand on third day of grace after banking hours, good. The Bank v. Walker,* 2 Cr. C. C., 294.

§ 858. Unreasonable delay.—A note was payable "on demand after date, with interest." Demand made more than five years after date, held, not in a reasonable time. In re Grant,* 6 Law Rep., 158.

§ 859. A lapse of three months in time of war, before presenting an American bill in London, is not an unreasonable delay. Nor is a delay of five months, under the same circumstances, before giving notice of non-payment, unreasonable delay; and whether it is reasonable or not, is a question of law. United States v. Barker, 2 Paine, 340 (§ 1011).

§ 860. Demand note; when due; limitation.—A note or bill payable on demand is due immediately, whether with or without interest. Suit may be brought upon it as soon as made, without previous demand, and the statute of limitations begins to run from its date. Bartlett v. Rogers, 3 Saw., 62.

§ 861. Check; assignment; delay in demanding.—A check is always supposed to be drawn on a private deposit of funds, and amounts to an absolute appropriation of so much thereof to the holder of the check, to remain on deposit so appropriated until called for, and a delay of five months in the presentation of the check will not release the indorser, if he has sustained no loss in consequence of the delay. Deener v. Brown,* 1 MacArth., 350. See §§ 47, 48, 200, 335, 358, 483, 816, 839.

§ 862. Saturday check presented Monday.—To present a bank check, drawn on Saturday, for payment the following Monday, is not a want of due diligence on the part of the holder, although he live but a few feet from the bank, which failed before he presented the check. O'Brien v. Smith,* 1 Black, 99. See §§ 816, 839, 861.

§ 863. Note payable "at either bank."—On a note payable at "either of the banks in Boston" it is not necessary to present the note for payment at either of such banks. Such a note is to be treated as if the place of payment was general. Brown v. Noyes, 2 Woodb. & M., 75.

§ 864. Oral agreement as to place.—An oral agreement entered into, at the time of the making of the note, between the maker and a party who afterwards became an indorsee, fixing the place at which the note should be payable, is a nullity, and does not affect the rights of the indorser as to demand and notice. Specht v. Howard, 16 Wall., 564.

§ 865. General rule; place of business; dwelling house.—The holder of a note is only bound to call during business hours at the usual place of business of the maker and demand payment. If he find it locked and no person there to receive notice, he need not go to the maker's dwelling house, although it be not far distant. Bowie v. Blacklock,* 2 Cr. C. C., 265.

§ 866. A note was not made payable at any particular place. The holders lived in Cincinnati and the notary made a formal demand at their counting house, being unable to find the makers. Held, an insufficient demand. Burrows v. Hannegan, 1 McL., 309 (§§ 1029-33).

§ 867. Inquiry for maker.—A promissory note was made payable at the house of Y., the first indorser. The notary, on the day after the last day of grace, demanded payment of Y. there, but did not inquire after the maker or his funds. Held, not a good demand. Mechanics' Bank v. Lynn,* 2 Cr. C. C., 217.

§ 868. Failure to find maker; dishonor.—The maker of a note not being found on the last day of grace, at either his office or his residence, the note was deemed dishonored. Great-rake v. Brown, 2 Cr. C. C., 541.

§ 869. Averment of place.—The declaration, in an action against the indorser of a note, made payable at a certain bank, must aver that payment was demanded at that bank. Bank of United States v. Smith, 2 Cr. C. C., 319.

§ 870. What not evidence of demand at a bank.—In an action against an indorser of a note payable at a bank, it was shown that the note was discounted by the same bank; that a notary, at the request of the bank officers, presented it at the maker's store, and not finding him, demanded it of his clerk; and that on the day the note became due, the maker had no funds to his credit in the bank. Held, that the jury could not infer from these facts that demand was made at the bank; nor that plaintiffs were present at the bank on the day of payment, with the note, and ready to give it up on receipt of the money; nor that the bank officers, on the day of maturity, turned to their books to ascertain whether the maker had funds to his credit to pay the note. Ibid.

§ 871. Securing indorser.—In case the maker of a note transfers property to an indorser for the express purpose of paying the debt, then subsequent notice to indorsers of non-payment by the maker is dispensed with, if the amount of property thus assigned be sufficient to satisfy the liability; not otherwise, although all the property of the maker may have been thus assigned. An assignment by the maker to an indorser, in trust for general creditors, and only sufficient in amount for the payment of no more than fifteen cents on the dollar, although it included all he had, is not enough in law to excuse want of notice to the indorser, or to show due diligence in the holder. Woodbury v. Crum, *1 Biss., 284.

§ 872. Want of funds; acknowledgment of debt.—The want of funds in the hands of the drawer, the drawer's payment of part of the draft and his subsequent acknowledgment of the debt, and promise to send funds to the drawee to pay it, are either of them sufficient to dispense with protest and notice. Read v. Wilkinson, 2 Wash., 514.

§ 873. Waiver — Question for jury.—It is a matter of fact for the jury to determine whether certain declarations made by an indorser of a note amount to a waiver of the want of demand and notice. Union Bank v. Magruder, 7 Pet., 287.

§ 874. Promise to pay.—An agent to collect a note called upon an indorser and asked him whether he should have the note protested against the estate of the maker, who had died. The indorser told him he need not do so and that the note should be paid at maturity. After the note became due, the agent called upon the indorser and informed him that he had neglected to put the note in the bank for collection, and asked him what he was going to do; he said he would see the agent in a few days, and arrange it. Held, a waiver of demand and protest, and that the want of them could not be set up in defense to the note. Sigerson v. Mathews, *20 How., 496. See, also, Pierson v. Hooker, 3 Johns., 68; Hopkins v. Liswell, 12 Mass., 52; Walker v. Laverty, 6 Munf., 487; Thornton v. Wynn, 12 Wheat., 183; Bank of Georgetown v. Magruder, 7 Pet., 287.

§ 875. Drawer declared his intention to a third person, not the agent of the holder, of paying a certain bill of exchange if he ever became able to do so. He did not know that the bill had not been presented. Held, that this declaration did not amount to a waiver of demand and notice. Craig v. Brown, *3 Wash., 503.

§ 876. Knowledge of non-payment.—The fact that the indorser of a note drawn by himself, in the name and for the benefit of the firm of which he was a member, knew that the note was unpaid and that the firm was insolvent, does not dispense with the necessity of demand and notice, in order to bind him as indorser. In re Grant, *6 Law Rep., 158.

§ 877. Absence from business.—If the maker of a promissory note dated at Washington resides two miles out of the city, but within the county of Washington, and is employed in one of the departments at Washington from three to ten o'clock daily, in a room with other clerks, his absence temporarily from such room when the notary called to demand payment is no excuse for not making a personal demand, or a demand at his residence. Goldsborough v. Jones, *2 Cr. C. C., 305.

§ 878. Time draft; demand and protest not necessary.—A draft made payable three months after date need not be presented for acceptance; but if the holder undertake to present for acceptance, he must proceed, in respect to protest and notice, as if the obligation existed, unless excused by want of funds in the hands of the drawee, or by want of reasonable expectation of acceptance or payment. If protest and legal notice of non-acceptance of a draft be not given, presentation and demand of payment must be made at maturity. And a failure on the part of the holder of the draft to protest for non-payment and give legal notice is a breach of duty, unless excused by want of funds in the drawee's hands or by want of reasonable expectation of payment. Pendleton v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co., 5 Fed. R., 238; 8 C., 7 Fed. R., 169.

§ 879. Lex loci.—The question of the timely presentation of a bill of exchange drawn in the United States on a bank in Norway is governed by the laws of Norway. Pierce v. Indseth, *16 Otto, 546.

§ 882. An inland bill of exchange or promissory note need not be protested. Union Bank v. Hyde, §§ 938, 939.

§ 883. A protest of an inland bill or note is not evidence of demand and notice, which must, therefore, be proved aliunde. Ibid.

§ 884. A protest is not rendered inadmissible as evidence by a mistake in writing the Christian name of the agent of the acceptor in a copy of the bill contained in the protest — the instrument being in all material respects well described in the protest. Dennistoun v. Stewart, § 940.

§ 885. A statute authorizing the protest of domestic bills and allowing damages in case of their non-payment does not make such a protest essential to sustain a recovery upon them. § 891. If a bill has been duly presented for acceptance or payment, and dishonored, and a minute made at the time of the steps taken, the protest may be drawn up in form afterwards, at the convenience of the notary. And it may be corrected subsequently from these minutes. Bailey v. Dozier, §§ 942-946.

§ 892. The facts being ascertained, due diligence is a question of law. Rhett v. Poe, §§ 974-979.

§ 893. Protest need not necessarily be made by a notary public. A justice of the peace or other functionary, or even a merchant, may act as a notary in protesting bills. Burke v. McKay, §§ 947-949.

§ 894. A justice of the peace may protest a note or bill in Mississippi, and his authority so to do is not restricted to occasions where a notary is absent or cannot be found. Bailey v. Dozier, §§ 942-946.

§ 895. A notary in possession of a note, or any agent of the holder, is competent to notify an indorser of its non-payment. The holder need not give the notice himself. Harris v. Robinson, §§ 980-982.

§ 896. An accommodation indorser of a promissory note is not liable without notice of demand and dishonor. French v. Bank of Columbia, §§ 983-985.

§ 897. One who guaranties the payment of a bill at maturity is not entitled to notice of its dishonor with the same strictness that would be required to bind a surety, where the drawer, acceptor and an indorser all became insolvent before the bill matured. The contract of guaranty is in the nature of an insurance of prompt payment. Rhett v. Poe, §§ 974-979.

§ 898. An indorser who has discharged a maker from liability by a release is not entitled to notice of dishonor. Burke v. McKay, §§ 947-949.

§ 899. A guarantor of future advances is entitled to notice of the acceptance of the guaranty, and of consent to act under the guaranty and to make the advances. But it is generally not necessary to give another and future distinct notice to the guarantor of the amount of the advances actually made and the terms upon which they have been made, when the transaction is completed, although this rule may be otherwise in particular cases having peculiar circumstances. No such second notice is necessary where all the parties are originally privy to the whole transaction. Nor will the guarantor be released by a failure to give him notice of the default or insolvency of the person guarantied, unless he has been prejudiced by the omission to give such notice, and then the omission is a defense only to the extent to which it has damaged the guarantor. Wildes v. Savage, §§ 986-990.

§ 900. If an indorser lives in the town in which a note is made payable, notice to him must be personal, unless he agrees to receive it otherwise, or unless by the usage of the bank where the note is payable, the notice should be sent him by mail. Bowling v. Harrison, §§ 991-994.

§ 901. Where for several years prior to the maturity of a note it had been the usage of the bank at which it was payable to have notice personally served on indorsers resident in the same city with itself, unless there was a memorandum on the note designating a place where notice was to be served, in which case the notice was left at such place, held, that the following memorandum on the note, "Third indorser, J. P. H., lives at Vicksburg," did not amount to an agreement to take notice through the postoffice. Ibid.

§ 902. An indorser resided two or three miles from Georgetown, where the note was payable, and habitually received his letters at the postoffice of that place. Held, that notice directed to him and mailed at the Georgetown postoffice was sufficient, although he frequently resorted for the transaction of business to a house in Washington. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, §§ 995-997.

§ 903. A notice addressed "To Thomas D. Carneal, Campbell county, Kentucky," was mailed at Cincinnati. C. received his letters at either of three postoffices — Cincinnati, Newport, and Covington — near to each of which places he lived and did business. Held, a sufficient notice, notwithstanding the general direction. Bank of the United States v. Carneal, §§ 964-971.

§ 904. Demand was made before three o'clock P. M., and notice of dishonor might have been mailed so as to have been carried by the post that night and delivered next day, but notice was in fact not mailed until the next day. Held, sufficient, as ordinary diligence only was required. Bank of Alexandria v. Swann, §§ 972, 973.

§ 905. Demand and protest on the last day of grace, and a notice on the following day, shows due diligence, even though the protest be dated on the day of notice. Cookendorfer v. Preston, §§ 998-1000.

§ 906. Where an indorser is not engaged in business, but is a physician practicing in a particular neighborhood, an inquiry of one residing in and familiar with that neighborhood as to the indorser's residence is sufficient diligence to ascertain his address. Lambert v. Ghiselin, §§ 1001-1004.

§ 907. A notary was handed a note by the cashier of a bank to make demand and give notice of non-payment. He inquired of the cashier, and, of another person, resident in the same county with the indorser, in order to ascertain the indorser's postoffice address. He did not inquire of the holder of the note because he did not know him, although it appeared that the holder could have informed him of the address had he been asked. Held, that the failure to make inquiry of the holder as to the indorser's postoffice did not render the notice insufficient, if the notary used due diligence in all other respects. Harris v. Robinson, §§ 980-982.

§ 908. Notice of protest to an indorser, left at the place of business of his son, is not sufficient, even though the indorser reside in the same house, over said son's place of business, but has a place of business elsewhere. But it would be sufficient notice if it was actually received by the indorser, though the proof must be clear and certain. The jury cannot infer the actual receipt of notice from loose and indeterminate facts. Bank of United States v. Corcoran, §§ 1005-1007.

§ 909. Where the parties reside in the same city, and the notary calls at the residence of the indorser, and finds it closed and locked, and inquires of the nearest neighbor, who informs him that the indorser and family have left town, for an unknown time, held, sufficient diligence to excuse further notice by mail. Williams v. Bank of United States, §§ 1008-1010.

§ 910. Timely notice of protest must be given, or its omission excused by showing due diligence, in order to charge the indorser. Ibid.

§ 911. If the parties reside in the same city or town the indorser must be personally notified of the dishonor of the bill or note, either verbally or in writing; or a written notice must be left at his dwelling house or place of business. Ibid.

§ 912. Evidence of the postmaster and his deputy as to the course of the mails and usages of the postoffice is admissible to show diligence in giving notice. Dickins v. Beal, §§ 950-957.

§ 913. A copy of the notice sent by mail need not be produced, nor need proof of its contents be made in order to show due notice. It is sufficient if the notice itself be produced on the trial, and the oath of the notary made that notice was given. Or notice may be proved by entries on the notary's books, proved by his handwriting after death, or his belief arising from the fact of his having made such entry, connected with his uniform usage. Ibid.

§ 914. The liability of a drawer or indorser of a dishonored bill of exchange does not depend upon his receiving actual notice, but is fixed by due diligence to give or send him notice. Ibid.

§ 915. If after due diligence a notice is sent to a wrong address, it is not incumbent upon the holder, after discovering the mistake, to send a notice to the right address. Lambert v. Ghiselin, §§ 1001-1004.

§ 916. The rule that each party has an entire day after that on which he has been informed of the dishonor of the bill to give notice to the party to whom he looks for payment applies only where the holder of the bill is a party to it. A mere agent to notify of the bill's dishonor has no such time. United States v. Barker, § 1011.

§ 917. Where the holder employed an agent to give notice of the dishonor and protest of a bill, and such agent received the notice the morning of Saturday, and might have given it on that day to the drawer, but neglected to do so until the Monday following, the notice is insufficient and the drawer is released. Ibid.

§ 918. A promissory note was made by A. to B. and payable in Boston, where B. resided. B. indorsed it to the branch of the United States Bank at Portsmouth, which sent it to the Boston Branch for collection. A. failed to pay it, and the Boston Branch notified the Portsmouth Branch, which in turn gave notice to B. Held, that this circuitry of notice and the delay consequent thereupon were no defense to an action on the note against B. as indorser. An agent to collect a note is bound to give notice of its non-payment only to his principal; if there be, back of the principal, prior indorsers, they may be notified by the principal or their immediate indorsees. United States Bank v. Goddard, §§ 1012-1017.

§ 919. The general rule requires notice of demand, non-payment and protest to be given to makers, drawers or indorsers, in order to bind them to pay their bills. This rule, however, does not apply in favor of the maker or drawer of a bill where he has no funds or effects in the hands of the drawee, and no good reason to expect that the bill will be honored upon presentation. Where the drawees resided in England and were engaged in selling and settling the English estate of the drawer, who was also shipping to them from Virginia tobacco to be sold on his account, it was held that these transactions warranted the drawer in drawing his draft, with the expectation of its being paid; that he was entitled to notice of its non-payment, and, none having been given him or his representatives until the institution of suit upon the bill, about forty years after its protest, he was held released from liability upon it. Hopkirk v. Page, §§ 1018-1023. See § 1068.

§ 920. But when the drawer's English estate had been substantially settled, and he had received from it all excepting a very small balance that he had reason to expect, and had ceased to ship tobacco to his English representatives, who had intimated to him their unwillingness to honor further drafts for money, notwithstanding which he drew a second bill upon them, which was not paid, held, that he was not released from liability upon it by the failure of the holders to notify him of the non-payment of the draft. Ibid.

§ 921. If the insolvency of the drawer and acceptor were known to each other, and the bill was drawn to pay for purchases on joint account, or a transaction in which they were partners, and the property so purchased had been diverted by the drawer to his own use, and the payment of the bill was subject to a private arrangement between the drawer and acceptor, the holder will be excused from giving notice of non-payment to the drawer. Rhett v. Poe, §§ 974-979.

§ 922. Where a drawer of a bill had funds in the hands of the acceptor at the time of acceptance, but withdrew them afterwards, with an understanding to supply other funds to meet the bill, and failed to supply the same, he was not entitled to notice of dishonor of the bill. Ibid.

§ 923. Notice of non-payment and protest is excused by a state of war. Hopkirk v. Page, §§ 1018-1026.

§ 924. Abandonment of residence and removal from the state to an unknown place excuses the giving of notice. Rhett v. Poe, §§ 974-979.

§ 925. While notice of demand and non-payment is usually necessary to charge an indorser, yet he may waive such notice, as by writing the holder on the last day of grace of a note of which he is indorser, that it will not be paid, but that he (the indorser) holds himself "responsible for the payment of this note, and shall see that it is done at an early day." Notice to the indorser after such a letter would be of no service to him, as he already knows of the non-payment and demand. Yeager v. Farwell, §§ 1027, 1028. See § 1062.

§ 926. An indorser's letter: "I do request that hereafter any notes that may fall due in the Union Bank, on which I am or may be indorser, shall not be protested, as I will consider myself bound in the same manner as if the said notes had been or should be legally protested," waives demand and notice. Union Bank v. Hyde, §§ 938, 939.

§ 927. An indorser's assurances to the holder, made before or after maturity, that the drawers should or would pay the note, but not accompanied by any promise on his part to pay it, do not amount to a waiver of notice by the indorser. Burrows v. Hannegan, §§ 1029-1033.

§ 928. The taking from the maker by an indorser of a partial indemnity in the shape of a mortgage, given to secure the indorser from loss in case he shall be compelled to pay the note, does not amount to a waiver of notice by the indorser. Ibid.

§ 929. If an indorser promise to pay a promissory note after it is due, with full knowledge that demand of payment has not been made of the maker, he may be held liable to pay it, but not if the proof fail to show that when he promised he was aware of his discharge from liability by reason of the holder's laches. Thornton v. Wynn, §§ 1034-1037.

§ 930. Where negotiable paper is given as conditional payment, the proceeds to be collected by the holder and applied in payment of the debt, it is incumbent on the holder to use due diligence in collecting the money by making a demand when it becomes due, and in giving notice of non-payment to those whose names are on the paper. If in this respect the holder is guilty of laches, so as to release the parties on the bill, he makes the paper his own and must sustain the loss. Foote v. Brown, §§ 1038-1040.

§ 931. Creditor A. received from debtor B. a draft, indorsed by B. and drawn by C. upon D., upon the understanding that the draft was not to be taken by A. in payment of B.'s debt, but that the proceeds of it when paid should be applied upon the debt. Upon maturity the draft was not paid. A. gave B. no notice of its non-payment, but sued him for the debt upon the open account. Held, that, although the bill was not received by A. in payment, he could not be considered as a mere agent to collect it; that he was the holder of the bill, neither the drawer nor indorser (debtor) having any right to withdraw it or to do anything with it prejudicial to his interests; that having failed to notify the indorser of its non-payment he released him from liability both as debtor upon the open account and as indorser. Allen v. King, §§ 1041-1047. See § 1155.

§ 932. Where a bank loses a bill remitted to it for collection, negligence is presumed, and the burden of rebutting this presumption rests upon the bank. Chicopee Bank v. Philadelphia Bank, §§ 1048-1053.

§ 933. It is the duty of agents to collect a check to present and demand payment of it within the time prescribed by law, and if it be not paid, to notify the owners of its dishonor. If loss occurs on account of the acts or omissions of the collecting agent, he is liable. Essex Co. Nat. Bank v. Bank of Montreal, §§ 1053-1058.

§ 934. The law presumes damages from the negligence or unauthorized act of a collecting agent of commercial paper, whereby any party to it is released or not charged. Ibid.

§ 935. If an agent to collect a check accept a certification of it instead of a cash payment, this discharges the drawer and makes the agent and the drawee liable to the holder for the amount of it. Ibid.

§ 936. A bank or other agent to collect a note, which, upon receiving notice of its non-payment and protest, fails to notify prior indorsers thereof, is liable if the amount of the note is lost by its negligence in this respect. Bird v. Louisiana State Bank, §§ 1059-1061.

§ 937. Parent bank liable for the negligence of its branches in failing to give notice of non-payment and protest. Ibid. As to collection agents, see AGENCY, VII; BANKS, VIII.

UNION BANK v. HYDE.

(6 Wheaton, 572-576. 1821.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This cause turns upon the construction of a written instrument in these words:

"I do request that hereafter any notes that may fall due in the Union Bank, on which I am or may be indorser, shall not be protested, as I will consider myself bound in the same manner as if the said notes had been or should be legally protested.

(Signed)

"THOMAS HYDE."

Two constructions have been contended for: the one, literal, formal, vernacular; the other, resting on the spirit and meaning, as a mercantile and bank transaction. The former has been sustained in the court below, and the correctness of that opinion is now to be examined.

§ 938. Inland bills need not be protested.

The defendant, it appears, became indorser to one Foyles, and the note was discounted in the Union Bank; on its falling due, it is admitted that no demand was made on the drawer, or notice given to the indorser. The case presents the right of the plaintiffs under two aspects: 1. Upon the just construction of the written instrument. 2. The practical exposition of it by the defendant himself; and it might also have presented a third: the specific waiver of demand and notice on the note in suit. By some assumed analogy, or mistaken notions of law, this practice of protesting inland bills has now become very generally prevalent; and since the inundations of the country with bank transactions, and the general resort to this mode of exposing the breaches of punctuality which occur upon notes, a solemnity, cogency and legal effect have been given to such protests in public opinion, which certainly has no foundation in the law merchant. The nullity of a protest on the legal obligations of the parties to an inland bill is tested by the consideration that, independently of statutory provision (if any exists anywhere) or conventional understanding, the protest on an inland bill is no evidence in a court of justice of either of the incidents which convert the conditional undertaking of an indorser into an absolute assumption. The protest belongs altogether to foreign mercantile transactions, upon which, on the contrary, it is an indispensable incident to making a drawer of a bill, or indorser of a note, liable. On foreign bills it is the evidence of demand, and an indispensable step towards the legal notice of non-payment, in consequence of which the undertaking of the drawer or indorser becomes absolute. Hence, as to foreign transactions, it is justly predicated of a protest, that it has a legal or binding effect.

§ 939. Waiver of protest construed a waiver of demand and notice on inland bills.

But the writing under consideration has reference exclusively to inland bills, and as to them the protest has no legal or binding effect. The indorser becomes liable only on demand and notice, and of these facts the protest is no evidence. How, then, shall the waiver of the protest be adjudged a waiver of demand and notice, or in effect convert his conditional into an absolute undertaking? Had the defendant omitted one word from his undertaking, it would have been difficult to maintain an affirmative answer to this proposition. But what are we to understand him to intend, when he says: "I will consider myself bound in the same manner as if said notes had been or should be legally protested?" Except as to foreign bills, a protest has no legal binding effect, and as to them it is evidence of demand, and incident to legal notice. It either then had this meaning or it had none. This reasoning, it may be said, goes no further than to a waiver of the demand; but what effect is to be given to the word bound? It must be to pay the debt, or it means nothing. But to cast on the indorser of a foreign bill an obligation to take it up, protest alone is not sufficient; he is entitled to a reasonable notice in addition to the technical notice communicated by the protest. To bind him to pay the debt, all these incidents were indispensable, and may, therefore, be well supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties, when entering into this contract. It is not unworthy of remark, that the writing under consideration asks a boon of the plaintiff, for which it tenders a consideration. It requests to be exempted from an expense, exposure, or mortification, on the one hand; and on the other, what is tendered in return? The intended object and conceived effect of the protest on the one hand is to convert his undertaking into an unconditional assumption, and the natural return is to make his undertaking at once absolute, as the effectual means of obtaining the benefit solicited. If this course of reasoning should not be held conclusive, it would at least be sufficient to prove the language of the undertaking equivocal; and that the sense in which the parties used the words in which they express themselves may fairly be sought in the practical exposition furnished by their own conduct, or the conventional use of language established by their own customs or received opinions. On this point the evidence proves that, by the understanding of both parties, this writing did dispense with demand and refusal; that the company, on the one hand, discontinued their practice of putting the notes indorsed by defendant in the usual course for rendering his assumption absolute, and the defendant, on the other, continued up to the last moment to acquiesce in this practice, by renewing his indorsements without ever requiring demand or notice. This was an unequivocal acquiescence in the sense given by the company to his undertaking, and he cannot be permitted to lie by, and lull the company into a state of security, of which he might at any moment avail himself, after making the most of the credit thus acquired. Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

DENNISTOUN v. STEWART.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Alabama.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE GRIER.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiffs declared against the defendant, as drawer of a bill of exchange, by the name and style of James Reid & Co., of which the following is a copy:

"No. —. £4,417,14s. 11d. st'g.

MOBILE, September 9, 1850.

"Sixty days after sight of this of first exchange (second and third unpaid), pay to the order of ourselves, in London, forty-four hundred and seventeen pounds, 14s. 11d. st'g, value received, and charge the same to account of 1,058 bales cotton per 'Windsor Castle.'

"Your obedient servants,

"Pr. pro JAMES REID AND CO.,

"WM. MOULT, Jr.

"To Hy. Gore Booth, Esq., Liverpool."

Acceptance across the face of the bill.

"Seventh October, 1850. Accepted for two thousand five hundred and seventy-one pounds, eighteen shillings and seven pence, being balance unaccepted for acct, 1,058 bf. colton pr. Windsor Castle, payable at Glyn and Co.

"Pr. pro HENRY GORE BOOTH,

"AND. E. BYRNE.

"Due 9 Decem."

Indorsed: "Pay Messrs. A. Dennistoun and Co., or order,

"Pr. pro JAMES REID AND Co.,

"WM. MOULT, Jr."

After reading this bill, with its indorsement, the plaintiff offered in evidence a regular protest, indorsed on a copy of a bill agreeing in every particular with the above, except that for "And. E. Byrne" was written "Chas. Byrne." The defendant objected to the reading of the protest in evidence, because it did not describe the bill of exchange produced by the plaintiffs, but a different bill. The court sustained this objection, and excluded the protest from the jury, which is the subject of the first bill of exceptions.

§ 940. Error in name of acceptor's agent will not render protest inadmissible as evidence.

A protest is necessary by the custom of merchants in case of a foreign bill, in order to charge the drawer. It is defined to be in form "a solemn declaration written by the notary under a fair copy of the bill, stating that the payment or acceptance has been demanded and refused, the reason, if any, assigned, and that the bill is, therefore, protested." A copy of the bill, it is said, should be prefixed to all protests, with the indorsements transcribed verbatim. 1 Pardess., 444; Chitty on Bills, 45§.

However stringent the law concerning mercantile paper, with regard to protest, demand and notice may appear, it is nevertheless founded on reason and the necessities of trade. It exacts nothing harsh, unjust or unreasonable. A protest, though necessary, need only be noted on the day on which payment was refused. It may be drawn and completed at any time before the commencement of the suit, or even before the trial, and, consequently, may be amended according to the truth, if any mistake has been made. The copy of the bill is connected with the instrument certifying the formal demand by the public officer, as the easiest and best mode of identifying it with the original. Mercantile paper is generally brief, and without the verbiage which extends and enlarges more formal legal instruments. Hence, it is much easier to give a literal copy of such bills than to attempt to identify them by any abbreviation or description. The amount, the date, the parties, and the conditions of the bill, form the substance of every such instrument. Slight mistakes, or variances of letters, or even words, when the substance is retained, cannot and ought not to vitiate the protest. A lost bill may be protested when the notary has been furnished with a sufficient description as to date, amount, parties, etc., to identify it. In indictments for forgery, it is not sufficient to state the "substance and effect" of the instrument; it must be laid according to the "tenor," or exact letter; but the law merchant demands no such stringency of construction. The sharp criticism indulged when the life of a prisoner is in jeopardy cannot be allowed for the purpose of eluding the payment of just debts.

It is unnecessary that a copy of the protest should be included in the notice to the drawer and indorsers. The object of notice is to inform the party to whom it is sent that payment has been refused by the maker, and that he is held liable. Hence, such a description of the note as will give sufficient information to identify it, is all that is necessary. What was said by Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of this court, in Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 431 (§§ 958-963, infra), with regard to variances and mistakes in notices, will equally apply to protests: "It cannot be for a moment maintained that every variance, however immaterial, is fatal. It must be such a variance as conveys no sufficient knowledge to the party of the particular note which has been dishonored. If it does not mislead him, if it conveys to him the real fact, without any doubt, the variance cannot be material, either to guard his rights or avoid his responsibility." In the case before us, the protest had an accurate copy of every material fact which could identify the bill — the date, the place where drawn, the amount, the merchandise on which it was drawn, the ship by which it was sent, the balance on the cotton for which it was accepted, the names of drawers, acceptor, indorsers; in fine, everything necessary to identify the bill. The only variance is a mistake in copying or deciphering the abbreviations and flourishes with which the Christian name of the acceptor's agent is enveloped. The abbreviation of "And." has been mistaken for Chas., and the middle letter E. omitted. The omission of the middle letter would not vitiate a declaration or indictment. Nor could the mistake mislead any person as to the identity of the instrument described.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the objection made to this protest, "that it does not describe the bill of exchange produced, but a different bill," is not true in fact, and should have been overruled by the court. This renders it unnecessary for us to notice the offer of testimony to prove the identity, which was also overruled by the court.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

BUCKNER v. FINLEY.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WASHINGTON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action of assumpsit, founded on a bill of exchange drawn at Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, upon Stephen Dever, at New Orleans, in favor of R. L. Colt, a citizen of Maryland, who indorsed the same to the plaintiff, a citizen of New York. The action was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland; and upon a case agreed, stating the above facts, the judges of that court were divided in opinion whether they could entertain jurisdiction of the cause upon the ground insisted upon by the defendants' counsel, that the bill was to be considered as inland. The difficulty which occasioned the adjournment of the cause to this court is produced by the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, which declares that no district or circuit court shall have "cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange."

The only question is, whether the bill on which the suit is founded is to be considered a foreign bill of exchange. It is to be regretted that so little aid in determining this question is to be obtained from decided cases, either in England or in the United States. Sir William Blackstone, in his commentaries (vol. 2, 467), distinguishes foreign from inland bills, by defining the former as bills drawn by a merchant residing abroad, upon his correspondent in England, or vice versa; and the latter as those drawn by one person on another when both drawer and drawee reside within the same kingdom. Chitty, p. 16, and the other writers (Bayley, Kyd) on bills of exchange, are to the same effect; and all of them agree that, until the statutes of 8 and 9 W. III., c. 17, and 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9, which placed these two kinds of bills upon the same footing, and subjected inland bills to the same law and custom of merchants which governed foreign bills, the latter were much more regarded in the eye of the law than the former as being thought of more public concern in the advancement of trade and commerce. Applying this definition to the political character of the several states of this Union in relation to each other, we are all clearly of opinion that bills drawn in one of these states upon persons living in any other of them partake of the character of foreign bills, and ought so to be treated; for all national purposes embraced by the federal constitution, the states and the citizens thereof are one, united under the same sovereign authority, and governed by the same laws. In all other respects the states are necessarily foreign to and independent of each other. Their constitutions and forms of government being, although republican, altogether different, as are their laws and institutions. This sentiment was expressed with great force by the president of the court of appeals of Virginia in the case of Warder v. Arell, 2 Wash., 298, where he states that, in cases of contracts, the laws of a foreign country where the contract was made must govern, and then adds as follows: "The same principle applies, though with no greater force, to the different states of America; for, though they form a confederated government, yet the several states retain their individual sovereignties, and, with respect to their municipal regulations, are to each other foreign."

This character of the laws of one state in relation to the others is strongly exemplified in the particular subject under consideration, which is governed, as to the necessity of protest and rate of damages, by different rules in the different states. In none of these laws, however, so far as we can discover from Griffith's Law Register, to which we were referred by the counsel, except those of Virginia, are bills drawn in one state upon another designated as inland, although the damages allowed upon protested bills of that description are generally, and with great propriety, lower than upon bills drawn upon a country foreign to the United States, since the disappointment and injury to the holder must always be greater in the latter than in the former case. It is for the same reason, no doubt, that, by the laws of most of the states, bills drawn in and upon the same state, and protested, are either exempt from damages altogether, or the rate is lower upon them than upon bills drawn on some other of the states. The only case which was cited at the bar, or which has come to our knowledge, to show that a bill drawn in one state upon a person in any other of the states is an inland bill, is that of Miller v. Hackley, 5 Johns., 375. Alluding to this case in the third volume of his Commentaries, p. 63, in a note, Chancellor Kent remarks very truly that the opinion was not given on the point on which the decision rested; and he adds that it was rather the opinion of Mr. Justice Van Ness than that of the court. It is not unlikely, besides, that that opinion was, in no small degree, influenced by what is said by Judge Tucker, in a note to 2 Black. Com., 467, which was much relied upon by one of the counsel in the argument, where the author would appear to define an inland bill as being one drawn by a person residing in one state on another within the United States. He is so understood by Chancellor Kent in the passage which has been referred to; but this is undoubtedly a mistake, as the note manifestly refers to the laws of Virginia; and by an act of that state passed on the 28th of December, 1795, it is expressly declared that all bills of exchange drawn by any person residing in that state on a person in the United States shall be considered in all cases as inland bills. The case of Miller v. Hackley, therefore, can hardly be considered as an authority for the position which it was intended to maintain. We think it cannot be so considered by the courts of New York, since the principle supposed to be decided in that case would seem to be directly at variance with the uniform decisions of the same courts upon the subject of judgments rendered in the tribunals of the sister states. In the case of Hitchcock v. Aicken, 1 Caines, 460, all the judges seem to have treated those judgments as foreign in the courts of New York; and the only point of difference between them grew out of the construction of the first section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States and the act of congress of the 26th of May, 1790 (Stats. at Large, 122), respecting the effect of those judgments and the credit to be given to them in the courts of the sister states.

It would seem from a note to the case of Bartlett v. Knight, 1 Mass., 401, where a collection of state decisions on the same subject is given, that these judgments had generally, if not universally, been considered as foreign by the courts of many of the states. If this be so, it is difficult to understand upon what principle bills of exchange, drawn in one state upon another state, can be considered as inland, unless in a state where they are declared to be such by a statute of that state.

It has not been our good fortune to see the case of Duncan v. Course, 1 S. Carolina Const. R., 100; but the note above referred to in 3 Kent's Com. informs us that it decides that bills of this description are to be considered in the light of foreign bills; and the learned commentator concludes, upon the whole, and principally upon the ground of the decision just quoted, that the weight of American authority is on that side. That it is so, in respect to the necessity of protesting bills of that description, was not very strenuously controverted by the counsel for the defendant. But he insists that, under a just construction of the eleventh section of the judiciary act, concerning the jurisdiction of the federal courts, these bills ought to be considered and treated as inland. The argument is, that the mischief intended to be remedied by the provisions in the latter part of that section, by the assignment of promissory notes and other choses in action, is the same in relation to bills of exchange of the character under consideration. We are of a different opinion. The policy which probably dictated this provision in the above section was to prevent frauds upon the jurisdiction of those courts by pretended assignments of bonds, notes, and bills of exchange strictly inland; and as these evidences of debt generally concern the internal negotiations of the inhabitants of the same state, and would seldom find their way fairly into the hands of persons residing in another state, the prohibition as to them would impose a very trifling restriction, if any, upon the commercial intercourse of the different states with each other. It is quite otherwise as to bills drawn in one state upon another. They answer all the purposes of remittances, and of commercial facilities, equally with bills drawn upon other countries, or vice versa; and if a choice of jurisdiction be important to the credit of bills of the latter class, which it undoubtedly is, it must be equally so to that of the former. Nor does the reason for restraining the transfer of other choses in action apply to bills of exchange of this description, which, from their commercial character, might be expected to pass fairly into the hands of persons residing in the different states of the Union. We conclude, upon the whole, that in no point of view ought they to be considered otherwise than as foreign bills.

BAILEY v. DOZIER.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE NELSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This is a writ of error to the circuit court of the United States held by the district judge in and for the southern district of Mississippi. The suit was brought on an inland bill of exchange by the indorsee against the drawers, and resulted, in the court below, in a verdict for the defendant on an objection taken to the validity of the protest. The statute of Mississippi provides for protesting inland bills in case of non-acceptance, or of non-payment by the drawee, after due presentment, in like manner as in case of foreign bills of exchange; and allows five per cent. damages on the amount for which the bill is drawn. Howard & Hutchinson, Statutes of Miss., 372, § 8; 375, § 17; and 376, § 20. On the trial, the notary was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and proved the presentment of the bill at maturity, demand of payment, and refusal, and notice to the drawers. And further, that he drew up the protest in form at the time and delivered it to the holders, but that on account of some alleged defect, which is not stated in the bill of exceptions, it was returned to him, and a second one made out and delivered, which was also subsequently returned, and a third drawn up, which was the protest offered in evidence. It was made out nearly a year after the presentment. The court below decided that the protest was invalid, and instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover, unless the bill had been duly protested according to the requirement of the statute. Whereupon a verdict was rendered for the defendant.

§ 942. Justice of the peace may present and protest a note.

The bill was presented and the protest made out by a justice of the peace, as a notary ex officio; and on the argument the ruling of the court was sought to be sustained, on the ground that the power of this officer to protest bills extended only to cases where the notary was absent or could not be procured. But, on looking into the laws of Mississippi, it was found that a subsequent statute had given the power to this officer in all cases without any qualification, and the point was given up. How. & Hutch., 430. § 24. The ground of objection, therefore, is narrowed down to the time when, and the circumstances under which, the notarial protest was drawn up in form.

§ 943. Time of drawing up formal protest may be at notary's convenience.

And on looking into the cases and books of authority on the subject, it will be found that if the bill has been duly presented for acceptance, or payment, and dishonored, and a minute made at the time of the steps taken, which is called noting the bill, the protest may be drawn up in form afterwards, at the convenience of the notary. And it has been held, if drawn up at any time before the trial, it will be sufficient. Chitty on Bills, 334, 436, and cases. Ed. 1842. The minute contains a brief record of the facts which transpired on presenting the bill; and the protest, as subsequently made out, is but an extension of them in the customary form. The time of the extension, therefore, would seem to be of no great importance. For the same reason, if a mistake should occur, no great danger need be apprehended if the notary is permitted to correct it, provided the regular steps have been taken, and noted, to charge the parties. The amendment would not be made from memory or recollection, but from a written memorandum of the facts.

§ 944. Statute authorizing protest of domestic bills does not make protest essential to recovery thereupon.

But without pursuing this view of the case further, a decisive ground against the ruling of the court below is, that a protest of the bill was not essential to enable the plaintiff to recover. The statute of Mississippi is taken substantially from the 9 and 10 Wm. III., c. 17, amended by the 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9, under which it has always been held by the courts in England that the action at common law was not thereby taken away; but that an additional remedy was given, by which the holder could recover interest and damages on an inland bill in cases where he was not entitled to them at common law. And that if he chose to waive the benefit of the statute, he might still recover the amount due on the bill, by giving the customary proof of default and notice. 2 Ld. Raym., 992; S. C., 1 Salk., 131; S. C., 6 Mod., 80; 2 Barn. & Ald., 696; Chitty on Bills, 466. The act of Mississippi is not more explicit and positive in its terms, in respect to the duty of protesting, than that of the 9 and 10 Wm. III., as will be seen on a comparison of the two acts, and should receive a similar interpretation. It follows, therefore, from this view, as the plaintiff did not claim the five per cent. damages given by the act, he should have been allowed to recover the amount of the bill, principal and interest, on the testimony of the notary alone, independently of the written protest.

It appears from the record that the defendant put in two pleas to the jurisdiction in the court below, for the want of proper parties, and also the plea of non-assumpsit. To the latter, the similiter was added, upon which issue the cause went down to trial. No notice was taken of the pleas to the jurisdiction. It is suggested that this affords ground of error on the record. The plea of non-assumpsit in bar of the action operated as a waiver of the pleas to the jurisdiction, which doubtless furnishes the reason why no notice was afterwards taken of these pleas by either party. 3 Johns., 105; 6 Bac. Abr., tit. Pl. & Pl., let. a, 186, 187; Gould, Pl., c. 5, § 13. They were virtually abandoned by the defendant.

§ 946. Right to sue on note in federal court.

It was also suggested that it appeared from the declaration that Fatheree, the payee of the bill, was a citizen of Mississippi, and that the plaintiff, deriving title from him, though a citizen of Virginia, could not maintain the action, for want of jurisdiction, within the eleventh section of the judiciary act. The answer to the suggestion is that the fact upon which it is founded is not sustained by the record. The suit was brought originally against Dozier and Fatheree, the drawer and payee, indorser, jointly, who are described in the commencement of the declaration as citizens of the state of Mississippi. But in a subsequent part of the declaration it is averred that Fatheree, at the time the bill was drawn, and also at the time of its transfer to the plaintiff, was an alien, and resident of Texas. The suit was discontinued as to Fatheree before the trial, which left it between the plaintiff and the defendant alone. The plaintiff being a citizen of Virginia, and deriving title through a person competent to maintain a suit in the circuit court against the defendant, that court properly took jurisdiction of the case. In every view taken of the case, we think the court below erred, and that the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with venire de novo by the court below.

BURKE v. MCKAY.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a writ of error to the circuit court of the district of Mississippi. The plaintiff in error brought an action of assumpsit in that court against the defendant in error, as indorsee upon a promissory note dated at Clinton, Mississippi, January 20, 1837, whereby R. E. Stratton, Samuel W. Dickson and B. Garland, or either of them, on the 1st day of January, 1840, promised to pay Robert Mathews, or order, $2,800 for value received. The note was indorsed by Mathews as follows: "I assign the within note to Robert McKay, and hold myself responsible for the same, waiving notice of demand and protest if not paid at maturity." The note was afterward indorsed by McKay (the defendant), as it should seem, in blank, and the plaintiff in error, in his declaration, made title as immediate indorsee to McKay. At the trial of the cause, upon the general issue, the plaintiff read the note and the indorsement, and also proved that, at the maturity of the note, due demand of payment was made of the makers by S. W. Humphreys, a justice of the peace of Hinds county, Mississippi, styling himself "acting notary public," who, upon the non-payment, made due protest thereof (the protest being by consent admitted as evidence of the facts), and gave due notice thereof to the payee of the note and to all the indorsers. The defendant (McKay) also admitted that, in a settlement with the makers of the note, in some other transactions, the present note was included, and the defendant released the makers from all liability thereon, but he denied that he had ever received of the makers full payment of the said note, and that, upon a compromise of all claims and controversies between them, he released the makers from all liability to the defendant; and he agreed that the same statement should be read and received at the trial of the case by the court and the jury. The district judge (who alone sat in the cause) instructed the jury that, in order to charge the indorser of a promissory note, the plaintiff must prove that it was protested on the day of its maturity by a notary public, and demand made, and notice of non-payment given by him; that the statement of Humphreys, admitted as evidence, not proving that fact, they must find for the defendant. Whereupon the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and judgment passed accordingly. A bill of exceptions was taken by the plaintiff to the instruction of the court at the trial; and the cause now comes before us upon the writ of error to examine the correctness of that instruction.

§ 947. Promissory notes need not be protested.

And we are all of opinion that the instruction was incorrect, and not maintainable in point of law. In the first place, by the general law merchant, no protest is required to be made upon the dishonor of any promissory note, but it is exclusively confined to foreign bills of exchange. This is so well known that nothing more need be said upon the subject than to cite the case of Young v. Bryan, 6 Wheat., 146, where the very point was decided. It is true that it is a very common practice for a notary public to be employed to make demand of payment of promissory notes from the makers, and also to give notice of the dishonor to the indorsers thereon. But this is a mere matter of convenience and arrangement between the holder and the notary, and is by no means a requisite imposed or recognized by law as binding upon the holder. Unless, therefore, there be some statute in Mississippi requiring the intervention of a notary in such cases (as we understand there is not), or some general usage equally binding, it is clear that the instruction proceeded upon a mistaken ground. In the next place, it is no necessary part of the official duty of a notary (subject to the like exceptions) to give notice to the indorsers of the dishonor of a promissory note, although certainly it is a very convenient and useful course in the transaction of such affairs in commercial cities.

§ 948. Who may act as a notary.

In the next place, if a protest were necessary, it is equally clear that it is not indispensable in all cases that the same should be actually made by a person who is in fact a notary. In many cases, even with regard to foreign bills of exchange, the protest may, in the absence of a notary, be made by other functionaries, and even by merchants. But where, as in Mississippi, a justice of the peace is authorized by positive law to perform the functions and duties of a notary, there is no ground to say that his act of protest is not equally valid with that of a notary. Quoad hoc he acts as a notary. See Howard and Hutchinson's Statutes of Mississippi, c. 37, § 24, p. 430.

§ 949. Indorser who releases maker is not entitled to notice of dishonor.

In the next place, in the present case, under the circumstances, the indorser (McKay) was not entitled to any notice whatsoever of the dishonor. He had actually discharged the makers from all liability for the payment of the note by his release and settlement with them. Of course, the notice could be of no use or value to him; for he would in no event be entitled to any recourse over against them; and, therefore, no notice to him would have been necessary, although it fully appears that he had received due notice of the dishonor.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the judgment ought to be reversed and venire facias de novo awarded.

DICKINS v. BEAL.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE BALDWIN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Samuel Dickins, the defendant, and Jesse Taylor were partners, transacting business at Hazelwood, Madison county, Tennessee, which was the residence of Dickins. On the 6th of December, 1832, Taylor drew a bill of exchange for $1,448, on Wilcox and Feron, New Orleans, in favor of Dickins, payable on the 1st of May, 1834, which Dickins indorsed to the plaintiff. On the same day, Dickins and Taylor drew two other bills, on the former house, in favor of the plaintiff; one for $2,302, payable the 1st of May; the other for $1,590, payable the 1st of April, 1834. The three bills were dated at Hazelwood, Madison county, Tennessee; presented to the drawers on the 3d of June, 1833, for acceptance; which being refused, they were protested, for non-acceptance, by a notary public, who, on the same day, gave notice thereof to the drawer and indorser of the first, and the drawers of the other two, by letters put into the postoffice, addressed to them at Hazelwood, aforesaid. It was testified by the notary that, not knowing of any other residence of the parties than that designated by the caption of the bill, he forwarded the notices accordingly, after inquiring of persons likely to know.

It appeared that all the bills were drawn without funds, or authority to draw; nor was any evidence offered to show that either Dickins or Taylor had any reason to think that their bills on Wilcox and Feron would be honored, except two letters from Wilcox and Feron, dated the 1st of December, 1831, addressed to the cashier of the Branch Bank of the United States, at Nashville. In one they say: "Messrs. Dickins and Taylor are authorized, in making negotiations, to value on our house in New Orleans, for say $10,000, in such form and at such time as they may think proper, and same will be duly honored." In the other: "Our friend, Colonel Samuel Dickins, is authorized, in negotiating with your institution, to value on our house in New Orleans, at any time, for such sums as he may think proper, and same will be duly honored by W. and F." These letters were in the handwriting of Wilcox and Feron, and in the possession of Dickins; they were offered to show that he was entitled to regular notice of the protest of the bills drawn by Dickins and Taylor; but were rejected by the court as incompetent. The plaintiff resided at New Orleans. Jackson is the county town of Madison county, Tennessee, about fourteen miles from Hazelwood, the defendant's residence, which is on Spring Creek, about half or three-fourths of a mile from a postoffice called Spring Creek postoffice, of which the defendant was postmaster, and did his business there in June, 1833. This was known to plaintiff, who about and before the 3d of June, 1833, directed a letter to defendant at "Hazelwood, Spring Creek, Madison county, Tennessee," and one to "Colonel Samuel Dickins, postmaster, Spring Creek, Madison county, Tennessee." At the trial, the plaintiff offered to prove, by the postmaster at Nashville, and his deputy, that that place was the distributing office for letters from New Orleans, intended for West Tennessee, including the county of Madison; that in June, 1833, they knew defendant was postmaster at Spring Creek; that if, in distributing the mail, they had seen a letter addressed to defendant at Hazelwood, they would have sent it to Spring Creek postoffice. Also to prove by the postoffice books at Nashville, that, on the 13th of June, 1833, the New Orleans mail arrived at Nashville; and, on the 14th, a package was sent to Spring Creek postoffice, which had come to Nashville for distribution, and was rated at fifty cents postage. To this evidence it was objected, by the defendant, that, inasmuch as the putting a letter into the postoffice containing notice of a protest, properly directed, forms a conclusive legal presumption that such notice was duly given and received, it was also a legal presumption that the notice went to the place directed and no other; and that the plaintiff was concluded from showing, either that the destination of the letter was changed on its passage, or was in point of fact sent to any other place. The court overruled the objection, and the evidence was received.

It was also testified that letters from Orleans, for the western district of Tennessee, come to Nashville for distribution, unless there was a river mail, in which case they would be delivered at Memphis and be distributed thence; other evidence was also given in relation to the course of the mail, and the usage of the postoffice at Nashville, which is needless to recite. In their charge to the jury, the court instructed them that the usage of a distributing office in conformity to law, and the authorized regulations of the department, and in the discharge of the official duties of the officers employed, might properly be taken into their consideration of the question submitted to them; which was whether, from the usual course of the mail, and the usage as proved, the notice of the protest would necessarily reach Spring Creek postoffice, or would fail to reach it, or be carried to some other office; in the first case, the court instructed them that the notice was served on the defendant; but in the other, the drawer was discharged unless actual notice was served.

Several instructions were prayed by the defendant, which the view taken by the court renders it unnecessary to consider, as they relate to matters not material to the cause; and, if given either way, they could not affect the right of either party. One, however, deserves particular notice, which was, "That the evidence of the notary was not sufficient proof that a legal notice was sent; but that he ought to have set out a copy of the notice, or stated its contents, in order that the court might judge whether it was sufficient." The court refused to give this instruction; but stated that it might reasonably be inferred from the nature of the notice, and from the fact that notice was given, as stated in the deposition. Exceptions were taken to the decision of the court on the questions of evidence, and the various matters given in charge to the jury.

§ 950. Admissibility of written authority to draw to prove right to notice of non-acceptance.

The first question which arises is on overruling the admission in evidence of the two letters from Wilcox and Feron to the cashier of the branch bank at Nashville. It was in full proof that Taylor and Dickins never had a dollar in the hands of Wilcox and Feron to pay any draft drawn on the latter, nor any money or other property in their hands to meet the bills at the time they became due, or any funds in their hands when presented and protested for non-acceptance. No proof was offered that Dickins and Taylor, or either of them, had made any consignments to Wilcox and Feron, as an expected or anticipated fund on which to draw. It was also proved that Jesse Taylor had neither funds or property in the hands of the drawees, when his bill in favor of Dickins was presented for acceptance, or when it became due; and that they had received no advice of such bill; and that the two bills of Dickins and Taylor, drawn in favor of the plaintiff, one for $2,802, and the other for $1,598, balanced their account on his books. It is clear, therefore, that this transaction was not a negotiation within the meaning or intention of these letters; they evidently referred to negotiations at the bank, or within the sphere of its operations in the commercial transactions of the firm; the one referring to Dickins alone was expressly limited to negotiations with that bank. The remittance of these bills to New Orleans in payment of an antecedent debt to the plaintiff was in no sense of the term a negotiation of them, and was so utterly inconsistent with the evident object of the letters, that the most remote expectation could not have been entertained that they would have been accepted. A mercantile house conducting operations at Memphis and New Orleans would, in the course of their business, lend their credit in anticipation of consignments, while they would refuse it to pay the debts due to other persons; these considerations could not escape the consideration of Dickins and Taylor, when they sought to make Wilcox and Feron their creditor, instead of Beall, by such a fraudulent abuse of the letters of credit. Had these bills come to the hands of an innocent holder in the course of trade, with a knowledge of these letters, the case would have been different; or if the bank had negotiated them, there would have been a reasonable expectation that they would have been honored; but Dickins and Taylor could have entertained no such expectation. The letters were, therefore, properly excluded, and the case must be considered as if they had not existed.

§ 951. Right of drawer to notice of dishonor.

An established exception to the general rule that notice of the dishonor of a bill must be given to the drawer is, where he has no funds in the hands of the drawee; but of this exception there are some modifications. 4 Cranch, 154; 1 Durn. & E., 405; 2 Durn. & E., 712; 12 E., 175; 20 J. R., 149, 150. If the drawer has made, or is making, a consignment to the drawee, and draws before the consignment comes to hand. 12 East, 175.

If the goods are in transitu, but the bill of lading is omitted to be sent to the consignee or the goods were lost. 16 E., 43. If the drawer has any funds or property in the hands of the drawee, or there is a fluctuating balance between them in the course of their transactions (15 E., 221); or a reasonable expectation that the bill would be paid. 4 M. & S., 229, 230. Or if the drawee has been in the habit of accepting the bills of the drawer without regard to the state of their accounts, this would be deemed equivalent to effects. 12 E., 175. Or if there was a running account between them. 15 E., 221. In all such cases, the drawer is considered as justified in drawing, as so far having a right to draw, that "the transaction cannot be denominated a fraud; for in such a case it is a fair commercial transaction, in which the drawer has reasonable expectation that his bill will be honored, and he is entitled to the same notice as a drawer with funds, or authority to draw without funds." 15 E., 220; 16 E., 44. But, unless he draws under some such circumstances, his drawing without funds, property, or authority, puts the transaction out of the pale of commercial usage and law; and as he can in nowise suffer by the want of notice of the dishonor of his drafts, that it is deemed a useless form. "Notice, therefore, can amount to nothing, for his situation cannot be changed." In a case where he has no fair pretense for drawing, there is no person on whom he can have a legal or equitable demand, in consequence of the non-payment or non-acceptance of the bill. This is the rule, as laid down by this court, in French v. Bank of Columbia, 4 Cranch, 153, 164 (§§ 983, 984, infra), on a very able and elaborate review of the then adjudged cases, which is fully supported by those since decided in England, and in the supreme court of New York. The case of the defendant falls clearly within the rule applicable to bills drawn without funds, or any bona fide, reasonable or just expectation of their being honored; and notice of their dishonor was not necessary. The case requires no opinion whether notice of the dishonor of Taylor's bill in favor of Dickins was necessary, and we forbear to express any.

§ 952. Evidence of postal officials admissible to show due diligence in giving notice.

The next question which arises is on the admission of the evidence of the postmaster at Nashville, and his deputy, in relation to the course of the mail, the usage of the office, and the facts to which they testify. We are at a loss to perceive any plausible objection to the evidence which was received by the court, on the assumption that notice of the dishonor of the bills must be made out by the plaintiff, which could be done in two ways: 1. That the bills had been duly protested for non-acceptance; and due and legal diligence used in giving notice thereof to the parties on the bills, in which case the legal presumption of its receipt in time would attach. 2. By proof that the notice actually came to hand in proper time, though the letter containing the notice was not properly directed, or sent by the most expeditious or direct route. The fact of notice, and its reception in due time, are the only matters material to the drawer or indorser of a dishonored bill; the manner or place in which he receives such notice is immaterial; for all the objects to be answered by its reception, it is equally available to them. To the holder it is immaterial whether the evidence of notice consists in the legal presumption arising from due diligence, which supplies the place of specific evidence, and is binding on a jury as proof of the fact of its reception, or it is established by direct evidence, or such circumstances as will, in law, justify them in drawing the inference. 2 Pet., 132.

Since the case of Buckner v. Findley, 2 Pet., 589, 591 (§ 941, supra), decided on great consideration, it has been the established doctrine of this court that a bill of exchange drawn in one of the states of this Union on a person in another is a foreign bill, and to be treated as such; and that in this respect they are to be considered as states foreign to each other, though they are otherwise as to all the purposes of their federal constitution. Among these purposes are the establishment of postoffices and post-roads, the regulation of which has been delegated to the federal government, and is exercised by their laws and the regulations of the postoffice department conformably thereto. On these depend all the communications between the states by mail, the time of departure from different places, its route, place, and course of its arrival, and distribution. The usage of the officers employed in the various details of the operations of the department, when acting within the line of their duty, as prescribed by law and regulations, become all-important to a court and jury in deciding on what is legal diligence in giving notice, or what is evidence of its reception. It is legal diligence in the holder of a bill, if he avails himself in time of the means of communicating notice, which are thus afforded; but he is not answerable for any defects in the outline or details of the regulation of the mails for the route in which the letter is carried, the time which elapses from its deposit in the office and delivery, or the mode of carrying or distributing the mails; but it is proper that he should give evidence of all these matters, as well to repel the imputation of laches if the letter does not come to hand or not in due time, as to prove its regular delivery, if there should be any doubt as to the use of diligence, in the direction or deposit of the letter. Such evidence is uniformly received in cases arising on the notice of dishonored bills.

§ 954. Copy of notice of dishonor mailed need not be produced to show notice.

The next question arises on the prayer of the defendant to instruct the jury that proof that the bills were protested and notice thereof put into the postoffice was not sufficient, without producing a copy of the notice, or proving its contents. In Lindenberger v. Beall, the notary testified that notice of non-payment was inclosed in a letter addressed to the defendant at H., and put into the postoffice at G.; he had no recollection of these facts, and only knew them from his notarial book and the protest made out at the time; from which, and his invariable practice, he presumed he had done so. This was held sufficient proof of such notice, and that it was unnecessary to give notice to defendant to produce it. 6 Wheat., 104, 106. In Nicholls v. Webb, the notary was dead; but on a memorandum on the margin of the protest it was stated in his handwriting, "Indorsee duly notified in writing 19th July, 1819, the last day of grace being Sunday, the 18th," which was held competent proof of notice. 8 Wheat., 326, 330. In this case the protests were produced at the trial, and the oath of the notary positive as to the fact of notice; this is entirely equivalent to an entry on his books, proved only by his handwriting after his death, or his belief arising from the fact of having made such entry, connected with his uniform usage. It must therefore be taken as settled law, that such is sufficient proof that the notice required by law was given. It remains to consider whether the letter containing the notice was so directed and deposited in the postoffice at Orleans as to comply with the law.

§ 955. A party is only required to use due diligence in giving notice.

In cases of this description the true question is, whether due diligence has been used by the holder of the bill; not whether he has given, or the defendant has received, notice; both are immaterial, if reasonable diligence has been used. This consists in giving notice, if, after the usual and proper inquiries are made, it is practicable to give it; but if, when this is done, the holder or notary cannot give the notice personally, where the parties reside in the same place, or does not know where to direct it by mail, the inquiry is diligence, without giving notice. After inquiring from other parties to the bill, and examining the directory, if the party's residence cannot be found (3 Camp., 263); if on calling at his residence, or place where he transacts his business, he is not to be found or any other person who can receive notice, it may be left there; or, if his house of business or residence is locked up, and on audible knocking no one answers, or the party has changed his former residence, or removed to the country, no notice is necessary. 9 Wheat., 599; 2 Pet., 102, 105, 129; 6 D. & R., 505; 20 J. R., 172, and cases cited. Where the parties do not reside in the same place, diligence consists in sending notice by the first mail, of the day of protest. 2 Wheat., 273; 9 Pet., 45. This is all that is necessary, if the letter containing the notice is properly directed. 4 Wheat., 438. If the residence of the party appears on the bill, the notice of protest, etc., must be directed there (12 East, 433); if it does not so appear, then reasonable diligence must be used in making inquiry for his residence, and a reasonable time will be allowed to give notice after ascertaining it; this has been held in case of notice to an indorsee in April, of a protest in October preceding. Wightwick's Ex., 76, 77.

When all the facts are ascertained, diligence is a question of law. Wightwick, 76; 1 Pet., 583. If the evidence is doubtful or contradictory, it is for the jury to decide (7 Pet., 290); but in either case, it turns on what is the usage of the place (9 Wheat., 587), the habits of men of business, the kind and mode of inquiry usually made in similar cases. 2 Burr., 669; 2 H. B. L., 565; 3 B. & P., 601; 20 J. R., 174. Thus a bill drawn by persons residing in Petersburg, Virginia, on a house in New York, and dated there, being protested, a clerk of the notary made inquiry at the banks and elsewhere, and on being informed that the drawers resided at Norfolk, directed one notice to them there, and put another into the postoffice in New York, directed to them there, it was held sufficient. 1 J. R., 294, 296; Chapman v. Lippincott, cited, 13 Johns., 433; 16 J. R., 220; 20 J. R., 174.

If a bill is drawn dated "Manchester" (or "London"), without any one direction, notice of protest, directed to the drawer at Manchester, was held good, on the presumption that it would reach him if so directed. 1 R. & M., 249, 250. Notice directed to the residence or house of business of the party is sufficient; the holder is not bound to show that notice is brought home, but only to employ the usual mode of conveyance; and the rules of diligence to which he is held ought not to be such as will tend to clog the circulation of commercial or negotiable paper by impairing the liability of those who have put it into circulation. 1 Pet., 583; 2 Pet., 102, 129. If an indorsee lives within a reasonable distance of a postoffice, notice to him, directed to him, at his residence, is good; as where a note was protested at Cincinnati, the notice was directed to T. D. O., Campbell county, Kentucky, though defendant lived on the south side of the Ohio, two miles from Cincinnati and Covington, and three miles from Newport, the county town, in all of which there were postoffices, and his residence was well known to the holder and postmaster. The putting the notice into the postoffice at Cincinnati was held sufficient. 2 Pet., 519.

§ 957. Liability of drawer or indorser depends not upon actual notice but upon due diligence to give notice.

The clear and conclusive result of these cases is, that as between the holder and the drawer or indorser of a dishonored bill, the question of their liability depends not on actual notice, but on seasonable diligence, which is in all cases tantamount to actual notice, whether given or not. Hence, it becomes useless to examine into the instructions prayed for by the defendant at the trial, and refused by the court, in relation to the course of the mail after leaving New Orleans, or the points submitted to the jury, for they could in no event avail the defendant, if the jury believed the evidence of the notary. As these were foreign bills, the protests produced at the trial were in themselves evidence of the demand and protest. 8 Wheat., 330. The oath of the notary, that he put the notice into the postoffice, on the day of protest, is competent and sufficient in law to prove the fact; the only question for the jury was his credibility. The notices were properly directed: 1. Because Hazelwood was the residence of the defendant, within a short distance of a postoffice. 2. The bills were dated at that place, and the direction of the notices was to the same place.

As a matter of law, then, we are clearly of opinion that due diligence was used by the plaintiff, when the notices of protest were put into the postoffice at New Orleans. His right of action was then consummated, and it can in nowise be affected by the course of the mail, or the arrangements concerning its route or distribution. We forbear any notice of the other questions presented at the trial, lest, by doing so, we should, by implication, be deemed to think they could in any event affect the right of the plaintiff, when no laches could be imputed to him or the notary. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, with costs and interest.

MILLS v. BANK OF UNITED STATES.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a suit originally brought in the circuit court of Ohio by the Bank of the United States against A. G. Wood and George Ebert, doing business under the firm of Wood & Ebert, Alexander Adair, Horace Reed, and the plaintiff in error, Peter Mills. The declaration was for $3,600, money lent and advanced. During the pendency of the suit Reed and Adair died. Mills filed a separate plea of non-assumpsit, upon which issue was joined; and, upon the trial, the jury returned a verdict for the Bank of the United States, for $4,641, upon which judgment was rendered in their favor. At the trial a bill of exceptions was taken by Mills, for the consideration of the matter of which the present writ of error has been brought to this court. By the bill of exceptions it appears that the evidence offered by the plaintiffs in support of the action “was by consent of counsel permitted to go to the jury, saving all exceptions to its competence and admissibility, which the counsel for the defendant reserved the right to insist in claiming the instructions of the court to the jury on the whole case."

The plaintiffs offered in evidence a promissory note, signed Wood and Ebert, and purporting to be indorsed in blank by Peter Mills, Alexander Adair and Horace Reed, as successive indorsers; which note, with the indorsements thereon, is as follows, to wit: "Chilicothe, 20th July, 1819. $3,600. Sixty days after date, I promise to pay to Peter Mills or order, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Chilicothe, $3,600, for value received. Wood and Ebert." Indorsed, "Pay to A. Adair or order, Peter Mills." "Pay to Horace Reed or order, A. Adair." "Pay to the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States or order, Horace Reed." On the upper right-hand corner of the note is also indorsed: "3185. Wood and Ebert, $3,600, Sept. 18-21." It was proven that this note had been sent to the office at Chilicothe, to renew a note which had been five or six times previously renewed by the same parties. It was proven, by the deposition of Levin Belt, Esq., mayor of the town of Chilicothe, that on the 22d day of September, 1819, immediately after the commencement of the hours of business, he duly presented the said note at the said office of discount and deposit, and there demanded payment of the said note, but there was no person there ready or willing to pay the same, and the said note was not paid, in consequence of which the said deponent immediately protested the said note for the non-payment and dishonor thereof, and immediately thereafter prepared a notice for each of the indorsers respectively, and immediately, on the same day, deposited one of said notices in the postoffice, directed to Peter Mills, at Zanesville (his place of residence), of which notice the following is a copy: "Chilicothe, 22d of September, 1819. Sir: You will hereby take notice that a note drawn by Wood and Ebert, dated 20th day of September, 1819, for $3,600, payable to you or order, in sixty days, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Chilicothe, and on which you are indorser, has been protested for non-payment, and the holders thereof look to you. Yours, respectfully, Levin Belt, mayor of Chilicothe." (Peter Mills, Esq.) It was further proven by the plaintiffs, that it had been the custom of the banks in Chilicothe, for a long time previously to the establishment of a branch in that place, to make demand of promissory notes and bills of exchange on the day after the last day of grace (that is, on the sixty-fourth day), that the Branch Bank, on its establishment at Chilicothe, adopted that custom, and that such had been the uniform usage in the several banks in that place ever since. No evidence was given of the handwriting of either of the indorsers. The court charged the jury: 1. That the notice, being sufficient to put the defendant on inquiry, was good, in point of form, to charge him, although it did not name the person who was holder of the said note, nor state that a demand had been made at the bank when the note was due. 2. That if the jury find that there was no other note payable in the office at Chilicothe, drawn by Wood and Ebert, and indorsed by defendant, except the note in controversy, the mistake in the date of the note, made by the notary in the notice given to that defendant, does not impair the liability of the said defendant, and the plaintiffs have a right to recover. 3. That, should the jury find that the usage of banks, and of the office of discount and deposit in Chilicothe, was to make demand of payment and to protest and give notice on the sixty-fourth day, such demand and notice are sufficient.

The counsel on the part of the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that before the common principles of the law relating to the demand and notice necessary to charge the indorser can be varied by a usage and custom of the plaintiffs, the jury must be satisfied that the defendant had personal knowledge of the usage or custom at the time he indorsed the note; and, also, that before the plaintiffs can recover as the holder and indorser of a promissory note, they must prove their title to the proceeds by evidence of the indorsements on the note," which instructions were refused by the court. Upon this posture of the case no questions arise for determination here, except such as grow out of the charge of the court, or the instructions refused on the prayer of the defendant's (Mills') counsel. Whether the evidence was, in other respects, sufficient to establish the joint promise stated in the declaration, or the joint consideration of money lent, are matters not submitted to us upon the record, and were proper for argument to the jury.

§ 958. Notice need not name holder.

The first point is, whether the notice sent to the defendant at Chilicothe was sufficient to charge him as indorser. The court was of opinion that it was sufficient, if there was no other note payable in the office at Chilicothe, drawn by Wood and Ebert, and indorsed by the defendant. It is contended that this opinion is erroneous, because the notice was fatally defective, by reason of its not stating who was the holder, by reason of its misdescription of the date of the note, and by reason of its not stating that a demand had been made at the bank when the note was due. The first objection proceeds upon a doctrine which is not admitted to be correct; and no authority is produced to support it. No form of notice to an indorser has been prescribed by law. The whole object of it is to inform the party to whom it is sent that payment has been refused by the maker; that he is considered liable; and that payment is expected of him. It is of no consequence to the indorser who is the holder, as he is equally bound by the notice whosoever he may be; and it is time enough for him to ascertain the true title of the holder when he is called upon for payment.

§ 959. Notice misdescribing note as to date is sufficient.

The objection of misdescription may be disposed of in a few words. It cannot be for a moment maintained that every variance, however immaterial, is fatal to the notice. It must be such a variance as conveys no sufficient knowledge to the party of the particular note which has been dishonored. If it does not mislead him, if it conveys to him the real fact without any doubt, the variance cannot be material, either to guard his rights or avoid his responsibility. In the present case the misdescription was merely in the date. The sum, the parties, the time and place of payment and the indorsement were truly and accurately described. The error, too, was apparent on the face of the notice. The party was informed that, on the 22d of September, a note indorsed by him, payable in sixty days, was protested for non-payment; and yet the note itself was stated to be dated on the 20th of the same month, and, of course, only two days before. Under these circumstances the court laid down a rule most favorable to the defendant. It directed the jury to find the notice good, if there was no other note payable in the office of Chilicothe, drawn by Wood and Ebert and indorsed by the defendant. If there was no other note how could the mistake of date possibly mislead the defendant? If he had indorsed but one note for Wood and Ebert, how could the notice fail to be full and unexceptionable in fact?

§ 960. Notice need not aver place of demand.

The last objection to the notice is that it does not state that payment was demanded at the bank when the note became due. It is certainly not necessary that the notice should contain such a formal allegation. It is sufficient that it states the fact of non-payment of the note, and that the holder looks to the indorser for indemnity. Whether the demand was duly and regularly made is matter of evidence to be established at the trial. If it be not legally made, no averment, however accurate, will help the case; and a statement of non-payment and notice is, by necessary implication, an assertion of right by the holder, founded upon his having complied with the requisitions of law against the indorser. In point of fact, in commercial cities, the general, if not universal practice, is not to state in the notice the mode or place of demand, but the mere naked non-payment. Upon the point, then, of notice, we think there is no error in the opinion of the circuit court.

§ 961. Notice of usage as to four days' grace presumed from making note payable at bank where such usage prevails.

Another question is whether the usage and custom of the bank not to make demand of payment until the fourth day of grace bound the defendant unless he had personal knowledge of that usage and custom. There is no doubt that, according to the general rules of law, demand of payment ought to be made on the third day, and that it is too late if made on the fourth day of grace. But it has been decided by this court, upon full consideration and argument, in the case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 582 (§§ 754-759, supra), that where a note is made for the purpose of being negotiated at a bank whose custom, known to the parties, it is to demand payment and give notice on the fourth day of grace, that custom forms a part of the law of such contract, at least so far as to bind their rights. In the present case the court is called upon to take one step further; and, upon the principles and reasoning of the former case, it has come to the conclusion that when a note is made payable or negotiable at a bank whose invariable usage it is to demand payment and give notice on the fourth day of grace, the parties are bound by that usage whether they have a personal knowledge of it or not. In the case of such a note the parties are presumed by implication to agree to be governed by the usage of the bank at which they have chosen to make the security itself negotiable.

§ 962. Proof of execution of note or indorsement may be dispensed with by rule of court.

Another question propounded by the defendant is whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover without establishing their title to the note, as holders, by proof of the indorsements. There is no doubt that, by the general rule of law, such proof is indispensable on the part of the plaintiffs unless it was waived by the other side. But in all such cases the defendant may waive a rule introduced for his benefit; and such waiver may be implied from circumstances as well as expressly given. It is in this view that the rule of the circuit court of Ohio, of 1819, which has been referred to at the bar, deserves consideration. That rule declares "that hereafter, in any actions brought upon bond, bill or note, it shall not be necessary for the plaintiffs on trial to prove the execution of the bond, bill or note unless the defendant shall have filed with his plea an affidavit that such bond, bill or note was not executed by him." We think the present case falls completely within the purview of this rule. Its object was to prevent unnecessary expense and useless delays upon objections at trials, which were frivolous and unconnected with the merits. If the rule attempted to interfere with or control the rules of evidence it certainly could not be supported. But it attempts no such thing. It does not deny to the party the right to demand proof of the execution or indorsement of the note at the trial, but it requires him, in effect, to give notice by affidavit accompanying the plea that he means to contest that fact under the issue. If the party gives no such notice and files no such affidavit it is, on his own part, a waiver of the right to contest the fact, or rather an admission that he does not mean to contest it. We see no hardship in such a rule. It subserves the purposes of justice and prevents the accumulation of costs. It follows out, in an exemplary manner, that injunction of the judiciary act of the 2d of March, 1793, c. 22, s. 7 (1 Stats. at Large, 335), which requires the courts of the United States "to regulate the practice thereof as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings." As no affidavit accompanied the plea of the defendant in the present case he had no right to insist upon the proof of the indorsements.

§ 963. Recovery limited to principal sum demanded, but interest may be added if ad damnum is high enough to cover it.

Another objection now urged against the judgment is, that the count demanded $3,600 only, and the jury gave damages amounting to $4,641. But there is no error in this proceeding, since the ad damnum is for a larger sum. In all cases where interest, not stipulated for by the terms of the contract, is given by way of damages, the sum demanded in the declaration is less than the sum for which judgment is rendered. The plaintiffs may not recover more, as principal, than the sum demanded as such in the declaration, but the jury have a right to add interest, by way of damages, for the delay.

Some other objections have been suggested at the bar, such as, that the jury had no right, without evidence, to presume that there was no other note of Wood and Ebert, in order to help the misdescription; and that the case proved was of several liabilities of the defendants, which would not support a declaration on a joint contract. These questions have been fully argued by counsel, but are not presented by the record in such a shape as to enable the court to take cognizance of them.

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court that the judgment ought to be affirmed, with costs.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. CARNEAL.

(2 Peters, 548-553. 1829.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a writ of error to the circuit court of the district of Ohio. The Bank of the United States brought a joint action against William Steele, William Lytle and Thomas D. Carneal (the defendant in error), upon a promissory note dated at Cincinnati, on the 22d of August, 1820, whereby Steele promised to pay Carneal, or order, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Cincinnati, the sum of $11,563, in sixty days after date, which note was afterwards successively indorsed by Carneal and Lytle, and was discounted by the bank and dishonored at its maturity. The declaration is for money lent and advanced, and the suit is authorized to be brought in this form jointly against all the parties to the note, by a statute of Ohio. The process was served upon Steele and Lytle, but returned "not served" upon Carneal. Judgment was afterwards duly obtained against Steele and Lytle, and a scire facias issued according to another statute of Ohio against Carneal, to which he appeared, and pleaded the general issue of non assumpsit, at the January term of the court in 1825. The cause was then regularly continued until July term, 1827, when by leave of the court he pleaded, as a further plea, the receipt of certain real estate of Lytle by the bank, after the commencement of the suit, in satisfaction of the debt due upon the note, and prayed judgment if the plaintiffs their action ought further to have or maintain against him. To this plea there was a replication, and issue to the country; and at June term, 1828, the cause was tried and a verdict was found, and judgment thereupon entered for the defendant. A bill of exceptions was taken at the trial, upon which the questions arose which have been discussed at the bar, and upon which the opinion of the court is now to be delivered.

The first question is, whether the plea of satisfaction, so as above pleaded, is a substitution for the former plea of non assumpsit, so as to displace it entirely, or whether it is an auxiliary plea, so that both issues were properly before the jury at the trial, upon which they might pronounce their verdict. The latter is contended for by the defendant in error, and was supported by the judgment of the circuit court. It is admitted that a plea puis darrein continuance is always pleaded by way of substitution for the former plea, on which no proceeding is afterwards had. Stephen on Pleading, 81, 83; Comyn's Dig., Abatement, 1, 24. The present plea was in fact pleaded after the last continuance, although it is not so stated in the plea. It differs from a technical plea of puis darrein continuance, only in this circumstance, that the satisfaction is alleged to have been after the commencement of the suit, instead of after the last continuance of the suit. In principle, however, they do not differ, since each of them requires the same commencement and conclusion; that is, instead of actio non, generally, each must be pleaded with the prayer of actio non ulterius habere, etc., and the judgment must follow the prayer, and is repugnant to and incompatible with that of a general judgment upon matters before the suit brought. As, therefore, the same judgment cannot be rendered upon the general issue, and upon such a plea of matters arising after the suit brought, it is difficult to perceive how they can be united. But it is the less necessary to rest any absolute decision upon this point, because we are all of opinion that the judgment below ought to be reversed upon the exceptions taken to the merits.

§ 965. Demand by bank of note payable at its office.

The court below ruled that the evidence adduced at the trial was not sufficient in law to charge the defendant as indorser. That evidence was supposed to be deficient in two respects: 1. That there was not a proper demand of payment of the note of the maker, at the time when it became due; and 2. That due notice was not given of the non-payment to the defendant as indorser. Upon the first point the evidence is, that on the day when the note became due, the note was in the bank at Cincinnati, the bank being the holder thereof, and it being payable there; and that, after the usual banking hours were over, it was delivered to a notary by the officers of the bank for protest, they informing him, at the time, that there were no funds there for the payment of the note. We are all of opinion that this was a sufficient proof of a due demand of payment. Where a note is payable at a bank, it is not necessary to make any personal demand upon the maker elsewhere. It is his duty to be at the bank within the usual hours of business to pay the same, and if he omits so to do, and a demand is there made of payment by the holder, within those hours, and it is refused or neglected to be made, the holder is entitled to maintain his action for such dishonor. But where the bank is itself the holder of the note so payable, no formal demand is necessary to be made of payment. The maker has the whole period of the usual banking hours to pay it, and if he does not pay it within those hours, it is equivalent to a demand, and refusal of payment on his part, and the note ought not to be delivered out for protest until after those hours are passed. If the bank has funds of the maker in its hands, that might furnish a defense to a suit brought for non-payment. But this is properly matter of defense to be shown by the party sued, like any other payment, and not matter to be disproved by the bank, by negative evidence. This doctrine was recognized by this court in Fullerton v. Bank of United States, at the last term. 1 Pet., 604, 617 (§§ 1200-1204, infra).

Then as to the other point of notice, the facts are, that the defendant, Carneal, resides in Campbell county, in the state of Kentucky. The note became due on the 24th of October, 1820, and on the next day the notary put a sealed notice of the protest and non-payment into the postoffice in Cincinnati, directed "To Thomas D. Carneal, Campbell county, Kentucky," the postage on which was not paid. At that time Carneal's residence in Campbell county was without the limits of any post-town, and about two miles from Cincinnati, across the River Ohio; and his residence was well known to the officers of the bank, as well as the postmaster at Cincinnati. The county seat of Campbell county is Newport, where there is a postoffice, about three miles distance from Carneal's residence, the River Licking being between them; and there is also another postoffice at Covington, below the River Licking, about two miles distance from his residence. In October, 1820, the mails from Cincinnati passed once a week only through Covington, and three times a week through Newport. Carneal was in the habit of receiving letters at the Newport office, as well as at the offices in Covington and Cincinnati. He was in the habit of receiving all the letters directed to him at Cincinnati, at the office in that place, and had given orders to the postmaster to detain all such letters there until he called for them. He visited Cincinnati very frequently and almost daily, having business and being a director of a bank located at that place. The postmaster was in the habit of sending letters directed to him in Campbell county, by the Covington mail, whenever he observed the address, unless, as was sometimes the case, he called for letters at the office before the Covington mail was sent. But other letters, directed generally to Campbell county, when the place of residence of the party was unknown, were sent by the postmaster to Newport. The notary himself, when he put the present notice into the postoffice at Cincinnati, supposed that Carneal received all his letters at that office. The first mail which left Cincinnati for Newport, after the deposit of this notice, was on the 26th of October; and the first which left for Covington was on the 28th of the same month. There is no evidence in the case that the letter in question went either by the mail of the 26th to Newport, or by that of the 28th to Covington. The defendant Carneal has not produced the letter, if it was ever received by him; and the circumstances afford a strong presumption that it might have been received at Cincinnati.

§ 967. Rule as to instruction for a non-suit.

Such is a summary of the material facts, upon which this court is called to pronounce whether there was due diligence in the transmission of the notice to the defendant. The latter having asked the court below to instruct the jury as in case of a non-suit, and the court having acceded to his request, that instruction can be maintained only upon the supposition that there was no contrariety of evidence as to the facts which ought to have been left to the jury; and consequently, every inference fairly deducible from the facts which afforded a presumption of due notice, ought to be made in favor of the plaintiffs.

§ 968. Rules as to diligence in giving notice to indorser.

It is difficult to lay down any universal rule as to what is due diligence in respect to notice to indorsers. Many cases must be decided upon their own particular circumstances, however desirable it may be, when practicable, to lay down a general rule. When notice is sent by the mail, it is sufficient to direct it to the town where the party resides, if it is a post-town. If it is not, then to the postoffice or post-town nearest to his residence, if known. But the rule as to the nearest postoffice is not of universal application, for if the party is in the habit of receiving his letters at a more distant postoffice, or through a more circuitous route, and that fact is known to the person sending notice, notice sent by the latter mode will be good. And where the party is in the habit of receiving his letters at various postoffices, to suit his own convenience or business, it may be sufficient to send it to either. The object of the law in all these cases is to enforce the transmission of the notice by such a route as that it may reach the party in a reasonable time. This doctrine is fully recognized by this court, in the case of The Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, decided at the last term. 1 Pet., 578 (§§ 995-997, infra).

§ 969. General direction of notice to "C., Campbell county, Kentucky," sufficient, when.

It has been objected that the direction of this letter to Campbell county generally was not sufficient, but that it ought to have been directed to the nearest office, for otherwise it might happen that it would be sent to a postoffice, which, though the county seat, might be very distant from the residence of the party. Whether a mere direction to the county without further specification, where the party does not reside in any town therein, would be sufficient in all cases and under all circumstances, we do not think it necessary to decide. That question may well be left until it is necessary in judgment. But where the description is general, if it is in fact sent to the proper postoffice, or if, after due inquiry, it is the only description within the reach of the person sending the notice, we think it may be safely declared to be sufficiently certain, and that a different doctrine would materially clog the circulation of negotiable paper. We think the description in the present case was, in every view, sufficient. There was no misdirection; for Carneal did live in Campbell county. His actual residence was well known to the postmaster at Cincinnati, and the description did not and could not mislead him. If the direction was observed, it would be sent to Covington, or would be delivered at Cincinnati. If not, it would be sent at furthest to Newport.

§ 970. Whether a notice put into the postoffice at Cincinnati is sufficient notice to an indorser in Kentucky.

Then, was the notice in fact duly given or duly sent through the proper postoffice? We are all of opinion that it was. The postoffice at Cincinnati was almost as near the party's residence as that at Covington. The difference is too trifling to afford any just ground of preference; and Cincinnati was the place where he was most likely to receive the letter promptly, since it was the place of his business, and of his habitual and almost daily resort. If it had never been transmitted from that office at all, we are not prepared to say that, under such circumstances, the notice left there was not of itself sufficient, since the party was known there, and his description unequivocal. It does not appear, in point of fact, that it ever left that place for any other postoffice. If it did not, the strong presumption is that it was there delivered to the party. But if it was sent to Newport, how can the court say it was misssent? The party was in the habit of receiving letters there; it was the county seat; and the mail by that route was three times a week, and that by Covington only once a week. The probabilities, therefore, in favor of an early receipt of the letter from this circumstance might fairly balance any in the opposing scale from the increase of distance and the intervention of the river Licking. And in fact the letter would at that time have reached Newport two days earlier than it would have reached Covington. We think it would be inconvenient and dangerous to lay down any rule that the person sending a notice ought, under such circumstances, to direct the letter to the nearest postoffice. We think that the notice would have been good by either route; indeed, good if left at the postoffice at Cincinnati.

§ 971. Notice of protest need not say that the holder looks to the indorser for payment.

A suggestion has been made at the bar that a letter to the indorser stating the demand and dishonor of the note is not sufficient, unless the party sending it also informs the indorser that he is looked to for payment. But when such notice is sent by the holder, or by his order, it necessarily implies such a responsibility over. For what other purpose could it be sent? We know of no rule that requires any formal declaration to be made to this effect. It is sufficient if it may be reasonably inferred from the nature of the notice. For these reasons we are all of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court ought to be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

BANK OF ALEXANDRIA v. SWANN.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE THOMPSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit was brought in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria, upon a promissory note made by Humphrey Peake and indorsed by the defendant in error. Upon the trial the jury found a special verdict, upon which the court gave judgment for the defendant, and the case comes here upon a writ of error.

The points upon which the decision of the case turns resolve themselves into two questions: 1. Whether notice of the dishonor of the note was given to the indorser in due time? 2. Whether such notice contained the requisite certainty in the description of the note.

§ 972. Sufficiency of notice as to time. Diligence a question of law, when.

The note bears date on the 23d day of June, 1829, and is for the sum of $1,400, payable sixty days after date at the Bank of Alexandria. The last day of grace expired on the 25th of August, and on that day the note was duly presented, and demand of payment made at the bank and protested for non-payment; and on the next day notice thereof was sent by mail to the indorser, who resided in the city of Washington.

The general rule, as laid down by this court in Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat., 373, 4 Cond. Rep., 163, is, that the demand of payment should be made on the last day of grace, and notice of the default of the maker be put into the post-office early enough to be sent by the mail of the succeeding day. The special verdict in the present case finds that, according to the course of the mail from Alexandria to the city of Washington, all letters put into the mail before half-past eight o'clock P. M., at Alexandria, would leave there some time during that night, and would be deliverable at Washington the next day at any time after eight o'clock A. M.; and it is argued on the part of the defendant in error that, as demand of payment was made before three o'clock P. M., notice of the non-payment of the note should have been put into the postoffice on the same day it was dishonored, early enough to have gone with the mail of that evening. The law does not require the utmost possible diligence in the holder in giving notice of the dishonor of the note; all that is required is ordinary reasonable diligence; and what shall constitute reasonable diligence ought to be regulated with a view to practical convenience and the usual course of business. In the case of the Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 1 Pet., 533 (§§ 995-997, infra), it is said by this court to be well settled at this day that when the facts are ascertained, and are undisputed, what shall constitute due diligence is a question of law; that this is best calculated for the establishment of fixed and uniform rules on the subject, and is highly important for the safety of holders of commercial paper. The law, generally speaking, does not regard the fractions of a day; and, although the demand of payment at the bank was required to be made during banking hours, it would be unreasonable, and against what the special verdict finds to have been the usage of the bank at that time, to require notice of non-payment to be sent to the indorser on the same day. This usage of the bank corresponds with the rule of law on the subject. If the time of sending the notice is limited to a fractional part of a day, it is well observed by Chief Justice Hosmer, in the case of the Hartford Bank v. Stedman, 3 Conn., 495, that it will always come to a question how swiftly the notice can be conveyed. We think, therefore, that the notice sent by the mail the next day after the dishonor of the note was in due time.

§ 973. Misstatement of amount of note will not vitiate notice of non-payment.

The next question is, whether, in the notice sent to the indorser, the dishonored note is described with sufficient certainty. The law has prescribed no particular form for such notice. The object of it is merely to inform the indorser of the non-payment by the maker, and that he is held liable for the payment thereof. The misdescription complained of in this case is in the amount of the note. The note is for $1,400, and the notice describes it as for the sum of $1,457. In all other respects the description is correct; and in the margin of the note is set down in figures 1,457, and the special verdict finds that the note in question was discounted at the bank as and for a note of $1,457; and the question is, whether this was such a variance or misdescription as might reasonably mislead the indorser as to the note, for payment of which he was held responsible. If the defendant had been an indorser of a number of notes for Humphrey Peake, there might be some plausible grounds for contending that this variance was calculated to mislead him. But the special verdict finds that from the 5th day of February, 1828 (the date of a note for which the one now in question was a renewal), down to the day of the trial of this cause, there was no other note of the said Humphrey Peake indorsed by the defendant, discounted by the bank, or placed in the bank for collection or otherwise. There was, therefore, no room for any mistake by the indorser as to the identity of the note. The case falls within the rule laid down by this court in the case of Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 431 (§§ 958-963, supra), that every variance, however immaterial, is not fatal to the notice. It must be such a variance as conveys no sufficient knowledge to the party of the particular note which has been dishonored. If it does not mislead him, if it conveys to him the real fact without any doubt, the variance cannot be material, either to guard his rights or avoid his responsibility. In that case, as in the one now before the court, it appeared that there was no other note in the bank indorsed by Mills; and this the court considered a controlling fact to show that the indorser could not have been misled by the variance in the date of the note, which was the misdescription then complained of.

The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly reversed, and the cause sent back with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiffs upon the special verdict found by the jury.

RHETT v. POE.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of South Carolina.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action by Poe, cashier of the Bank of Augusta, against Rhett, as indorser of a promissory note for $8,000. The note in question was in the usual form and was given to the bank as collateral security for a bill drawn by one Timberlake upon one Smith, and accepted by the latter. Both the note and bill became due on the same day, July 11, 1837. Timberlake was a merchant who was in the habit of visiting the south during the cotton buying seasons, and in the winter of 1836 and 1837 he was in Augusta, Georgia. Neither the bill nor note was paid at maturity, and they were protested. The proof of notice to Timberlake of the protest of the bill was as follows: That the notary demanded payment and protested the bill for non-payment and notified Timberlake thereof by letter by mail, addressed to Poe, cashier of the Bank of Augusta, as was the custom in similar cases; that the notary at the time did not know where Timberlake could be found; that he had heard that he resided and had done business in Augusta, but was told upon inquiry that he had left there and that it was not known where he had gone; that it was a part of the business of the discount clerk of that bank to make diligent search for parties upon whom such notices were to be served, and that the clerk generally served them personally when they were in Augusta, and if at a distance, sent them the notices by mail; that said clerk was in Augusta at the time and would have served Timberlake if he had then been there; that the clerk searched for the notice and could not find it; that Timberlake lived in a boarding house while in Augusta; that he was insolvent at the time the notice was sent; that at that time and for some time afterwards he had a box in the postoffice of Augusta, and had directed the postmaster to forward his letters to him, and that several letters were so forwarded to him; that Timberlake left Augusta before the notice was sent there. Timberlake also testified that he had never received the notice. The defense rested chiefly upon want of due diligence in giving notice to the drawer of the bill of its dishonor.

On the trial the defendant asked for two separate sets of instructions. The first set, consisting of two instructions, were as follows:

1. That by omission to inquire for the residence of Timberlake, or to send notice after him, the plaintiff has lost his right of action against him as drawer of the bill for $8,000.

2. That if the jury find that the note was given as collateral security for the bill drawn by Timberlake, and that Timberlake is discharged, then the plaintiff cannot recover against the defendant on the note sued upon.

The second set consisted of five instructions, all of which, except the fourth, the court refused. They were as follows:

1. The parties having shown that Timberlake had drawn upon Smith four bills, amounting in all to $21,500, which Smith had accepted, and had at the time of the acceptance of the said bills $10,000 in hand, received of Timberlake, to meet those bills, the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, that, if the evidence was believed, then Timberlake had funds in the hands of Smith, and was entitled to notice.

2. The defendant having shown that Timberlake resided in New York, and came habitually, between the months of October and January, to Augusta, and resided in Augusta during the winter and spring, and that Timberlake left Augusta on the 30th June, 1837, and that the notice of non-payment of the draft was forwarded by the notary in Charleston, to the plaintiff, on the 11th July, 1837, and nothing was shown to prove that the plaintiff had made any inquiry after Timberlake, or endeavored to give him notice. The defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff had not used due diligence to give the drawer notice.

3. And inasmuch as evidence had been given, that the bills drawn by Timberlake on Smith were drawn for purchases of cotton or stock, on the joint account of Smith and Timberlake, and Timberlake had diverted the property purchased on joint account to his own use, and was therefore bound to provide for the bills which fell due in May, to the amount of $13,500, and had not done so, the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the default of Timberlake to take up the bills for $13,500 did not excuse the want of notice to make him liable on the bill for $8,000.

4. And the defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if Timberlake had effects at any time between the drawing and the maturity of the said bill, in the hands of Smith, he was entitled to notice.

5. The defendant prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the insolvency of the acceptor and drawer, before the maturity of the bill, did not excuse the holder from giving notice of non-payment to the drawer.

Instead of the instructions refused, the court gave its own instructions, as follows:

On the first instruction asked, the court instructed the jury that if they believed, from the evidence, that Timberlake had in the hands of Smith, when Smith accepted the bill for $8,000, $10,000, that Timberlake was entitled to notice of the dishonor of the bill from the holder. But if the jury also believe from the evidence that the $10,000, in the hands of Smith, was a fund raised upon Smith's letter of credit to Timberlake, and was to be applied to the payment of purchases on joint account, and had been so applied, and that there was an arrangement afterwards between Timberlake and Smith in respect to all the bills drawn by Timberlake, amounting to $21,500; that Timberlake was to put Smith in funds to pay bills to the amount of $13,500 of the $21,500, which were to become due before the bill of $8,000 became due, and that on Timberlake doing so, Smith was to pay the $8,000 bill; and that Timberlake did not put Smith in funds to pay the $13,500, and that the same were protested, of which Timberlake had notice, then that Timberlake had no right to notice of the non payment of the $8,000 bill from the holder.

On the second instruction asked, the court instructed the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Timberlake resided in New York, and was a sojourner in Augusta, from time to time, as stated in the instruction asked, that then, as drawer of the bill, he was entitled to notice of its dishonor; but if the jury believe from the evidence, though he may have resided in New York, that he had made Augusta his residence since the fall of 1834 or 1835, and that he had removed from Augusta, and out of the state of Georgia, after the bill for $8,000 was drawn, and before its maturity, that then due diligence had been used to give him notice of the dishonor of the bill.

On the third instruction asked, the court instructed the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the bills drawn by Timberlake upon Smith were drawn for purchases of cotton or stock on the joint account of Smith and Timberlake, and that Timberlake had diverted the property purchased on joint account to his own use, and that after promising Smith, the acceptor, to take up the bills to the amount of $13,500, he had failed to do so, and had not supplied Smith with money to take up the bills for $13,500, after the same were dishonored, up to the time when the $8,000 draft became due, and that there was an arrangement between Timberlake and Smith, after the $8,000 bill was accepted, that Timberlake was to put Smith in funds to take up the drafts for $13,500, which had been dishonored, and did not do so, that Timberlake was not entitled to notice of the dishonor of the bill for $8,000.

To the fourth instruction asked, the court instructed the jury, if they believe from the evidence that Timberlake had effects in the hands of Smith at any time between the drawing of the bill and the maturity of the said bill, that he was, as drawer, entitled to notice.

To the fifth instruction asked, the court instructed the jury that the insolvency of the drawer and the acceptor, before the maturity of the bill, did not excuse the holder of the bill from giving notice of non-payment to the drawer. But the court further instructed the jury, that if the insolvency of the drawer and acceptor were known to each other, and that this bill was drawn to pay for a purchase on joint account, or a transaction in which they were partners, and that the property so purchased had been diverted by the drawer to his own use, and that the payment of all the bills had been the subject of private arrangement between the acceptor and the drawer, that then the holder was excused from giving notice of the non-payment of the bill for $8,000.

Verdict for plaintiff.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DANIEL.

The instrument upon which this suit was instituted in the circuit court was, as the foregoing statement evinces, in form simply a common promissory note, signed by Benjamin R. Smith, made payable to William E. Haskell, indorsed by Haskell to Robert Barnwell Smith, alias Robert Barnwell Rhett, and by this last individual to Robert F. Poe, cashier of the Bank of Augusta, the plaintiff in the action. Such being the nature of the instrument, and it appearing that the formalities of demand at its maturity, and notice to the indorsers, have been regularly fulfilled by the holder, a question as to the justice of a recovery by the latter could scarcely be suggested, if the rights and obligations of the several parties shall be viewed as dependent upon their relation to the note itself considered as a distinct and separate transaction. Such, however, is not precisely the attitude of the parties to this controversy. It is in proof that there was held by the plaintiff below, besides this note, a draft for $8,000, drawn by Timberlake on the 6th of May, 1837, at sixty days, in favor of the plaintiff, on Benjamin R. Smith, and accepted by Smith; and further, that upon the note was written, by the plaintiff's agent, a memorandum in the following words: "This note is collateral security for the payment of the annexed draft of D. Timberlake on B. R. Smith of $8,000." Upon the effect of both these instruments, as constituting parts of one transaction, the questions propounded to the circuit court, and brought hither for review, have arisen. The further proofs contained in this record will be adverted to in the progress of this opinion, as notice of them shall become necessary to explain the instructions prayed for, and those given by the circuit court on the trial of this cause. The second series of instructions, embracing a more extended and varied survey of the evidence than is contained in that preceding it, will be first considered.

It is to the first, second, third and fifth instructions of this second series that exceptions are taken. To the first proposition affirmed by the court in this first instruction, it is difficult to imagine any just ground of objection on the part of the defendant below, as that proposition concedes almost in terms the prayer of that defendant. To the second branch of this instruction it is not perceived that any valid objection can be sustained; for, although it might have been true that at the date of acceptance of Timberlake's draft on Smith for $8,000, the latter had been in possession of $10,000, placed in his hands by Timberlake, it would not follow, under the circumstances proved, or under those assumed in the instruction, that Timberlake, as the drawer of that draft, was entitled to notice. If, as the instruction supposes, the acceptances for $21,500, which Smith had come under for Timberlake, were drawn for the accommodation of the latter, upon the faith of funds to be furnished by him for their payment; that the $10,000 had been furnished by Timberlake in part for that purpose, but had been withdrawn by him for his own uses prior to the maturity of the draft for $8,000, that he should have intercepted before the maturity of the draft all the funds against which he knew the acceptances of Smith were drawn, and that he, the drawer, and Smith, the acceptor, had, before such maturity, become notoriously insolvent, under such a predicament the law would not impose the requirement of notice to the drawer upon the holder. No useful or reasonable end could be answered by such a requisition. Where a drawer has no right to expect the payment of a bill by the acceptor, he has no claim to notice of non-payment. This is ruled in the following cases: Sharp v. Baily, 9 Barn. & Cress., 44; 4 Mann. & R., 18; Bickerdike v. Bollman, 1 Term R., 405; Brown v. Maffey, 15 East, 221; Goodall v. Dolley, 1 Term R., 712; Legge v. Thorpe, 12 East, 171. If the $1,000 said to have been in the hands of Smith were, by the agreement or undertaking between Smith and Timberlake, to be applied in payment of joint claims against them, and falling due before the draft for $8,000, and had been so applied, it had answered the sole object for which it had been raised, and could not, in the apprehension of these parties, constitute a fund against which the draft of $8,000 subsequently to become due was drawn. Those $10,000 were gone, were appropriated by these parties themselves. Then if, after this appropriation, there was, as this instruction assumes, an arrangement between Timberlake and Smith in respect to the bills drawn by Timberlake to the amount of $21,500, that he was to put Smith in funds sufficient to pay $13,500 of the amount just mentioned, which were to become payable before the $8,000 draft, and that on Timberlake's supplying those funds, Smith was to pay the $8,000 draft, and Timberlake failed to put Smith in funds to take up the $13,500, and that the drafts for the same were protested, of which Timberlake had notice, he, Timberlake, could have no claim to notice of non-payment of the draft for $8,000. There could be no reason for such a notice from the holder of the draft. Timberlake could have had no right to calculate on the payment of this draft; on the contrary, he was bound to infer its dishonor. He knew that payment of the draft for $8,000 was dependent upon a condition to be performed by himself, and he was obliged to know from the notice of the dishonor of all his bills, that he had not performed that condition, and had thereby intercepted the very funds from which the acceptances by Smith were to be met. He, therefore, quoad this draft, had never any funds in the hands of Smith, and consequently never had any claim to notice of non-payment from the holder. The case of Claridge v. Dalton, in 4 Maule & S., 226, is strongly illustrative of the principle here laid down. That was a case in which the drawer had supplied the drawee with goods which were still not paid for. To this extent, then, the former unquestionably had funds in the hands of the latter; but on the day of payment of the bill the credit upon which the goods were sold had not expired, and the court thereupon unanimously ruled that quoad the obligations of the parties arising upon these transactions, the drawer must be understood as having no effects in the hands of the drawee, and therefore not entitled to notice.

§ 975. Due diligence a question of law. Removal from state an excuse for not giving notice.

The second instruction affirms, in the first place, what must be admitted by all, and what is not understood to be matter of contest here, namely, that whenever a party to a bill or note is entitled to notice, such notice, if not given him in person, must be by a timely effort to convey it through the regular or usual and recognized channels of communication with the party or his agent, or with his known residence or place of business. It is to so much of this instruction as is applicable to what may amount to a dispensation from the regular or ordinary modes of affecting parties with notice that objection is made; to that portion in which the court charged the jury that if they believed from the evidence that, although Timberlake may have resided in New York, that he had, since the autumn of 1834 or 1835, made Augusta his residence, and that he had removed from Augusta and out of the state of Georgia after the bill for $8,000 was drawn, and before its maturity, that then due diligence had been used to give him notice of the dishonor of the bill. It is not considered by this court that this charge, in any correct acceptance of it, trenches upon the legitimate province of the jury, or transcends the just limits of the authority of the court, or contravenes any established doctrine of the law. It is a doctrine generally received, one which is recognized by this court in the case of The Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 1 Pet., 578 (§§ 995-997, infra), that, whenever the facts upon which the question of due diligence arises are ascertained and undisputed, due diligence becomes a question of law. See, also, Bank of Utica v. Bender, 21 Wend., 643. In the case before us every fact and circumstance in the evidence which was to determine the residence of the drawer in Augusta, or his abandonment of that residence, or his removal from the state of Georgia, the unsettled and vagrant character of his after-life, the fruitless inquiries by the notary to find out his residence, the notoriety of his having neither domicile nor place of business in Georgia, the effort to follow him with notice of dishonor of his draft, were all submitted to the jury to be weighed by them. The charge of the court should be interpreted with reference to the testimony which is shown to have preceded it, upon which, in truth, it was prayed; with reference, also, to the reasonable conclusions which that testimony tended obviously to establish. Interpreted by this rule, it amounts to this, and this only,—a declaration to the jury that if the evidence satisfied them of the residence of Timberlake in Augusta at the time of drawing the draft, of the certainty and notoriety of his having abandoned that residence and the entire state before its maturity, leaving behind him no knowledge of any place, either of his residence or for the transaction of his business; satisfied them also of the real but unavailing effort of the notary who protested the draft to discover his whereabouts, they ought to infer that due diligence had been practiced by the holder of the draft. In the case of an indorser, with respect to whom greatest strictness is always exacted, it has been ruled that the holder of a bill is excused for not giving regular notice of dishonor to the indorser, of whose place of residence he is ignorant, if he use reasonable diligence to discover where the indorser may be found. Thus, Lord Ellenborough, in Bateman v. Joseph, 2 Camp., 462, remarks: "When the holder of a bill of exchange does not know where the indorser is to be found, it would be very hard if he lost his remedy by not communicating immediate notice of the dishonor of the bill; and I think the law lays down no such rigid rule. The holder must not allow himself to remain in a state of passive ignorance, but if he uses reasonable diligence to discover the residence of the indorser, I conceive that notice given as soon as this is discovered is due notice within the custom of merchants." See, to the same effect, 12 East, 433; Baldwin v. Richardson, 1 Barn. & Cress., 245; Beveridge v. Burgis, 3 Camp., 262. It has been held, in Massachusetts, that where the maker of a promissory note had absconded before the day of payment, presentment and demand could not be required of the holder in order to charge the indorser. Opinion of Parsons, C. J., in Putnam v. Sullivan, 4 Mass., 53. In Duncan v. McCullough, 4 Serg. & R., 480, it was ruled that if the maker of a promissory note is not to be found when the note becomes due, demand on him for payment is not necessary to charge the indorser, if due diligence is shown in endeavoring to make a demand. Hartford Bank v. Stedman, 3 Conn., 489, where the holder of a bill who was ignorant of the indorser's residence sent the notice to A., who was acquainted with it, requesting him to add to the direction the indorser's residence, it was held that reasonable diligence had been used. The measures adopted in this case by the holder of Timberlake's draft, when viewed in connection with the condition and conduct of the drawer himself, appear to come fully up to the requirement of the authorities above cited; and, therefore, in the judgment of this court, affect him with all the consequences of notice, supposing this now to be a substantial proceeding upon the draft itself.

§ 976. If drawer and acceptor are copartners, the drawer is not entitled to notice of dishonor.

Next and last in the order of exceptions is the fifth instruction. The first position in this is given almost literally in the terms of the prayer. The court proceeds further to charge that if the insolvency of the drawer and acceptor were known to each other, and that this bill was drawn to pay for purchases on joint account, or a transaction in which they were partners, and the property so purchased had been diverted by the drawer to his own use, and that the payment of the bills had been the subject of private arrangement between the acceptor and drawer, that then the holder was excused from giving notice of the non-payment of the bill for $8,000. With respect to the exception taken to this instruction, all that seems requisite to dispose of it is the remark that if the drawer of the bill was in truth the partner of the acceptor, either generally, or in the single adventure in which the bill made a part, in that event notice of dishonor of the bill, by the holder to the drawer, need not have been given. The knowledge of the one partner was the knowledge of the other, and notice to the one notice to the other. Authorities upon this point need not be accumulated; we cite upon it Porthouse v. Parker, 1 Camp., 82, where Lord Ellenborough remarks, speaking of the dishonor of the bill in that case, "as this must necessarily have been known to one of them, the knowledge of one was the knowledge of all;" also, Bignold v. Waterhouse, 1 Maule & S., 259; Whitney v. Sterling, 14 Johns., 215; Gowan v. Jackson, 20 Johns., 176.

§ 977. Abstract propositions of law not to be given as instructions, which must be applied to facts.

Recurring now to the first series of instructions prayed for, we will consider how far the two propositions presented by them were warranted by the correct principle upon which the opinion of the courts may be invoked; and how far the court was justifiable in rejecting the propositions in question, upon the ground either of want of connection with any particular state or progress of the evidence, or of support and justification as derived from the entire testimony in the cause. It is a settled rule of judicial procedure, that the courts will never lay down as instructions to a jury, general or abstract positions, such as are not immediately connected with and applicable to the facts of a cause, but require that every prayer for an instruction should be preceded by and based upon a statement of facts, upon which the questions of law naturally and properly arise.

It is equally certain that the courts will not, upon a view of the testimony, which is partial or imperfect, give an instruction which the entire evidence in a cause, when developed, would forbid. Tested by these rules, the two instructions prayed for in the first series are deemed to be improper; they are accompanied with no statement of the testimony as their proper and immediate foundation; they are bottomed exclusively upon assumption, and such assumption, too, as the testimony, taken altogether, is believed to contradict. The court, therefore, properly refused these instructions; for this refusal it was by no means necessary that the causes should be assigned by the court in extenso; these are to be seen in the character of the instructions themselves, and in the testimony upon the record. This court has thus considered and disposed of the several prayers for instruction in this cause, and of the rulings of the circuit court thereupon. Whilst this procedure has been proper with the view of ascertaining how far the rights of the parties have been affected by the several questions presented and adjudged in the circuit court, it is our opinion that the true merits of this controversy are to be found within a much more limited and obvious range of inquiry than that which has been opened by these questions.

§ 979. Guarantor not entitled to same notice of dishonor as surety. Nature of guarantor's contract.

The note on which the action below was instituted was given as a guaranty for the solvency of the parties to the bill for $8,000, drawn in favor of the plaintiff, and for its punctual payment at maturity. Such being the character and purposes of the note, was it necessary, in order to authorize a recovery upon it, that every formality, all that strictness should have been observed in reference to the bill intended to be guaranteed, which it is conceded are indispensable to maintain an action upon a mercantile paper against a party upon that paper? It is contended that a guaranty is an insurance of a punctual payment of the paper guaranteed; is a condition and a material consideration on which this paper is received, and therefore that a failure in punctual payment at maturity is a forfeiture of such insurance on condition, rendering the obligation of the guarantor absolute from the period of the failure. Whether this proposition can or cannot be maintained to the extent here stated, the authorities concur in making a distinction between actions upon a bill or note, and actions against a party who has guaranteed such bill or note by a separate contract. In the former instances, notice, in order to charge the drawer or indorser, is, with very few established exceptions, uniformly required; in the latter, the obligation to give notice is much more relaxed, and its omission does not imply injury as a matter of course. In Warrington v. Furber, 8 East, 242, where the guaranty was not by indorsement of the paper sued upon, and the action was upon the contract, Lord Ellenborough said, "that the same strictness of proof is not necessary to charge the guarantees as would have been necessary to support an action on the bill itself, where, by the law merchant, a demand and a refusal by the acceptor ought to be proved to charge any other party on the bill, and this notwithstanding his bankruptcy. But this is not necessary to charge guarantees who insure as it were the solvency of the principal; and if he becomes bankrupt and notoriously insolvent, it is the same thing as if he were dead, and it is nugatory to go through the ceremony of making a demand upon him." Le Blanc, J., says, in the same case: "There is no need of the same proof to charge a guarantee as there is a party whose name is on a bill of exchange; for it is sufficient, as against the former, to show that the holder could not have obtained the money by making demand of it." The same doctrine may be found in Philips v. Astling, 2 Taunt., 206. So, too, Lord Eldon, in the case of Wright v. Simpson, 6 Ves. Jr., 732, expresses himself in terms which show his clear understanding of the position of a collateral guarantee or surety; his language is: "As to the case of principal and surety, in general cases, I never understood that, as between the obligee and the surety, there was an obligation to active diligence against the principal, but the surety is a guarantee, and it is his business to see whether the principal pays, and not that of the creditor." The case of Gibbs v. Cannon, 9 Serg. & R., 198, was an action against a guarantor who was not a party on the note, upon his separate contract. The supreme court of Pennsylvania decided in this case that, provided the drawer and indorser of the note were solvent at the maturity of the note, notice of non-payment should be given to the guarantor, and that the latter, under such circumstances, may avail himself of the want of notice of non-payment, but it places the burden of proving solvency, and of injury flowing from want of notice, upon the guarantor. The last case mentioned on this point, and one which seems to be conclusive upon it, is that of Reynolds v. Douglass, 12 Pet., 497, in which the court establish these propositions:

1. That the guarantor of a promissory note, whose name does not appear upon the note, is bound without notice, where the maker of the note was insolvent at its maturity, unless he can show that he has sustained some prejudice by want of notice of a demand on the maker, and of notice of non-payment.
2. If the guarantor can prove he has suffered damage by the neglect to make the demand on the maker, and to give notice, he can be discharged only to the extent of the damage sustained. Tried by the principles ruled in the authorities above cited, and especially by that from this court, in 12 Pet., it would seem that this case should admit of neither doubt nor hesitancy. The note on which the action was brought was given as a guaranty for the payment of the bill for $8,000, as is proved and, indeed, admitted on all hands. It is the distinct and substantive agreement by which the guaranty of the bill was undertaken. It is established by various and uncontradicted facts and circumstances in the cause, and finally by the solemn admissions of Timberlake, the drawer, and Smith, the acceptor of the bill, both of whom have testified in the cause that, at the maturity of the bill, they were both utterly insolvent; that Timberlake was probably so before the commencement of these transactions; and that Smith, before the maturity of the bill, had made an assignment of every thing he had claim to, for the benefit of others, and, amongst the creditors named in that assignment, providing for the plaintiff in error as ranking high amongst the preferred class.

Under such circumstances, to have required notice of the dishonor of the bill would have been a vain and unreasonable act, such as the law cannot be presumed to exact of any person. Upon a review of the whole case, we think that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

HARRIS v. ROBINSON.

ERROR to U. S. District Court, Northern District of Alabama.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WOODBURY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Under the bill of exceptions in this case, the proper practice in some important particulars respecting notices of non-payment of promissory notes and bills of exchange is involved. It appears that the defendant was indorser of such a note, and at the trial the court instructed the jury that, if they believed that the notary made the inquiries stated in his depositions, and sent notice to the defendant, as therein stated, he being ignorant of his true residence, that the notice was sufficient to charge the defendant, and that, under the circumstances of the case as proved, it was not necessary to make inquiry of the holder of the note as to the residence of the indorser; to which instructions the defendant excepts. The substance of the inquiries which were made, as shown in the depositions, was that the note, being "payable and negotiable at the Planters' Bank of the State of Tennessee at Nashville," the notary, after presenting it and payment being refused, inquired of those "not unlikely" to know the residences or nearest postoffices of the indorsers, as they were not known to him. He recollects, as one of whom he inquired, the cashier of the bank, and was informed by him that Harris lived in Madison county, Alabama, but that he did not know his nearest postoffice.

The notary made similar inquiries of a Mr. Estell, who had resided in Madison county, but was found to be ignorant of the defendant's nearest postoffice; and the notary adds that, knowing "no other source from whence to derive information as to where to direct" the notice, he "accordingly directed" this and others "to Madison county, Alabama, knowing that, from the general rules of the postoffice department, they would be sent to Huntsville, the county seat."

The only "other circumstances of the case as proved" to which the judge probably refers are that the name of the present plaintiff appears on the back of the note as the last indorser; that he was then an inhabitant of Nashville; and that Joseph Bradley, a witness for the defendant, testified that, before the note reached maturity, he, then living at Huntsville, received notices from Robinson for Harris and the other indorsers, "requesting him to hand them to the defendant and the other parties," in order "to remind them when said note would fall due," and that he directed the notice for Harris to his postoffice at Cross-Roads, in Madison county. It is further stated, as a part of the case, "there was no evidence to show that the notary knew who was the holder of the bill, or where he resided." These being the facts as proved concerning the inquiries and circumstances to which the judge refers, he properly considered it a question of law whether, upon those facts, if believed by the jury, it was necessary to make inquiry of the holder himself as to the residence of the indorsers, and whether the notice as given was in all respects sufficient to charge the defendant. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 1 Pet., 583 (§§ 995-997, infra); 10 Pet., 581 (§§ 950-957, supra); Bryden v. Bryden, 11 Johns., 187; Haddock v. Murray, 1 N. H., 140.

It is to be regretted that some other facts were not agreed or referred to the jury, such as the distance of the residence of the defendant, as well as of the Cross Roads postoffice, from Huntsville; whether he was accustomed to receive letters at the former place; and who in truth was the holder of the note at the time it fell due. But the judge properly submitted to the jury whatever facts the parties chose to present; and it is usually the best course thus to submit complicated questions of law and fact, accompanying them, however, with due legal instructions as to the rules which ought to govern. 3 Kent's Comm., 107. Then the instructions can as easily be revised as if the case was withdrawn from the jury, and, what is very desirable, the rules as to commercial paper can be preserved as uniform over the commercial world, and the holders of it have, as they ought to have, a fixed standard, on a like state of facts, for protecting as well as knowing their rights. 11 Johns., 187; 1 Durn. & E., 168; 1 N. H., 140.

§ 980. Any agent of the holder may give notice of protest to an indorser.

The first objection that has been raised under the instructions or ruling of the court is, that the notice does not appear to have been given by the holder of the note. There is no evidence here to indicate any person except Robinson or the bank as the holder at that time, and probably at the trial it was taken for granted to be one of them, without making any point concerning it to the court or jury. Whichever it was, there is no pretense but that the notary came into possession of the note from the agent of the holder lawfully, and with a view, as agent, to make the demand, and, if not paid, to give due notice. When notes are left at banks for collection, the notaries may often be ignorant of the names of the holders, as the notes are handed to them by the cashier. He would as properly do this business when employed by an agent of the holder, as by the holder himself; and, having the note in either of these ways, he would be competent in law to deliver it up if paid, or, if not paid, to give notice of that fact to the indorsers. It has been adjudged that any agent of the holders may give notice. Chitty on Bills, 527; Bank of Utica v. Smith, 18 Johns., 239, in point; Stewart v. Kennett, 2 Camp., 177, by Lord Ellenborough, 178; 3 Kent's Comm., 108; Stanton v. Blossom, 14 Mass., 116; 7 id., 486; 9 id., 423. The agent to collect the note may do it. Mead v. Engs, 5 Cow., 303; 3 Bos. & Pull., 599; 2 Taunt., 38; 15 East, 291; 9 East, 347; 1 Camp., 349; Ogden v. Dobbin, 2 Hall, 112. And in 9 Yerger, 255, it was decided that a notary public is a suitable agent for this purpose. It was done by a notary of the agent in 2 Hall, 112. The meaning of the rule that the holder must give notice is, not that he may not do it by an agent, as any other commercial act, but that it shall not be given by some other party on the bill not standing in the relation in which the holder does, and who has no right to give it and try to make the indorser responsible when the holder may be willing to waive a resort to him. Tindal v. Brown, 1 Durn. & E., 170; 7 Ves. Jr., 597; 1 Esp., 333. In this case the notice is express, that "the holder looks to you for payment as indorser" of the bill, and the notary had the note in his possession (11 East, 117; 2 Camp., 178), in order to make demand and give notice in behalf of the holder.

§ 981. Notary need not inquire of unknown holder as to indorser's address.

The only remaining questions which are material are, whether any further inquiry, and especially of the holder of the note, ought to have been made by the notary, as to the residence of the indorsers, before dispatching the notices, and whether the notices sent were sufficient, considering the information he obtained, and his ignorance of the true residence of the indorsers. It was a part of the evidence that the indorsers lived remote in another state, and that the notary was ignorant of the exact places of their abode. Under such circumstances, he was undoubtedly bound to make inquiries of persons likely to be acquainted with their residences. This he did, and, among them, of the cashier of the bank, the person most likely to be acquainted with the place of abode of those making paper negotiable and payable at the bank, and of another person who had lived in the same county with the indorsers, and not getting entire certainty from either, he sent the notices, addressed as accurately as his information enabled him, to the county where they lived, and from the capital of which the notices would be likely to be forwarded to the indorsers. This, in most cases, might be sufficient as to inquiry, and especially where nobody was known to reside near who was able and bound to give fuller and more accurate information on that subject. It would usually satisfy a jury that the due diligence had been exercised which, and which only, the law imposes. Chitty on Bills, 525, 8th Amer. ed.; 2 Camp., 461. But it is argued in this case that the holder probably lived in Nashville, and could and ought to have been resorted to on this occasion for such information. Chitty on Bills, 525. This argument is not without force, and might be insuperable if the notary knew who the holder was, and did not obtain otherwise all the intelligence on this subject which the holder probably possessed. But the evidence not showing that he knew him, did he resort to the holder's agent, and obtain from him all the information on this point which the holder himself was likely to have possessed?

Supposing the bank to have been the holder, the cashier, its agent, was resorted to, and doubtless gave all the intelligence in possession of the bank on this subject. But supposing Robinson to have been the holder, which is the only other probable presumption on the evidence, and which is contended for by the defendant, and then the cashier was doubtless his agent to collect the note, and received from Robinson all he knew as to the residences of the prior indorsers, and communicated it to the notary when applying to him on the subject. This is not only the general inference from what would be likely to take place on such occasions, but is strengthened in this case from the testimony of Bradley, on the part of the defendant, saying that Robinson, a short time prior, had sent notice to him at Huntsville for these parties, stating when the note fell due, and that he requested him to hand them to these indorsers. From this it is obvious that Robinson supposed they resided in Huntsville, or he would have sent the notices to a different place; and he would not probably have desired a resident of Huntsville to hand them to the indorsers, unless he believed they lived in the same place. There can be little doubt, on this evidence, that the real holder, whether the bank or Robinson, did give to the cashier all the information the holder possessed on this subject, and that the cashier communicated the same to the notary, and that the latter would have obtained no more had he known and resorted to the holder in person, and that the cashier, in conforming to this information, by addressing notices to Madison county, supposing that, by the rules of the postoffice department, they would be sent to Huntsville, the county town, did all which duty required of him.

Beside the light flung on this subject, and favorable to this conclusion, by some of the general positions in the authorities cited at the bar, there are several precedents which bear more directly on a state of facts such as exists in this case, and which deserve special notice, as they fortify the correctness of the views we have presented. In Stewart v. Eden, 2 Caines, 121, the court ruled that the holder was bound to inquire no further than a reasonable and prudent man should, and said: "We do not exact from him every possible exertion," or inquiry. Only "ordinary diligence" is required in inquiring. Catskill Bank v. Stall, 15 Wend., 367. Only "reasonable diligence." Fisher v. Evans, 5 Binn., 543. So in Chapman v. Lipscombe, 1 Johns., 294, where a bill was drawn and dated in New York city, on persons there, and accepted, but protested afterwards for non-payment, and it did not appear that the holder knew where the drawers lived, but sent two notices to them, one addressed to New York and one to Norfolk, it was held that they were good, though the drawer in fact lived in Petersburg. In that case, inquiry was made at the banks and elsewhere, and notice was sent in conformity with the information received; but he did not inquire of the acceptors, who lived in New York, and could have told him correctly where the drawers lived. In 3 Kent's Com., 107, it is laid down that notice need not always be sent to the postoffice nearest to the indorser's residence. It suffices if sent to the nearest which can be ascertained on due inquiry. And in 1 Pet., 578 (§§ 995-997, infra), and 2 Pet., 551 (§§ 964-970, supra), where a notice like this was addressed to the indorser, as belonging to the county in which he lived, the same rule is recognized. It is true, that there the party in fact resided near the county seat or received some of his letters there, about which there is no particular proof here; but it is said to be proper to address a notice in that way, "if after due inquiry it is the only description within reach of the person sending the notice." It is enough to send the notices to the place where the information received reasonably requires him to send them. 2 Car. & Payne, 300; 1 Barn. & Cress., 243; Bank of Utica v. Davidson, 5 Wend., 587. If the place it reaches is the wrong one, he is then not in fault. 5 Yerg., 67. All his duty in this case is to use "ordinary diligence" on the subject, and not to insure at all events that the notice actually reaches the indorser. 1 Pet., 582; 10 id., 581. In Barr v. Marsh, 9 Yerg., 255, it was held that the holder was not bound or presumed to know where the indorser lived. But it was enough if the agent of the indorsee or holder made due inquiry, and directed the notices to the places indicated by the information, though wrong. It was the best that could be done under the circumstances. Nichol v. Bate, 7 Yerg., 307; Dunlap v. Thompson, 5 Yerg., 67. Where so many postoffices exist, the residences of parties change so often, and people live so remote from each other, as in this country, it would clog the circulation of negotiable paper if the holder or his agent was bound to know every alteration in the residence of indorsers. The inquiries were at the bank, and of other persons, in the case of Barr v. Marsh, much as in this instance. In Sturges v. Derrick, Wightw. Exch. Cas., 77, an inquiry was made of the son of an indorser as to his residence, and he did not know it, and the court held that "sufficient diligence had been used." And in Stuckert v. Anderson, 3 Whart., 116, the case itself on examination shows that an inquiry of the officers of the bank where the note was discounted is deemed sufficient, if there be no others near who are likely to know more as to the residence of the indorsers.

Some cases, it is true, have been more stringent, such as 13 Johns., 434, and 3 Camp., 262, but they do not contradict our conclusions; as in the first one, the notice was sent to a wrong place quite remote, and the inquiry is said to have been limited; while in the last, no inquiry was made except at the "house" where the bill was payable. Most of the cases referred to on this point, of due diligence in making inquiry, are rather cases as to due diligence in respect to the time when the notices are sent. Some of those, as bearing on this, allow a very liberal time to make inquiries where the residence is remote (2 Barn. & Cress., 246; 8 id., 393; 2 Dowl. & Ryl., 385; 2 Mood. & Ry., 359), and only require the notice to be sent as soon as information is obtained under proper exertion. 1 Barn. & Cress., 245; Gow, 81; 2 Camp., 462. And some go so far as to excuse giving notice at all if the place of residence at the time is unfixed (4 Camp., 285) or cannot be ascertained. 10 Pet., 580, and 9 Wheat., 591 (§§ 754-759, supra), before quoted. In the case now under consideration, then, the conclusion seems well sustained that reasonable inquiries were made as to the residences of the indorsers, and notices promptly dispatched, by a proper agent, in conformity with the information received. Whether the notices were actually received or not, and whether, if received, it was not as soon as if they had been directed to the Cross Roads postoffice, does not appear, nor is it material, as the circumstances before mentioned show due diligence, and thus make out a sufficient case, whether the notices ever reached the indorsers or not. Let the judgment below be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McLEAN dissented, holding that the holder of the note, knowing the residence of the indorser, is bound to inform the notary, and that the notary is bound to make inquiry of the holder. Preston v. Daysson, 7 La., 7; Hill v. Varnell, 3 Greenl., 233; Hartford Bank v. Stedman, 3 Conn., 489; Beveridge v. Burgis, 3 Camp., 262; Bateman v. Joseph, 12 East, 433; Story on Prom. Notes, 370, note 1, cited. Mr. Justice M'KINLEY dissented.

FRENCH v. BANK OF COLUMBIA.

(4 Cranch, 141-164. 1807.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The material question in this case is, whether a person who indorses a promissory note for the accommodation of the drawer be discharged from the responsibility which the indorsement creates, by the failure of the holder to demand payment of the maker in the usual time, and to give notice to the indorser that the note is not paid.

§ 983. Demand and notice necessary to charge accommodation indorser of note.

That by the general rule of law, the omission to demand payment from the maker when the note becomes payable, and to give notice to the indorser that payment has been refused, discharges the indorser, is admitted; but from this general rule of law exceptions exist, and the counsel for the defendants in error contend that the case stated is comprehended in one of these exceptions. It is laid down as an exception to the general rule, in its application to bills of exchange, that if the drawer has no effects in the hands of the drawee, notice of the dishonor of the bill may be dispensed with, and the case of an indorser of a promissory note for the accommodation of the maker is said to come within the same reason and the same law. The correctness of this position will be best tested by considering the reason of the rule, and the reason for the exception. Why is it that notice must immediately be given to the drawer that his bill is dishonored by the drawee? It is because he is presumed to have effects in the hands of the drawee, in consequence of which the drawee ought to pay the bill, and that he may sustain an injury by acting on the presumption that the bill is actually paid. The law requires this notice not merely as an indemnity against actual injury, but as a security against a possible injury, which may result from the laches of the holder of the bill. To this security, then, it would seem, the drawer ought to remain entitled, unless his case be such as to take him out of the reason of the rule. A drawer who has no effects in the hands of the drawee is said to be without the reason of the rule, and therefore to form an exception to it. This has been laid down in the books as a positive qualification of the rule, but has seldom been so laid down, except in cases where, in point of fact, the drawer had no right to expect that his bill would be honored, and could sustain no injury by the neglect of the holder to give notice of its being dishonored. In reason it would seem that in such cases only can the exception be admitted, and that the necessity of notice ought to be dispensed with only in those cases where notice must be unnecessary or immaterial to the drawer.

The reasoning of the judges in most of the cases which have been cited would seem to warrant this restriction of the exception. The case of Bickerdike v. Bollman, 1 Term R., 405, was a bill drawn by a debtor on his creditor, without a single accompanying circumstance which could raise an expectation that the bill would be accepted or paid. Notice in this case was declared to be unnecessary. Justice Ashurst gives as a reason for this opinion, that the drawing was in itself a fraud. This reason must be considered as additional to the general ground on which the case was placed in the argument, which was, that the want of notice could not possibly affect the drawer. The particular reason given by Justice Ashhurst for his opinion is clearly inapplicable to any case in which the drawer was justified in drawing. Into the opinion of Justice Buller some general reasoning is introduced from which it is fairly deducible that he considered the drawer as having no right to expect that the bill would be paid and as being liable to no injury from the want of notice, and that these were the true grounds of the exception. He says, "If it be proved on the part of the plaintiff that from the time the bill was drawn till the time it became due the drawee never had any effects of the drawer in his hands, I think notice to the drawer is not necessary; for he must know whether he had effects in the hands of the drawee or not; and if he had none, he had no right to draw upon him and to expect payment from him; nor can he be injured by the non-payment of the bill, or the want of notice that it has been dishonored." These observations were in fact applicable to the case, for the drawer was the debtor of the drawee, and had no right to draw the bill, nor reason to expect that it would be accepted. This principle was recognized in Goodall v. Dolly, 1 Term R., 712, in which the same idea, so far as respects the impossibility of injury to the drawer, was repeated. This point came on again to be considered in the case of Rogers v. Stephens, 2 Term R., 713, in which, as between the drawer and drawee, there was no pretext of a right to draw. It was said that a third person had stated himself to have funds in the hands of the drawee; that the bill was really drawn on the credit of those funds, and that loss had been actually sustained from the want of notice. But these facts formed no part of the case. If they had, it is apparent that, in the opinions of Lord Kenyon and Justice Grose, they would have been decisive in favor of the necessity of notice, unless that necessity had been dispensed with by the subsequent conduct of the drawer. Lord Kenyon states the reason why notice need not be given to the person who draws without funds in the hands of the drawee to be, "because the drawer must know that he had no right to draw on the drawee." The opinions of Lord Kenyon and Justice Grose in this respect, though not assented to, were not controverted by Justice Ashhurst. The decision in Rogers v. Stephens, 2 Term R., 713, was made on the authority of Bickerdike v. Bollman.

It would seem to be the fair construction of these cases, that a person having a right to draw in consequence of engagements between himself and the drawee, or in consequence of consignments made to the drawee, or from any other cause, ought to be considered as drawing upon funds in the hands of the drawee, and therefore as not coming within the exception to the general rule. The transaction cannot be denominated a fraud, for in such case it is a fair commercial transaction. Neither can it be truly said that he had no right to expect his bill would be paid, for a person authorized to draw must expect his draft will be honored. Neither can it be said that he has virtual notice of the protest, and that actual notice is useless, and the want of it can do him no injury; for this is only true when at the time of drawing the drawer has no reason to expect that his bill will be paid. A person having a right to draw, and a fair right to expect that his bill will be honored, would not come within the reason of the exception, and therefore, it may well be contended, ought not to be brought within the exception itself. This doctrine appears to be contradicted in the case of Walwyn v. St. Quintin, 1 Bos. & Pull., 652. In that case the bill was drawn to accommodate the indorser, who had previously placed securities, on which he wished to raise money, in the hands of the acceptor; but the drawer had no effects in his hands. It was determined that, in this case, notice to the drawer was unnecessary. If this determination should be considered without examining the reasoning on which it was founded, the reader would conclude that the single circumstance of drawing without funds in the hands of the drawee belonging to the drawer subjected him, without notice, to the payment of his bill, if dishonored, at any period of time when not barred by the act of limitations, and that no demonstration of his perfect right to draw, or of the loss to which the want of notice had exposed him, could relieve him from the claim of the holder of the bill. For in this case the drawee, having accepted on funds, the drawer had a right to expect that the bill would be paid, could not be chargeable with fraud in drawing nor required to prepare other funds to prevent the disgrace and injury of his bill's being dishonored, or to take measures to secure himself against the acceptor or indorser. He does not appear to have come within any one reason assigned in the cases of Bickerdike v. Bollman or of Rogers v. Stephens, for the exception stated in those cases to the general rule. This induces the necessity of examining with particular attention the reasons given by the judge, which must be considered as explanatory of the decision. In delivering the opinion of the court Lord Chief Justice Eyre said: "The true fact is that this was the acceptor's bill and not the drawer's." "The transaction in this case was a mode by which the acceptor advanced a sum of money to the payee, and the drawer was a mere instrument of the acceptor." "It seems clear that notice can be of no use to him, his situation being this: that if the acceptor do not pay, he must, and may then, and not till then, resort to the acceptor to be reimbursed. Notice, therefore, can amount to nothing, for his situation cannot be changed."

It is observable that the principle supposed to be laid down in the cases previously adjudged as constituting the reason for the exception is here expressly recognized, and forms the great and operative motive for the judgment of the court. It is that notice could be of no use; that the drawer could not avail himself of it; that he could take no step which would in any manner change his situation; that he could have no recourse against the acceptor until he paid the bill. In no case is the reason of the exception more explicitly given, and the only difficulty is to apply the reasoning to the facts as reported. The court seems to have supposed that, since the drawer could not maintain an action against the acceptor until he had taken up the bill, that it was perfectly useless to enable him, by proper notice, to employ those other various means which he might have taken to secure himself. Such is not the reasoning of the judges in the cases previously decided, and this reasoning certainly would not be permitted to apply to an indorser who had given value for the bill, not knowing that it was drawn without funds in the hands of the drawee. Yet he would be unable to recover from the drawer until he had taken up the bill. If an action could not have been maintained, might not the drawer have effects of the drawee in his hands which he might retain, or might not various other means of saving himself be neglected in consequence of the opinion that the bill would be paid? If this might be, how can it be true that notice would be of no use to him? If the fact even be that the drawer could only sue the acceptor in such a case as this, after having himself discharged the bill, still he ought to have notice, that he might immediately take it up for the purpose of proceeding against the acceptor. The reasoning of Lord Chief Justice Eyre, to be perfectly consistent with itself and with the principles laid down in previous decisions, would seem to be predicated on an understanding on the part of the drawer when the bill was drawn that it was not to be paid by the acceptor, or on the idea that a bill drawn without funds is not a commercial transaction, and not subject to commercial rules. The presumptions are rendered the stronger from the cases afterwards stated, in which a drawer without funds in the hands of his drawee would still be entitled to notice. These are "acceptances on the faith of consignments from the drawer not come to hand," and "acceptances on the ground of fair mercantile agreement;" to which, he says, may possibly be added many others. If the exception admits of these exceptions and of many others, it would be difficult to apply it to any case of a fair transaction, where the drawer had really a right to draw, unless it be supposed not to be governed by the law merchant.

The judge next proceeds to describe the case in which notice is not requisite. He says: "Where the drawer has no effects, and has no fair pretense for drawing, or where he draws without effects intended to be applied in payment and only for the purpose of raising money by discount for himself, and a fortiori for the acceptor, it is fairly deducible from the cases that notice need not be given." It is not only necessary that the drawer should have no effects, but also that he should have no fair pretense for drawing. Now he may have a fair pretense, as in the case of a "fair mercantile agreement," without having any funds in the hands of the drawee, which notice of non-acceptance of the bill might enable him to withdraw; and yet in such case it would appear, from the language of the court, that notice could not be dispensed with. "Where he draws only for the purpose of raising money by discount for himself, and a fortiori for the acceptor," notice need not be given. Where he draws solely for the purpose of raising money by discount for himself, he expects to pay the bill, and there is no person to whom he can resort for repayment. There is no person on whom he can have a legal or an equitable demand, in consequence of the non-payment of the bill. But how can the same reasoning be said to apply a fortiori to the case of the bill being drawn for the use of the acceptor? In such case the relative situation of the parties must be substantially the same as if the money raised on the bill for the acceptor were funds of the drawer in his hands, on which the bill was drawn. Every motive for requiring notice of non-payment, in the case of a bill drawn upon funds, except that which results from a right to claim those funds by a suit, would apply to a bill drawn to raise money for the acceptor, unless it was understood at the time that the acceptor was not to pay the bill. The case of Walwyn v. St. Quintin, then, can only be supported on the idea of an understanding that the drawee was not to pay the bill, or that a bill, drawn, not in the usual course of business, is a transaction to which commercial rules do not apply. In the case of Whitfield v. Savage, 2 Bos. & Pull., 277, the drawer had funds in the hands of the acceptor, and the decision turned upon that point.

The reasoning on the cases of 'protested bills has been gone into the more at large, because it has been considered as applicable to promissory notes indorsed under the statute of Anne, which is admitted to be in force in Maryland. The indorser has been considered as the drawer, and the maker of the note as the acceptor; and in all cases of an indorsement for accommodation, the indorser is likened to a drawer without funds in the hands of the acceptor. Where the money raised upon the note is received by the indorser, so that the note is discounted, in truth, for his accommodation, not for that of the maker, he is unquestionably without funds in the hands of the acceptor, must expect to pay the note himself, and cannot require notice of its non-payment by the maker. But the same reasons do not appear to exist where the note has been discounted for the maker. In that case the funds which represent the note are in the hands of the maker, or, to use the language applicable to bills, in the hands of the acceptor, before the draft becomes payable; the drawer had a right to draw, and had a right to expect that his bill would be paid. Upon principles of reason and of justice, then, it would seem that notice of non-payment could be as little dispensed with in this case as if he had himself paid the money to the maker of the note, and then received it from the bank, or as if the note had been given him for a previous debt, and had been discounted for his own use.

Notice of non-payment by the maker is necessary, because the undertaking of the indorser is conditional; and wherever, in fact, the transaction is such that the maker of the note ought in justice to pay it, and is bound ultimately to make it good, it would seem reasonable that payment should be demanded from him, and that reasonable notice of non-payment should be given to the indorser. If, however, the course of decisions be otherwise, the indorser of a note for the accommodation of the maker must come within the exception which dispenses with notice in his case. The cases which have been adjudged in England on promissory notes are anterior, in point of time, to the cases of Walwyn v. St. Quintin, and of Whitfield v. Savage. The first which has been cited is De Berdt v. Atkinson, 2 H. Black., 336. This note was indorsed for the accommodation of the maker, the indorser well knowing at the time that the maker was insolvent. Four judges who tried the cause were unanimously of opinion that want of notice did not discharge the indorser. The opinion of the chief justice was founded on the known insolvency of the maker, and the consequent impossibility that loss could be sustained by the indorser from want of notice. The opinion of Justice Buller was founded on the circumstance that the note was indorsed for the accommodation of the drawer. He states explicitly that the general rule is only applicable to fair transactions, and by fair transactions he means "bills or notes given for value in the ordinary course of trade." Justices Heath and Rooke accorded in the decision, but whether for the reasons assigned by the chief justice, or for those assigned by Justice Buller, or for both, does not appear.

The same point came on to be considered in the case of Nicholson v. Gouthit, 2 H. Black., 609. This was a strong case, because the indorsement was made in consequence of a previous engagement on the part of the indorser to guaranty the payment of a debt due from the maker of the note, who appears, from the transaction, to have been in bad circumstances at the time, and who became insolvent before the note was payable. From his connection with the maker, and from other circumstances, the indorser must have known that the maker would not pay the note, and it was the understanding of all parties that it should be paid by the indorser. The justice of the case was said to be clearly in favor of the plaintiff, and under an impression that the want of notice in this case could not injure the plaintiff, the lord chief justice had, at the trial, instructed the jury that it was unnecessary, and, indeed, that it might be considered as received by anticipation. In this case the note was not made merely to raise money, but was made to pay a debt. The indorser, however, gave no value for it, and, if likened to the drawer of a bill of exchange, he had drawn without funds in the hands of the acceptor, and with a knowledge that the acceptor would not pay the bill. But in the argument in favor of a new trial, the counsel contended that the law upon a promissory note was different, in this respect, from the law on a bill of exchange, and though notice of the dishonor of a bill drawn without funds in the hands of the drawee need not be given, yet the rule in the case of promissory notes is totally different, and notice must in all cases be given to the indorser. In delivering the opinion of the court, Lord Chief Justice Eyre assented to this distinction, and admitted the rule with respect to notice to the indorser to be as stated. He therefore reversed his own decision at nisi prius, and granted a new trial upon the strict law, contrary to his ideas of the justice of the case. Heath and Rooke concurred in this opinion. Buller was not present, and, reasoning from his opinion in the case of De Berdt v. Atkinson, it is probable he would not have concurred in the decision of this case.

§ 985. When notice to accommodation indorser may be dispensed with.

However, then, the law may be with regard to the drawer of a bill of exchange who from other circumstances may fairly draw, but who has no effects in the hands of the drawer, it seems settled in England, by the case of Nicholson v. Gouthit, that the law with regard to a promissory note is different, and that if, in any case where the note is made for the benefit of the maker, notice to the indorser can be dispensed with, it is only in the case of an insolvency known at the time of indorsement. In point of reason, justice, and the nature of the undertaking, there is no case in which the indorser is better entitled to demand strict notice than in the case of an indorsement for accommodation, the maker having received the value. This court is of opinion that the circuit court erred in directing the jury that the laches of the plaintiffs, in failing to demand payment of the maker of the note, and to give notice of non-payment to the indorser, did not deprive the plaintiffs of their remedy against the indorser, and, therefore, the judgment rendered in this case is reversed, and the cause remanded for further trial. A new trial, with instructions, etc.

Judgment reversed.

WILDES v. SAVAGE.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 1 Story, 22-38. 1839.)

Opinion by STORY, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiffs are bankers, doing business in London and in Boston. Samuel Austin, Jr., is their agent and attorney. In June, 1836, James S. Bruce, a merchant of Boston, applied to Mr. Austin for a credit upon the plaintiffs for £2,000, which said Austin agreed to issue, in behalf of the plaintiffs, upon condition that the goods purchased with the proceeds should be consigned to the plaintiffs, and that, in addition thereto, as a further security, said Bruce should furnish a personal guaranty to the amount of £500. The defendant agreed to become such guarantor, and thereupon said Austin gave to said Bruce a letter of credit for the sum aforesaid, on behalf of the plaintiffs, dated June 7, 1836, to be drawn for on account of said Bruce, by Joseph Tuckerman, Jr., then about to proceed to the East Indies, or, in his absence, by the house of Russell & Co. of Canton. Upon the letter of credit Bruce, by an indorsement in writing, promised to place the plaintiffs in funds to cover the drafts with a banker's commission, interest, charges, etc., or settle the same in Boston. And the defendant, by another indorsement in writing, guarantied to the plaintiffs a punctual fulfilment of Bruce's agreement, to the extent of £500, promising in case of his default to pay that amount on demand to the order of the plaintiffs. Joseph Tuckerman proceeded to the East Indies soon after the date of the letter of credit. On the 28th of November, 1836, Bruce became insolvent and executed a general assignment, pursuant to the statute of Massachusetts of 1836. The defendant became a party to the assignment on the day of its date, and received dividends on the 1st of July, twenty per cent.; in October, 1837, fifteen per cent., and on September 3, 1838, ten per cent., but he has never made any claim on account of the said guaranty. On the 25th of April, 1837, Russell & Co., in the absence of Tuckerman, drew on the faith of said letter of credit and for account of said Bruce, a bill on the plaintiffs, for £2,000, payable to the order of the plaintiffs at six months' sight. The said bill was in part payment of a shipment of teas made by said Russell & Co. to Boston, for account of said Bruce, and consigned to the plaintiffs. Russell & Co. remitted the bill directly to the plaintiffs, and being then indebted to them, the said bill was received by the plaintiffs, on or about October 6, 1837, and passed to the credit of Russell & Co. in account current. On the 25th day of June, 1837, the plaintiffs suspended payment, and after that day declined accepting all bills drawn under letters of credit, heretofore granted by said Austin. Their failure and refusal to accept bills were publicly known in Boston about the 15th of July, 1837, and the defendant, who is conversant with such matters, had knowledge thereof on or soon after that day.

On the 2d of May, 1836, Austin, as agent aforesaid, gave to Bruce another letter of credit, upon which the defendant entered into a guaranty of the same date. A bill was drawn under this last mentioned letter, and on presentment thereof to the plaintiffs in London, they refused acceptance thereof, and wrote to Bruce a letter, under date of June 29, 1837. This letter was received by Bruce on or about the 9th of August, 1837, and its contents were made known by Bruce to the defendant, in the course of a few days after its receipt. The teas purchased with this bill were received in Boston by Mr. Austin, as the attorney of the plaintiffs, about August 28, 1837. On October 6, 1837, the plaintiffs notified to Mr. Bruce, by letter, that Russell & Co. had drawn on them for £2,000, under said letter of credit, and that said bill would fall due on the 8th of April then next, and requested him to provide for its payment with their partner in New York, or their agent in Boston. On the 5th of September, 1837, Bruce executed to Russell & Co. an assignment of all his interest in the teas then in the hands of Austin, which assignment was procured in Boston by Mr. Forbes, to secure Russell & Co. in case the plaintiff should not accept and pay the said draft of £2,000.

On the 5th of May, 1838, Mr. Austin made a formal demand on Mr. Bruce for the fulfilment of his engagement, stating that he had received intelligence that the bill had been received and passed to the credit of Russell & Co. by the plaintiffs. To this letter Mr. Bruce made no answer. On the 13th of October, 1838, Mr. Austin repeated that request by letter to Mr. Bruce, to which Mr. Bruce made no answer; in which last letter Mr. Austin notified to Mr. Bruce, that he should, after the Monday following, sell the teas, holding him and the defendant accountable for the deficiency, if any. The teas were afterwards sold from time to time by Mr. Austin, who remitted the proceeds to the plaintiffs in London; and on making up the account it appeared that they fell short of the amount due the plaintiffs by the sum of £728. The last parcel of the teas was sold in January, 1839; and Mr. Austin, on the 4th of March, notified to Mr. Bruce that he had received the account from the plaintiffs, showing that deficiency. In the autumn of 1838, Mr. Austin verbally notified to Mr. Savage, that the teas were on sale, and would probably leave a deficiency of more than £500, for which the plaintiffs would look to him upon his guaranty, to which Mr. Savage replied in terms neither admitting nor denying his liability. On the 11th of March, 1839, Mr. Austin received from the defendant a letter, dated March 9th, stating that the plaintiffs' account had been shown to him by Mr. Bruce at Mr. Austin's request, but denying any right of claim against him, the defendant. To which Mr. Austin replied on the 11th of March, making a formal demand on the defendant for the deficiency. To this demand Mr. Savage replied on the 12th of March, reiterating his denial of the claim.

Russell & Co. received full payment of the bill from the plaintiffs in account current. Mr. Bruce was insolvent at the maturity of the bill, and continued to be so until the present time, as to all debts contracted before his assignment; and this suit is brought to recover the £500 and interest upon the guaranty of the defendant. If the law of England, in respect to a promise to accept a non-existing bill, shall come in question, either party may read the deposition of Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Hill, as evidence of the foreign law, if the court shall consider the depositions of English lawyers competent evidence in this court of the common law of England. The whole case is submitted to the court upon the law and facts, with authority to draw such inferences as a jury would be justifiable in drawing from the facts as stated.

§ 986. Agreement to accept a non-existing bill payable a specified number of days after sight is not a virtual acceptance.

Several points have been suggested at the argument, upon some of which I do not entertain any doubt; and, therefore, they may be disposed of in a few words. It is said that by the law of England, where the bill of exchange, drawn in this case, was to be accepted, and to be payable, a promise to accept a non-existing bill, even though the bill is taken by the holder upon the faith of that promise, does not amount to an acceptance of the bill, when drawn, in favor of the holder. The opinions of Sir Frederick Pollock and Mr. Hill, who are admitted on all sides to be very eminent counsel, taken under commission, are direct and full to the point, and leave no doubt as to the present state of the law in England, although certainly it was formerly a matter of no inconsiderable controversy. The language of Lord Mansfield, in Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr., 1663, and Pierson v. Dunlop, Cowp., 571, and Mason v. Hunt, Doug., 296, certainly went very far to establish the contrary doctrine in its full latitude, although it was somewhat shaken but not directly overturned in the subsequent case of Johnson v. Collings, 1 East, 93. It was in this state of the authorities that the question was first presented to the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat., 66 (§§ 139-141, supra); and upon the footing of the cases before Lord Mansfield, it was then held that a letter, written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill upon the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance, binding the person who makes the promise. To this doctrine, thus limited, the supreme court have ever since steadily adhered, whenever the question has (as it has on several occasions) since come before it. But, on the other hand, the court has shown a strong disinclination in any respect to enlarge the doctrine of a virtual acceptance of non-existing bills. Schimmelpennich v. Bayard, 1 Pet., 264 (§§ 135-138, supra); Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet., 121. It is, perhaps, to be lamented that the doctrine of such virtual acceptances ever was established; and, if the question had been entirely new, I am well satisfied that it would not have been recognized as fit to be promulgated by that court, it being at once unsound in policy, and full of inconvenience. But the supreme court yielded, as did the judge who decided that case in the circuit court, to what seemed, at that time, the true result of the English authorities upon an important practical commercial question. I am not sorry to find that professional opinion has now settled down in England against the doctrine; although there is no pretense to say that, up to this very hour, there has been any formal decision in Westminster Hall against it. But it does not appear to me that the doctrine ever was applicable, or could be applied to any bills of exchange, except such as were payable on demand, or at a fixed time after date. Where bills are drawn payable at so many days after sight, it is impracticable to apply the doctrine; for there remains a future act to be done, the presentment and sight of the bill, before the period for which it is to run and at which it is to become payable can commence, whether it be accepted or be dishonored. How can the time be calculated upon such a bill before it is presented? If a letter is written, promising to accept a non-existing bill, to be thereafter drawn at six months' sight, when is the acceptance to be deemed made? At the date of the bill? Certainly not; for that would be at war with the obvious intent of the parties, which plainly is that the acceptance shall be on a future sight of the bill. If it is said that the acceptance is to be treated as made when the bill is actually presented for acceptance, and it is dishonored by the drawee, it is as plain that we set up a prior intent or promise against the fact. Upon what ground can a court say, when a party promises to do an act in futuro, such, for example, as to accept a bill when it shall be drawn and presented to him at a future time, that his promise overcomes his act at that time? That his refusal to perform his promise amounts to a performance of it? It is quite another question whether the holder, who has taken such a bill upon the faith of such promise, may not have some other remedy, either at law or in equity, for the breach of it, against the promisor. My judgment is that the doctrine of a virtual acceptance of a non-existing bill by a prior promise to accept it, when drawn, has no application to a bill drawn payable at some fixed period after sight; for it then amounts to no more than a promise to do a future act. I have looked into the authorities, and I do not find in any one of them that the bill drawn and to which the doctrine was applied was a bill drawn payable at or after sight.

Upon another point I have still less doubt; and that is that the bill of exchange drawn in this case was a draft within the scope of the letter of credit, and in conformity to the authority therein given. The argument is that the bill is not a regular bill of exchange, because it is drawn by Russell & Co., payable to Wildes & Co., who are the drawees of the bill. In point of fact, it was so drawn by Russell & Co. for the purpose of being passed to their credit by the drawees, to whom Russell & Co. were then indebted in a larger amount. It appears to me that this does not change its character as a bill of exchange. An instrument is not less a bill of exchange because all the parties to it in the character of drawers, payees and drawees are not different persons. A bill drawn by a person, payable to his own order, has always been deemed to be a bill of exchange in the commercial sense of the phrase. And it would not cease to be such a bill if it should be indorsed by the drawer, payable to the drawee. Now such a bill so indorsed differs in nothing substantially from the present bill. In truth, where the bill is negotiable and contains a drawer, a payee and a drawee, it is, in a commercial sense, a bill of exchange, although one or more of the parties should fill a double character. It is of no consequence, in such a case, what particular individuals represent the dramatic personages. Bills of exchange, so called, have sometimes been drawn by the drawer upon himself, payable to himself or order; and they have been held valid after indorsement by him to another person. But, at all events, the present is a "draft" in the sense of the letter of credit; for the word draft is nomen generalissimum, and includes all orders for the payment of money drawn by one person on another.

§ 988. Guaranty; statement of facts.

The remaining point is that alone upon which any difficulty can be entertained. It is whether the plaintiffs (Wildes & Co.) have lost their recourse over against the defendant upon his guaranty by their omission to give him notice at an earlier period of the neglect of Bruce to pay the money due according to his engagement upon the bill for £2,000. And here it is important to advert to the dates of some of the material transactions. The letter of credit was given on the 7th of June, 1836. Bruce became insolvent and made a general assignment of his property on the 23th of November, 1836, and the defendant became a party to that assignment on the day of its date. The bill of exchange was drawn by Russell & Co., at Canton, on the 20th of April, 1837, at six months' sight. The plaintiffs (Wildes & Co.) suspended payment on the 2d and 5th of June, 1837. The bill was remitted to them by Russell & Co., and was received by the plaintiffs and passed to the credit of Russell & Co. about the 6th of October, 1837, the latter being then indebted to the plaintiffs in a larger amount. On the same 6th of October, 1837, the plaintiffs duly notified to Bruce the receipt of the bill, and that it would fall due on the 8th of April, 1838, and requested him to provide for the payment thereof accordingly. No provision was made by Bruce for the payment of the bill at its maturity. On the 5th of May, 1838, Austin, as agent of the plaintiffs, made a formal demand on Bruce for the fulfilment of his engagement, and stated to him that the bill had been received and passed to the account of Russell & Co. by the plaintiffs. Bruce made no reply. Afterwards, in December, 1838, Austin gave notice to Bruce of his intention to sell the teas, which were held by him as security for the payment; and the teas were accordingly sold and the sales completed in January, 1839. In the autumn of 1838, probably in October, Austin notified to the defendant that the teas were on sale, and would probably leave a deficiency beyond the £500, for which the plaintiffs would look to him upon his guaranty. The defendant replied in terms neither admitting nor denying his liability. A formal demand was afterwards made in March, 1839, upon the defendant, for the amount of his guaranty, which he declined paying; and the present suit has been since commenced therefor. It is upon this posture of the substantial facts (for I omit any reference to others, which have not, in my judgment, any bearing upon the merits of the present case) that the question arises, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, no notice of the default of Bruce having been given to the defendant until the autumn of 1838. It was said at the argument, that in cases of guaranty of future advances, to be made to another person, notice must be given to the guarantor, by the party making the advance, that he accepts the guaranty, and consents to make the advances; and also notice that he has made the advances and acted upon the guaranty; and, lastly, notice that he has made a due demand upon the debtor, and his refusal to pay the amount, when due. The two former, it is added, are conditions precedent to the legal operation of the guaranty; and if not duly given, the guarantor is not bound by his guaranty, whether he suffers any damage or not. The notice of the non-payment, it is admitted, is not a condition precedent; but it must be given in a reasonable time, and if the guarantor suffers any damage from the default of the creditor, he will, at least to the extent of that damage, be exonerated.

§ 989. What notice guarantor is entitled to, discussed.

I admit that, upon every guaranty for future advances, it is the duty of the party making the advances to give notice to the guarantor of his acceptance thereof and of his consent to act under the guaranty, and to make the advances. This is conclusively established by the decisions of the supreme court in Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 69; Edmondston v. Drake, 5 Pet., 624; Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet., 113; Lee v. Dick, 10 Pet., 482; Adams v. Jones, 12 Pet., 207; and Reynolds v. Douglass, 12 Pet., 497. This doctrine, however, is inapplicable to the circumstances of the present case; for the agreement to accept was contemporaneous with the guaranty, and indeed constituted the consideration and basis thereof. And at all events, here there was due notice of an agreement to give the credit, and to make the advances contemplated by the guaranty.

Upon the other point, I have more difficulty in yielding to the argument. Where a guaranty is accepted, and notice has been duly given to the guarantor that the party will act upon it, and give credit and make advances accordingly, I am not aware that it has ever been held that it was indispensable in all cases to give another and a further distinct notice to the guarantor of the amount of the advances actually made, and the terms upon which they have been made, when the transaction is completed. All that I have supposed to be generally required of the person making the advances or giving the credit, after having given due notice of his acceptance and intention to act upon the guaranty, is to make a demand upon the debtor, when the credit has expired, or the amount has become due; and upon his default to give notice thereof within a reasonable time afterwards to the guarantor. There is no case, to my knowledge, which goes the length that there should be three substantive or distinct notices in all cases, as contended for at the argument; and, as an original question, I should not be disposed to entertain it; since it would throw such arduous duties on the guarantee (as I desire to call the party accepting the guaranty) as would materially tend to impair the utility and convenience of that instrument. I do not mean to say that there are not, or may not be, particular cases of guaranty in which such notice may be required. Thus, for example, in such a case as Cremor v. Higginson, 1 Mason, 323, where advances were contemplated upon certain future contingencies, which might or might not arise, it might be proper to hold that some notice should be given to the guarantor within a reasonable time, notwithstanding he had already signified in general terms a willingness to make the advances if they should be required, that the contingencies had arisen, and the advances had been made, and the guaranty was relied on; for otherwise the guarantor might not definitely know whether, under such circumstances, the guaranty was acted upon or not. So in the case of Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet., 113, 127, where there was a continuing guaranty for advances, acceptances and indorsements to be made by the party in futuro, it would seem but reasonable that when the whole transactions are closed, notice of the whole amount, for which the guarantor is held responsible, should be communicated to him within a reasonable time afterwards. The same rule might well apply to a single transaction, such as a single advance or acceptance or indorsement, where, from the nature and objects of the guaranty, the guarantor could not otherwise have any means of knowing the extent of his guaranty as to time, amount or other particulars, essential to guide his future conduct, and to ascertain and fix his responsibility. All such cases must stand upon their own circumstances, and do not seem to furnish just grounds for a general rule. But, without saying what is or ought to be the general rule, it seems to me that the doctrine can never properly apply to a case circumstanced as the present, where all the persons are originally privy to the whole transaction; where the case rests upon a letter of credit for a limited amount, to be drawn within a fixed time, and, subject to these restrictions, where the sums for which the drafts are to be drawn, and the times when drawn, are to depend upon the action of the debtor, and the guarantor is a party to the whole of the original contract. In such a case the guarantor has as good means of knowledge and inquiry as the guarantee, and it is quite as much his duty to make such inquiries as it is of the guarantee to give him notice of the subsequent facts. If he omits to make any inquiries, he may properly attribute any loss which he may sustain thereby to his own laches or want of vigilance, or to his own confidence in the debtor, and not to any disregard of duty on the other side.

In the present case it is impossible to avoid seeing that the letter of credit was for a limited time (eighteen months), after which no advances made would bind the guarantor; that the amount was not to exceed £2,000; that all the bills were to be drawn in China at six months' sight on London; that the sole object of the letter of credit and advances was to assist the operations of Bruce in a projected enterprise or voyage from Boston to the East Indies and back; that it was contemplated that the bills would not become payable until a very long period after the time when the guaranty was given; that the return cargo was relied on as the immediate fund by which the advances were to be primarily secured; and that the guarantee was to be merely an auxiliary security. It seems to me that, under such circumstances, no further notice of the actual advances made was necessary to be given to the defendant until the same became due from Bruce, and there had been some default on his part. The defendant, if he wished any information as to the progress or consummation of the voyage, could readily institute the proper inquiries. I am not prepared, therefore, to admit that, under the circumstances of the present case, there was any duty on the part of the plaintiffs to give notice to the defendant of the fact of the bill of £2,000 being drawn upon them and received by them and passed to the account of Russell & Co., before the maturity of the bill and the default of Bruce in not paying the same. If it had been the duty of the plaintiffs to give such notice, under such circumstances, I should still say that it would not discharge the guaranty, unless the defendant could show that he had suffered some damage from the want of such notice. Indeed, the rights and duties of parties to guaranties must, from the variety of circumstances under which they have been entered into, be materially governed by the particular circumstances of each case. Lord Tenterden held this doctrine in Van Wart v. Woolley, 3 Barn. & Cress., 439, 447, to which I shall presently have occasion to refer for another purpose.

It appears to me, then, that the whole question in this case turns upon the point whether the defendant has received notice of the default of Bruce and the non-payment of the bill, within a reasonable time; and, if he has not, whether he is discharged from his guaranty, unless he has sustained some damage from the want of such notice. I take the doctrine to be clearly settled, that upon a guaranty, to discharge the guarantor, there must not only be a want of notice within a reasonable time, but there must also be some loss or damage sustained by the guarantor; and that if there be a loss or damage, that the guaranty is not totally discharged, but only pro tanto to the amount of the loss or damage. The case is constantly distinguished in the authorities from that of an indorser to negotiable paper. The latter is entitled to strict notice; the guarantor is entitled only to notice when he is or may be prejudiced by the want of it. If the debtor is solvent when the money becomes due, and no notice is given to the guarantor, and the debtor afterwards and before notice becomes insolvent, the guaranty is discharged. But where the notice would be of no avail, and the guarantor has suffered and can suffer no damage by the want of notice, he is not discharged by the omission to give it. Ordinarily, therefore, if the debtor is insolvent when the debt became due, and has ever since remained so, no notice to the guarantor is deemed necessary; nay, not even a demand upon the debtor, when the debt became due. This doctrine seems to me fully sustained by the leading authorities, beginning with the case of Warrington v. Furber, 8 East, 242. That case was fully recognized in Philips v. Astling, 2 Taunt., 206; and the like doctrine was applied in Holbrow v. Wilkins, 1 Barn. & Cress., 10, and Van Wart v. Woolley, 3 Barn. & Cress., 439, 447. In this last case Lord Tenterden said that in cases of guaranty the nature of the transaction and the circumstances of the particular case were to be considered and regarded; and that where the debtor had become bankrupt, a demand upon him was unnecessary to charge the guarantor. And in Holbrow v. Wilkins, and Van Wart v. Woolley, the court held that, as it did not appear that the guarantor had sustained any damage from the want of a due presentment to the debtor for payment, or of due notice to the guarantor of the default, the guaranty was not discharged. The same doctrine was maintained in Gibbs v. Cannon, 9 Serg. & R., 202, and pointedly asserted in the Oxford Bank v. Haynes, 8 Pick., 423. It was also recognized in the fullest extent in Reynolds v. Douglass, 12 Pet., 497. And the court in effect there said, that the guarantor is bound, without notice, where the debtor is insolvent at the time when the debt becomes due; and that his liability continues, unless he can show that he has sustained some prejudice by the want of notice of a demand on the debtor, and his non-payment; and if he has sustained any damage, that he will be discharged only to the amount of that damage.

Now, upon these principles, it seems to me difficult to maintain the position that the present defendant is not liable on his guaranty. Bruce (the debtor) became insolvent before the bill was drawn, and, for aught that appears, he has remained ever since insolvent. The earliest period in which it would have been practicable to give notice to the defendant of the arrival of the draft and the acceptance by the plaintiffs must have been after the 6th of October, 1837; and the earliest period at which notice could have been given of the default of payment must have been after the 8th of April, 1838, when the draft was at maturity. It is not shown, nor, as far as I know, even pretended in argument, that notice as soon as practicable after either of these periods would have been of any advantage to the defendant, or that he has sustained any damage by the omission of such notice. The debtor then was, and, as far as we know, has ever since been insolvent, and without the means to discharge the debt. If this be so, then, upon the general principles already stated, the defendant is not discharged from his guaranty. But it appears to me that there are circumstances in the present case which show that the notice was within a reasonable time; and indeed, as early, if not earlier, than the case required. It is plain to me (as I have already intimated) that the understanding was that the teas should be the primary fund or security for the payment of the debt; and until that fund was exhausted by a sale, and the actual deficiency was ascertained, I do not well see how the defendant could be called upon to pay the sum due upon his guaranty. It would be an unliquidated deficiency. In a court of equity, at all events, the defendant would have been entitled to require that the teas should first be sold and applied to the payment of the debt pro tanto, before he was called upon to pay the amount secured by his guaranty. Now, in point of fact, in or about October, 1838, and before the sale of the teas, he had due notice of the advances and of the probable deficiency. He made no objection to the sale; he did not positively insist upon his being then discharged from the guaranty. The sales were not concluded until the succeeding January, and he had due notice thereof in a short period after the entire deficiency was ascertained. Now, if I am right in this view of the facts, that the guaranty was not to be insisted on until the other fund was exhausted, and the proceeds of the sales were first to be applied in discharge of the defendant, the demand was made upon the defendant within a reasonable time. It was made as soon as it properly could be. And it is not shown that an earlier sale, if practicable, would have been desirable, or of any higher benefit to the parties.

Upon the whole, upon the best consideration which I am able to give this case, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the amount of the guaranty, as well upon the special principles of law as the general circumstances of the case.

BOWLING v. HARRISON.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Mississippi.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE GRIER.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The first assignment of error in this case is to the instruction given by the court to the jury, "That, to charge an indorser, if he lived in the town in which the note was made payable; the notice must be personal, unless he had agreed to receive it elsewhere, or unless, by custom and usage of the bank at which the note is payable, the notice of non-payment was left at the postoffice."

§ 991. Notice to an indorser who lives in the place where a note is payable must be personal.

As the only question on the trial of the cause was the sufficiency of notice left at the postoffice at Vicksburg to charge an indorser residing there, and not whether a copy left at his dwelling-house or place of business would be proper, the phrase "personal notice" was evidently intended and understood to include the latter in opposition to the former. This instruction is, therefore, not objected to on the ground of any inaccuracy of expression on that point. But the complaint is, that the rule of law on this subject was erroneously enunciated by the court in stating the conditions under which a personal service of notice on an indorser is required to be "residence in the town where the note was made payable." It is true the terms in which the rule of law on that subject is usually stated differ from those used by the court on this occasion. In Williams v. United States Bank, 2 Pet., 101 (§§ 1008-1010, infra), it is thus stated by this court: "If the parties reside in the same city or town, the indorser must be personally noticed of the dishonor of the bill or note, either verbally or in writing, or a written notice must be left at his dwelling-house or place of business." Mr. Justice Story (Story on Bills, § 312) states the rule in these words: "Where the party entitled to notice and the holder reside in the same town or city, the general rule is that the notice should be given to the party entitled to it either personally or at his domicile or place of business." The indorsee or owner of the note in this case resided in Maryland, and the indorser in Vicksburg; and it is contended that, as they are the only parties, and do not reside in the same place, the rule is inapplicable to the case. But we are of opinion that, whether we regard the reasons upon which this rule is founded, or a correct construction of the terms in which it is usually stated, the instruction given by the court below was correct, and not such as to mislead the jury in the application of the law to the circumstances of the case before them. The best evidence of notice is proof of personal service on the party to be affected by it, or by leaving a copy at his dwelling. Depositing a notice in the postoffice affords but presumptive evidence of its reception, and is permitted to be substituted for the former only where the latter would be too inconvenient or expensive. Hence, when the convenience of the public post is not needed for the purpose of transmission or conveyance, there is no reason for its use, or for waiving the more stringent and certain evidence of notice; and, therefore, in the practical application of the rule, the relative position of the person giving the notice and the party receiving it forms the only criterion of the necessity for relaxing it. A very large portion of the commercial paper used in this country is similar to that which is the subject of the present suit. They are notes made payable at a certain bank. The last indorsee or owner transmits it to that bank for collection; if funds are not deposited there to meet it when due, it is handed to a notary or agent of the bank, who makes demand and protest, and gives notice of its dishonor to the indorsers; if they live in the same town or city where the bank is situated and the demand made, and "where the note was payable," he serves it personally, or at their residence or place of business; if they live at a distance, so that such a service would be inconvenient and expensive, he sends the notice by mail to the nearest postoffice, or such other place as may have been designated by the party on whom it is to be served. This is and has been the daily practice and construction of the rule in question over the whole country, and the only one consonant with reason.

This practical application of the rule is correctly stated by the court in their instruction to the jury as connected with the circumstances of the case before them, and also within its terms as it is usually stated in the books. The term "holder" is properly applied to the person having possession of the paper and making the demand, whether in his own right or as agent for another. The Planters' Bank of Vicksburg were the "holders" of this note for collection, and were bound to give notice to all the indorsers. Smedes v. Utica Bank, 20 Johns., 372. The notary, also, who held the note as agent of the owner for the purpose of making demand and protest, may be properly considered as the "holder" within the letter and spirit of this rule. On a careful examination of the very numerous cases in the books in which the rule under consideration has been enunciated in the terms above stated, they will be found not essentially to differ from the present in their circumstances. In some instances, also, the rule has been stated in the terms used by the court below. See Bayley on Bills.

An exception is taken, also, to the instruction of the court "That the memorandum attached to the note in this case was not a sufficient agreement to receive notice at the postoffice and to dispense with personal notice on the indorser, and that the custom and usage of the bank, as proved in this case, were not sufficient to dispense with personal notice." The memorandum is in the following words: "Third indorser, J. P. Harrison, lives at Vicksburg." The only direct evidence of usage was, "that, for several years prior to the maturity of said note, it had been the usage of the Planters' Bank of Vicksburg to have notice served personally upon the indorsers resident in Vicksburg, unless there was a memorandum on the note designating a place where notice was to be served; then the notice was left at such place." This is, in fact, no usage peculiar to Vicksburg, but the general rule of commercial law. The notary appears to have mistaken this memorandum for an agreement to receive notice at the Vicksburg postoffice; and, however willing to excuse himself, he has not ventured to swear directly that there was any known usage to justify this construction, or rather misconstruction, of this memorandum. The counsel for plaintiff in error complain that the court did not submit it to the jury to say whether an inference might not be drawn from some equivocal or obscure expressions of the witness that there was such a usage. It is true, the jury are the proper judges of the credibility and weight of testimony, but the court should not instruct them to presume or infer important facts, unless there be testimony which, if believed, would justify such a conclusion.

§ 994. A usage should be definite, uniform and well known.

It is of the utmost importance to commercial transactions that the rules of law on the subject of notice which is to charge an indorser be stable and certain, and not suffered to fluctuate and vary with the notions or caprice of banking corporations or village notaries. A usage, to be binding, should be definite, uniform and well known. It should be established by clear and satisfactory evidence, so that it may be justly presumed that the parties had reference to it in making their contract. Every day's experience shows that notaries in many places fall into loose ways of performing their duties, either through negligence or ignorance; and courts should be cautious how they encourage juries to presume usages and customs contrary to the settled rules of law, in order to sanction the mistakes or misconceptions of careless or incompetent officers. It was as easy to have written the memorandum on this note: "The indorser, J. P. Harrison, agrees to receive notice at the Vicksburg post-office," as to write it in its present form; and one can hardly conceive of the possibility of a well known and established usage, that a written memorandum should be construed without any regard to its terms or plain meaning. Those who affirm the existence of such a strange usage should be held to strict proof of it; and the court were right in not submitting it to the jury to infer such an improbable and unreasonable custom by forced or astute construction of equivocal expressions from a willing witness. Let the judgment be affirmed.

BANK OF COLUMBIA v. LAWRENCE.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE THOMPSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the circuit court of the District of Columbia. The defendant was sued as indorser of a promissory note for $5,000, made by Joseph Mulligan, bearing date the 15th of July, 1819, and payable sixty days after date at the Bank of Columbia. The making and indorsing the note and the demand of payment were duly proved, and the only question upon the trial was touching the manner in which notice of non-payment was given to the indorser, no objection being made to the sufficiency of the notice in point of time. The material facts before the court upon this part of the case, as shown by the bill of exceptions, were: That the banking house of the plaintiffs was in Georgetown, at which place the note appears to be dated. That some time before the note fell due the defendant had lived in the city of Washington, and carried on the business of a morocco leather-dresser, keeping a shop and living in a house of his own in the said city. That about the year 1818 he sold his shop and stock in trade and relinquished his business, and removed with his family to a farm in Alexandria county, within the District of Columbia, and about two or three miles from Georgetown. That the Georgetown postoffice was the nearest postoffice to his place of residence, and the one at which he usually received his letters. The notice of non-payment was put into the postoffice at Georgetown, addressed to the defendant at that place. It was proved on the part of the defendant that at the time of his removal into the country, and from that time until after the note in question fell due, he continued to be the owner of the house in Washington where he formerly lived, and which was occupied by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Harbaugh. That he came frequently and regularly every week, and as often as two or three times a week, to this house, where he was employed in winding up his former business and settling his accounts, and where he kept his books of account, and where his bank notices, such as were usually served by the runner of the bank on parties who were to pay notes, were sometimes left, and sometimes at a shop opposite to his house, and where also his newspapers and foreign letters were left. That his coming to town and so employing himself was generally known to persons having business with him. That his residence in the country was known to the cashier of the bank. That there was a regular daily mail from Georgetown to the city of Washington, and that the defendant's house was situated in Washington less than a quarter of a mile from Georgetown.

There was also some evidence given on the part of the plaintiffs tending to show that the usage of the bank in serving notices in similar cases was conformably to the one here pursued, and that the defendant was apprised of such usage. But that testimony may be laid out of view, as this court does not found its opinion in any measure upon that part of the case. Upon this evidence the plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury that it was not incumbent on them to have left the notice of the non-payment of the note at the house occupied by Mrs. Harbaugh, as stated in the evidence, but that it was sufficient, under the circumstances stated, to leave the notice at the postoffice in Georgetown, which instructions the court refused to give, but instructed the jury that their verdict must be governed according to their opinion and finding on the subject of usage which had been given in evidence. The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

From this statement of the case it appears that the note was made at Georgetown, payable at the Bank of Columbia, in that town. That the defendant when he indorsed the note lived in the county of Alexandria, within the District of Columbia, and having what is alleged to have been a place of business in the city of Washington; and the notice of non-payment was put into the Georgetown postoffice, addressed to the defendant at that place, by which it is understood that the notice was either inclosed in a letter, or the notice itself sealed and subscribed with the name of the defendant, with the direction "Georgetown" upon it; and whether this notice is sufficient is the question to be decided. If it should be admitted that the defendant had what is usually called a place of business in the city of Washington, and that notice served there would have been good, it by no means follows that service at his place of residence in a different place would not be equally good. Parties may be and frequently are so situated that notice may well be given at either of several places. But the evidence does not show that the defendant had a place of business in the city of Washington, according to the usual commercial understanding of a place of business. There was no public notoriety of any description given to it as such. No open or public business of any kind carried on, but merely occasional employment there two or three times a week in a house occupied by another person; and the defendant only engaged in settling up his old business. In this view of the case, the inquiry is narrowed down to the single point, whether notice through the postoffice at Georgetown was good, the defendant residing in the country two or three miles distant from that place in the county of Alexandria.

§ 995. General rule as to giving notice; due diligence required.

The general rule is, that the party whose duty it is to give notice in such cases is bound to use due diligence in communicating such notice. But it is not required of him to see that the notice is brought home to the party. He may employ the usual and ordinary mode of conveyance, and, whether the notice reaches the party or not, the holder has done all that the law requires of him. It seems at this day to be well settled, that when the facts are ascertained and undisputed, what shall constitute due diligence is a question of law. This is certainly best calculated to have fixed on uniform rules on the subject, and is highly important for the safety of holders of commercial paper. And these rules ought to be reasonable and founded in general convenience, and with a view to clog as little as possible, consistently with the safety of parties, the circulation of paper of this description; and the rules which have been settled on this subject have had in view these objects. Thus, when a party entitled to notice has in the same city or town a dwelling-house and counting-house or place of business within the compact part of such city or town, a notice delivered at either place is sufficient; and if his dwelling and place of business be within the district of a letter-carrier, a letter containing such notice, addressed to the party and left at the postoffice, would also be sufficient. All these are usual and ordinary modes of communication, and such as afford reasonable ground for presuming that the notice will be brought home to the party without unreasonable delay. So when the holder and indorser live in different post-towns, notice sent by the mail is sufficient, whether it reaches the indorser or not. And this for the same reason, that the mail being a usual channel of communication, notice sent by it is evidence of due diligence. And for the sake of general convenience it has been found necessary to enlarge this rule. And it is accordingly held, that when the party to be affected by the notice resides in a different place from the holder, the notice may be sent by the mail to the postoffice nearest to the party entitled to such notice. It has not been thought advisable, nor is it believed that it would comport with practical convenience, to fix any precise distance from the postoffice within which the party must reside, in order to make this a good service of the notice. Nor would we be understood as laying it down as a universal rule, that the notice must be sent to the postoffice nearest to the residence of the party to whom it is addressed. If he was in the habit of receiving his letters through a more distant postoffice, and that circumstance was known to the holder or party giving the notice, that might be the more proper channel of communication, because he would be most likely to receive it in that way; and it would be the ordinary mode of communicating information to him, and therefore evidence of due diligence.

§ 996. Where the indorser lives in the country and receives his letters at the postoffice in the town where the holder resides, the notice may be sent by mail.

In cases of this description, where notice is sent by mail to a party living in the country, it is distance alone or the usual course of receiving letters which must determine the sufficiency of the notice. The residence of the defendant, therefore, being in the county of Alexandria, cannot affect the question. It was in proof that the postoffice in Georgetown was the one nearest his residence, and only two or three miles distant, and through which he usually received his letters. The letter containing the notice, it is true, was directed to him at Georgetown. But there is nothing showing that this occasioned any mistake or misapprehension with respect to the person intended, or any delay in receiving the notice. And as the letter was there to be delivered to the defendant, and not to be forwarded to any other postoffice, the address was unimportant, and could mislead no one.

No cases have fallen under the notice of the court which have suggested any limits to the distance from the postoffice within which a party must reside in order to make the service of the notice in this manner good. Cases, however, have occurred, where the distance was much greater than in the one now before the court, and the notice held sufficient. 16 Johns., 218. In cases where the party entitled to notice resides in the country, unless notice sent by mail is sufficient, a special messenger must be employed for the purpose of serving it. And we think that the present case is clearly one which does not impose upon the plaintiff such duty. We do not mean to say that no such cases can arise, but they will seldom if ever occur, and, at all events, such a course ought not to be required of a holder, except under very special circumstances. Some countenance has lately been given to this practice in England in extraordinary cases by allowing the holder to recover of the indorser the expenses of serving notice by a special messenger. The case of Pearson v. Crallan, 2 Smith, 404, Chitty, 222, n., is one of this description. But in that case the court did not say that it was necessary to send a special messenger; and it was left to the jury to decide whether it was done wantonly or not. The holder is not bound to use the mail for the purpose of sending notice. He may employ a special messenger if he pleases, but no case has been found where the English courts have directly decided that he must. To compel the holder to incur such expense would be unreasonable, and the policy of adopting a rule that will throw such an increased charge upon commercial paper on the party bound to pay is at least very questionable.

We are accordingly of opinion that the notice of non-payment was duly served upon the defendant, and that the court erred in refusing so to instruct the jury. Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

COOKENDORFER v. PRESTON.

(4 Howard, 817-827. 1845.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MCLEAN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— The questions in this case arise on the rulings of the court, to which at the trial exceptions were taken. Preston, the defendant, as the indorsee of a promissory note, brought an action against the plaintiff in error, the indorser. The signatures of the maker and indorser were admitted. These grounds of error are assigned: 1. That the court erred in admitting the testimony of the notary public. 2. In refusing the instructions asked by the defendant's counsel. 3. The declaration is defective.

George Sweeney, the notary who protested the note, testified that it was delivered to him by the Bank of Washington, who held it for collection, to demand payment, and that he did thereupon, the 4th of February, 1840, present the note to the bank, and demanded payment, but was informed by the proper officer that there were no funds to pay it, on which he protested the same for non-payment; and on the next day, the 5th of February, he delivered to Cookendorfer, the plaintiff in error, the following notice, in writing:

“WASHINGTON, February 5, 1840.

“SIR: A note, drawn by E. T. Arguelles, dated 17th May, 1839, for three hundred dollars, payable 1-4 February, 1840, due, and by you indorsed, and for which you are accountable to the president and directors of the Bank of Washington, has been this day protested for non-payment.”

And the witness stated, “that he made the demand and gave the notice according to his usual practice,” and “that said practice conformed, as far as he knows and believes, to the practice of the other notaries in the city of Washington.” And other evidence was given conducing to show that the usual practice in such cases was, “when a notice was to be sent abroad, to put it into the postoffice, and date it on the third or last day of grace; but when the notice was to be delivered in the city of Washington, a latitude was allowed to the notary, either to deliver the notice on the third or last day of grace, or the day after the last day, and in all cases to date the notice on the day of its delivery; and the usage is to extend the protest on the day on which the notice is given, as in this case, stating the demand to have been made on the last day of grace, and the protest to be dated the same day on which the notice is dated.”

§ 998. Notary competent to testify as to presentment of note.

It is insisted that the notary, by reason of his interest in this suit, is an incompetent witness. In the case of Smedes v. Utica Bank, 20 Johns., 372, it was held that a bank which receives a promissory note for collection, to charge the indorser, by a regular notice, is liable for neglect; but this is not the case where the bank delivers the note to a notary, who is a sworn public officer, and whose duty it is to make the demand and give the notice. The same doctrine is laid down in 3 Cowen, 662. From this, it is argued that the notary is liable directly to the holder of the paper for neglect, as a public officer, and not to the bank, as its private agent. That in the latter case, he would not be liable to the holder of the paper, but might be called on to indemnify the bank, which had suffered on account of his laches. A notary is a competent witness, on the same ground that other agents are admissible. They are always responsible to their principals for gross negligence, and yet, from the necessity of the case, they are competent witnesses to prove what they have done in the name of their principals. It appears that the witness, who generally acted as notary for the Bank of Washington, had given a bond, with security in the sum of $10,000, for the faithful performance of his duty as notary public, in the business of the bank committed to him. But this, it would seem, does not render him incompetent. "The cashier or teller of a bank is a competent witness for the bank, to charge the defendant on a promissory note, or for money lent or overpaid, or obtained from the officer without the security which he should have received, and even though the officer has given bond to the bank for his official conduct." 1 Greenl. Ev., § 416; Franklin Bank v. Freeman, 16 Pick., 535; United States Bank v. Stearns, 15 Wend., 314. It is further insisted that if the notary was competent to state his own acts, he could not prove the usage under which he acted. He stated that, in making the protest and giving notice, he pursued "his usual practice," "and, so far as he knew, the practice of the other notaries in the city." Now, it would be an exceedingly technical rule, which would permit a notary to say what he had done in a particular case, but prohibit him from stating that he acted in such case according to his usual practice. And this was all the witness did say; for, although he spoke of his belief as to the practice of other notaries in the city, he does not state that he had a knowledge of their practice.

§ 999. When demand, protest and notice must be made; usage.

The instruction prayed by the defendant's counsel, and the refusal of which is the second ground of error assigned, was "that the said evidence was not sufficient, if believed to be true, to show that payment of said note had been duly demanded and refused, and that due notice of such dishonor had been given to defendant, so as to bind him." In the case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 582 (§§ 754-759, supra), a suit was brought against the indorser of a note which had been negotiated in the Bank of Columbia. Payment was demanded, and the note protested on the fourth day after that mentioned in the note as the day on which it became payable. This was proved to be the usage of the bank, and this court held the demand was made at the proper time. In Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 431 (§§ 958-963, supra), this court held that, "when a note is made payable or negotiable at a bank, whose invariable usage it is to demand payment and give notice on the fourth day of grace, the parties are bound by that usage, whether they have a personal knowledge of it or not." In the Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet., 25 (§§ 760-768, supra), this court sanctioned the usage to make the demand of payment of a note, which was left in the bank for collection, on the day after the last day of grace, placing such notes, in this respect, on the same footing as notes discounted by the bank. And that such was the usage in 1817, when payment on the note or bill in question was demanded, was proved in that case. But it was also proved, as appears from the record, that the usage was changed in 1818, by all the banks of Washington and Georgetown, "so as to conform to the general commercial usage of demanding payment on the last day of grace." This referred to notes or bills sent to the banks for collection, and, of course, embraces all notes not negotiated in bank. Where a usage is sanctioned by judicial decisions, it becomes the law of the place, and no further proof is necessary to establish it; and it is said that no evidence is admissible to controvert the fact, as laid down by the court. Edie v. East India Co., 2 Burr., 1221. Now, if the usage, as sanctioned in the cases above cited, governs this case, it is clear that such diligence has not been used as to charge the indorser. For, under that usage, the demand should have been made on the day after the third day of grace, when it was in fact made on the third day of grace. This objection is met by the defendant in error by the proof of the usage as stated, which he insists governs all notes not discounted by the banks of the district. The note in question was not discounted by the Bank of Washington, it being merely left there for collection. But it is insisted that this usage cannot be shown to overthrow that which has been sanctioned by judicial decisions. A local usage may be changed in the same mode by which it was established. But parol evidence is not admissible to show that the usage was different, at the time, from what the courts have solemnly adjudged it to be. The law merchant is founded upon custom, and every modification of it, by local usage, shows that, like other laws, it may be changed.

§ 1000. Demand and protest on the last day of grace, and notice on the following day, come strictly within the law merchant.

The usage proved in this case, except in Bank of Washington v. Triplett, and that is explained by the evidence cited, does not conflict with that decided by this court, if the latter be limited to notes discounted by the banks, and the former applies to all other notes payable in the District. In other words, that the law merchant should be modified by the usage only as to demand and notice on notes discounted by the banks. And it would seem, from the decisions above cited, the usage to demand payment the day after the third day of grace had its origin with the banks, and has not been extended, since 1818, to paper not discounted by them. On all other paper, a demand is made on the third day of grace, and the "usage is to extend the protest on the day on which the notice is given, stating the demand to have been made on the last day of grace, and the protest to be dated the same day on which the notice is dated." Now, a demand and protest on the last day of grace, and a notice on the following day, come strictly within the law merchant. And this was the diligence used in the present case, except the formal date of the protest on the day of the notice. No confusion can therefore arise from this general commercial usage, as it conforms to the established law. No inconvenience has arisen, it is supposed, from the bank usage in the District, which has been so long and so firmly established.

No defects in the declaration are perceived, and none have been pointed out to us, which are not cured by the verdict. Upon the whole, we affirm the judgment of the circuit court, with costs.

LAMBERT v. GHISELIN.

CERTIFICATE OF DIVISION from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Maryland.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Plaintiff, the holder of a bill of exchange, desiring to notify a non-resident indorser of its non-payment, inquired of the captain of a vessel that traded between the town where the holder lived and the place where the indorser was supposed to be, as to where the indorser lived. The captain replied "Nottingham"—that he resided at Nottingham and a post-office was kept there. It was shown that the captain and his family had resided in that place for many years; that he, if anybody, was likely to know who lived there; but it turned out that he was mistaken, the indorser having removed from Nottingham to Annapolis, and then to West River. The notice was sent to the indorser, directed to Nottingham postoffice, and failed to reach him. Subsequently the holder was informed of the indorser's actual residence, but did not send a second notice there.

§ 1001. Due diligence a question of law, when.

Opinion by TANEY, C. J.

The facts upon which the question certified has arisen are not disputed. The sufficiency of the notice is therefore a question of law. And it is of the first importance to the commercial community that the rules which regulate the rights and liabilities of parties to negotiable instruments in courts of justice should be plain and certain, and conform to the established usages of trade. Two objections have been taken to the sufficiency of the notice in this case.

1. That due diligence was not used by the holder to ascertain the residence of the indorser before the notice was sent to Nottingham. And 2. If reasonable diligence was used at that time, yet the information he afterwards received in Baltimore imposed on him the obligation of giving a further notice to the defendant himself, or of sending it by mail to his nearest and usual postoffice.

§ 1002. What is due diligence in ascertaining the address of an indorser.

As regards the first question, the court is of opinion that due diligence was used before the notice was sent to Nottingham. The case shows that there was very little, if any, trade between Alexandria and Nottingham at the time of this transaction, and but few persons, therefore, in Alexandria, would be likely to know whether the defendant did or did not reside in Nottingham. The bill of exchange was not dated at any particular place, and the acceptors resided in Baltimore. The defendant was not engaged in trade, but was a physician residing in the country, and it does not appear that he was in the practice of visiting Alexandria, or of having any business transactions there. And the proof is that Travers, of whom the holder inquired, from the nature of the trade in which he had been many years engaged, first to Nottingham, and afterwards to Baltimore, was as likely as any other person in Alexandria to give the information which the plaintiffs were seeking to obtain, if not more so. The answer he received was direct and positive, both as to the knowledge of Travers and the residence of the indorser, and he had a right to rely upon it. And although Travers was mistaken, and the notice was not sent to the nearest or usual postoffice of the defendant, yet the plaintiffs used all the diligence which the law requires, and had sufficient reason to believe that the notice would be received. The liability of the indorser was therefore fixed. The case of Harris v. Robinson, 4 How., 345 (§§ 980-982, supra), is conclusive on this point.

The second objection taken in the argument has not been so directly settled by judicial decision on the point, but is, we think, equally clear upon established principles. We have already said that the liability of the indorser was fixed by the notice sent to Nottingham. The plaintiffs had acquired a right of action against him by this notice, and might have brought their suit the next day. Could that right be divested by the information which was subsequently given to them? We think not, and that all of the cases in relation to this subject imply the contrary. The books are full of cases where mistakes of this kind have been committed and suits afterwards brought when the residence of the party was discovered. Yet it does not seem to have been supposed in any of them that a second notice was necessary, nor are we aware that such a point has ever been raised. Yet, if a notice thus given, after diligent inquiry, is not equivalent to actual notice, knowledge subsequently obtained would be a defense to the action, even if the holder had brought suit before he learned what was the nearest or usual postoffice of the defendant. The case of Firth v. Thrush, 8 Barn. & Cress., 387, which was much relied on in the argument, depended upon different principles. In that case the holder knew that notice had not been given to the indorser. He had been engaged in making inquiries for his residence without being able to obtain any information on which he might have acted. And the question there was not whether a second notice should be given, but whether due diligence was used in sending the first. The rule contended for by the defendant would produce much uncertainty and difficulty in transactions of this kind. For if a second notice must be given, it is to be required in all cases where there has been an error in the information as to the defendant's postoffice? Certainly the practice of the courts has been otherwise. And if it is not to be required in all cases it would be impossible to fix any certain limits as to time or circumstances. The subsequent information might come to him casually, when his mind was occupied with other engagements; he might not confide in it as much as in that which he had before received; it might come to him in a few days, or months might elapse before he obtained it. The rule would be loose and uncertain in its application and constantly lead to litigation where the residence of the indorser was unknown or an error committed as to his usual postoffice. It would also be contrary, the court think, to the usages of commerce and to the uniform practice in courts of justice. In the case of Harris v. Robinson, before referred to, no second notice was given, nor did the court intimate that any was necessary.

§ 1004. The law does not require actual notice, but only reasonable diligence.

The law does not require actual notice. It requires reasonable diligence only, and reasonable efforts, made in good faith, to give it. And if sufficient inquiries have been made and information received upon which the holder has a right to rely, a mistake as to the nearest postoffice or usual postoffice does not deprive him of his remedy. He has done all that the law requires, and the notice thus sent fixes the liability of the indorser as effectually as if he had actually received it. This, we think, is the true rule, and the only one that can give certainty and security in transactions in commercial paper. We shall, therefore, certify that reasonable diligence was used by the plaintiffs to give the defendant notice of the dishonor of the bill.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. CORCORAN.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WASHINGTON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes up by writ of error from the circuit court of the District of Columbia and county of Washington. The suit was brought by the plaintiffs in error against the defendant, as the indorser of a promissory note of Daniel Reintzel for $3,700, payable sixty days after date, and dated the 6th of May, 1819. The only question in the cause turns upon the sufficiency of the notice to the defendant, the circumstances attending which appear in a bill of exceptions taken by the plaintiffs to the opinion of the court. From this it appears that the plaintiffs gave in evidence a letter from the defendant to the cashier of the Bank of Columbia, where this note was discounted, bearing date the 8th of May, 1822, in which the writer, after mentioning that he had been applied to on the subject of Reintzel's notes, says: "I have no hesitation in saying that I will not take any advantage of the limitation act for my indorsement on the note of $3,700, dated 6th of May, 1819, and the note of $400, dated 27th May, 1819; the other note I have no knowledge of, and will call at the bank to-morrow for some explanation of it." These notes having been transferred to the Bank of the United States, the cashier of that bank, on the 14th of December, 1824, sent to the defendant a paper for the signature of himself and Reintzel, containing a general authority to some attorney to docket suits against them at the next ensuing term of the court, in the names of the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States, for the use of that bank, and of the United States, on three notes of Daniel Reintzel, two of $400 each and one of $3,700, all due in 1819. On the back of this note was indorsed the following address, signed by the defendant, viz.: "Dear Sir: If Mr. Reintzel should not be able to satisfy the bank before the court, and they determine to bring suit, I will instruct and authorize Robert Dunlap to docket the case for me. December 16, 1824."

The plaintiffs proved, by the notary who made the protest of this note, who produced at the trial his notarial book in which he recorded all his protests, and in which he had entered the protest of the note in question, and the demand and notice; that the said demand and notice were made and entered in the said book; and that, although he had no recollection in relation to these, yet he believed the demand and the notice thereof were made as stated in his said book. He further stated that, at the time of the said demand and notice, the defendant lived in a house in Georgetown, except the lower front room thereof, which was occupied separately, as a store, by James Corcoran, his son; that there was a separate entrance to the dwelling part of the house occupied by the defendant, through an alley or passage apart from the store, which led to the upper rooms and back building and yard of the house; and that he believed the notice was left by him at the said store, because he thought that he had frequently notices to give to the defendant, and was in the habit of leaving them at the store, and never was in the dwelling part of the house occupied by the defendant, nor in the passage or alley leading to it. It was further proved that James Corcoran, who occupied the store at the time spoken of, had a family, and a dwelling-house apart from his store; and that the defendant was then postmaster of Georgetown, and kept the postoffice in another part of the town, where he commonly transacted his private business, as well as that of his office, and had no concern in his son's store, but that he was often at the door, and about the door of the store; that Thomas, another son of the defendant, was concerned with his brother in the store, and was an active partner, attending in the store to the business thereof; but that he was a single man, and lived with the defendant in the house aforesaid until February, 1819, after which he ceased to live in his father's family, but continued his concern and attention in the store.

It was further proved, by the before-mentioned James Corcoran, that, until the defendant took charge of the postoffice, which was in the year 1818, written communications and notices for the defendant were sometimes left at the before-mentioned store, or at the dwelling part of the house; that the witness sometimes directed the persons bringing such notices to take them into the house, and sometimes he took them at the store, and then, unless when he forgot to do so, as he sometimes did, he delivered them to the defendant; that, after his father took the postoffice, the witness, if such notices or communications had been left at his store in the presence of a witness, would have directed the bearer of them to take them to the postoffice, or, if he were going there, would have taken them himself; and that, if he had done so, he would, unless he forgot it, have delivered them to the defendant, but he had no recollection of any such fact having occurred; that when the defendant took charge of the postoffice, that became the place where his notices, communications, etc., were usually left, and where he transacted his business, both private and official, as postmaster and magistrate. The witness had no recollection of ever having seen or known of any notices being left at his store of the protest of the notes now in suit; that the store never was, before or after the defendant took the postoffice, his place of business, or the place appointed for the delivery of notices or other communications for the defendant.

After the above evidence was given, the defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury that, if they found from the evidence that the said notices were left at the store of James Corcoran, occupied by him separately from the dwelling part of the house occupied by the defendant, as stated in the evidence, the notice was not sufficient to charge the defendant in this action, and that the jury, on the said evidence, ought to find for the defendant on the first issue, which instruction the court gave. The plaintiffs then prayed the court to instruct the jury that, if they find from the evidence that, notwithstanding the notices were left at the room occupied as a store by James Corcoran, yet that the said store was the place where notices for the defendant were generally left, and that the notices in regard to these notes were duly received by the defendant, then their being so left at the said store does not defeat the plaintiffs' right to recover, provided the defendant received the said notices in due time; and that their said papers read in evidence by the plaintiffs, and signed and given to them by the defendant, as above stated, are competent evidence from which the jury may infer that the defendant did duly receive such notices. This instruction the court refused to give; to which refusal, as also to the giving of the instruction prayed by the defendant's counsel, the exception was taken by the counsel for the plaintiffs.

The only question which the case presents is, whether such notice was given of the non-payment of the note on which this suit was brought, as the law requires to charge an indorser. It is not pretended that it was given to the defendant personally, either verbally or in writing, or that a written notice was left at his dwelling-house or place of business, or that the holders of the note were prevented from giving the notice at any time by the absence or fault of the defendant. His place of residence, and the way by which access to it was to be gained, was known to the notary; and it is quite improbable that he was ignorant of the place at which he transacted both his private and public business.

The inquiry is then narrowed down to the sufficiency of a notice left at the store of James Corcoran, a son of the defendant, with which the defendant had no concern, and which was not his place of business. The store of the son was as distinct and separate from the dwelling of the father as if they had been under different roofs. The former was entered from the street, the latter from an alley or passage; and it does not appear that there was any inside communication between the two. Overlooking for the present the circumstance that the notary had been in the habit of leaving notices for the defendant at the store, it must be admitted that the service of the notice in question at the store was no more a compliance with the requisition of law than if it had been delivered to the son in the street or elsewhere, or left at his dwelling-house. Is the case then altered by the circumstance just mentioned? We think not. It seems from the evidence that the store never was, at any period, the place appointed for the delivery of notices or other communications to the defendant. But if it had been, the note in question came to maturity some time in the month of July, 1819, and the proof was that the defendant took charge of the postoffice some time in the year 1818; after which, that became the place at which notices and other communications to him were usually left, and where he transacted both his private and public business. Were it to be admitted that the service of a notice at a place not appointed by the defendant as the one at which notices to him were to be delivered, would be sufficient in law to charge him, upon the ground that other notices had been previously left at the same place, it would surely be too extravagant to contend that a service at the same place would be legal, after another place had been appointed for that purpose, and where they had, in point of fact, been usually left.

It is unnecessary to pursue this inquiry further, because although the sufficiency of the service of the notice generally was insisted upon by the counsel for the plaintiff in error in argument, yet the instruction asked for by the plaintiff in the court below placed its validity not merely upon the circumstance that the store was the place where notices for the defendant were generally left, but upon the additional and stronger one, that the notice in this case was duly received by the defendant. Now it must be admitted that if the hypothesis that the notice in this case, though left at an improper place, was nevertheless in point of fact received in due time by the defendant, were proved, or could from the evidence in the cause be properly presumed by the jury, it was sufficient in point of law to charge him. In the case of Ireland v. Kip, 10 Johns., 490, 11 Johns., 231, it was decided that admitting a service of notice at the house in Frankfort street, where the defendant had directed his letters to be left by the letter-carriers, would have been good and equivalent to service at his dwelling or counting house; still, the notice, though improperly put into the postoffice, would be sufficient, if it were accompanied by proof that it had actually been delivered at the dwelling-house of the indorser, or at the house in Frankfort street. But in the present case there was not a scintilla of direct or positive proof that the notice in question ever reached the person, the dwelling-house, or place of business of the defendant, and the court was called upon by the plaintiffs' counsel to instruct the jury that the papers which they had given in evidence were competent evidence from which the jury might infer that the defendant did duly receive the said notice. Was the court wrong in refusing to give this instruction?

§ 1007. Evidence of actual receipt of notice must be clear and certain.

Presumptions from evidence given in a cause of the existence of particular facts are in many if not in all cases mixed questions of law and fact. If the evidence be irrelevant to the fact insisted upon, or be such as cannot fairly warrant a jury in presuming it, the court is so far from being bound to instruct them that they are at liberty to presume it, that they would err in giving such instruction. For why give it, when it is manifest that, if the jury should find their verdict upon the fact so deduced, it would be the duty of the court to set it aside, and to direct a retrial of the cause? Let us now see what were the papers which the plaintiffs had given in evidence, which the court were called upon to declare to the jury were competent evidence from which the jury might make the inference insisted upon. The first is the letter of the defendant, dated the 8th of May, 1822, and addressed to the cashier of the Bank of Columbia, in which he declares that he will not take any advantage of the limitation act for his indorsement on this and another note; the blank authority sent to the defendant by the cashier of the Bank of the United States, on the 14th of December, 1824, for the signatures of the defendant and of the maker of the notes, purporting to empower some attorney to docket suits against them on these notes, with a declaration indorsed thereon by the defendant, that if the maker of the notes should not be able to satisfy the bank before court, and they should determine to bring suit, he would instruct a particular person to docket the case for him. Let it be admitted that these papers bound the defendant to abstain from making a particular defense, to which the law entitled him, and to cause the action intended to be commenced against him to be docketed, so as not to delay the plaintiffs, could the jury from thence infer with any legal propriety, either that the necessity of proving notice of the non-payment of the notes would be dispensed with, or the fact that the notice left at the store of James Corcoran was received by the defendant at any time, much less in due time?

If this was a question of inference fit to be submitted to the discretion of the jury, it seems to the court that the rules respecting this subject, which have been laid down with so much care, would no longer be fixed and certain, but would change with the varying conclusions which a jury might draw of the fact from evidence, however slight, given to prove it. What, for example, does the rule that notice must in certain cases be served personally upon the indorser, or be left at his dwelling-house or place of business, signify, if a jury may from any evidence, however remote from the fact, presume that the notice, though left at any other place, may have found its way to the hands of the person whom it was intended to charge? It was insisted by the counsel for the plaintiffs that the evidence above noticed, and alone relied upon in the instruction asked for to warrant the inference, was strengthened by the circumstance of the connection between the defendant and the owner of the store where the notices for the former were sometimes left. But if this circumstance stood alone in the case, and a notice delivered to the son, who was not a member of the father's family, would not be a legal notice, nor competent to warrant a presumption that it had reached the father, which it unquestionably would not, the question cannot be affected by its being thrown in as a make-weight with other circumstances in themselves insufficient to justify the conclusion. In the case of Ireland v. Kip, the circumstances to induce a presumption that the notice reached the defendant were certainly as strong as they could well be. The letter-carrier was directed to leave all letters for the defendant at a certain house in Frankfort street. The carrier called at the postoffice three or four times every day, and took out and delivered all letters left there, and the defendant usually sent or called every day at that house for his letters. Upon the second trial of this cause, the plaintiffs insisted, upon the above evidence, that the jury had a right to presume that the notice in question had been duly received by the defendant. But the chief justice who tried the cause, instead of leaving it to the jury to make this presumption, overruled the whole of the evidence offered by the plaintiffs, and directed a non-suit. When the case came before the supreme court, it was there stated by the judge who delivered the opinion, that it would be extremely embarrassing to suffer the rule to fluctuate, by making exceptions which would lead to uncertainty, and that it was of the utmost importance in mercantile transactions to have a certain and stable rule in relation to notices, in which sentiments this court entirely concur. That court finally decided that, as it did not appear that the notice was left at the defendant's place of business in Frankfort street, and it did appear that he resided in the city, the non-suit was correct. If this case be law, as to which we are not now called upon to give an opinion, it is in point upon the very question now under consideration. If the court below then committed no error in refusing to give the instructions asked for by the plaintiffs' counsel, they were right in giving that which was prayed for by the defendant's counsel, which merely affirmed that the notice left at the store of James Corcoran, occupied by him separately from the dwelling part of the house occupied by the defendant, if the facts were so found by the jury, was not sufficient to charge the defendant, and that, on the said evidence, they ought to find for the defendant on the first issue.

It is the opinion of this court that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed, with costs.

WILLIAMS v. BANK OF UNITED STATES.

(2 Peters, 96-106. 1829.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WASHINGTON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the circuit court of Ohio by the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States against J. Embree, the maker, and D. Embree and M. T. Williams, the indorsers of two several promissory notes. The only count in the declaration is for money lent and advanced by the plaintiffs to the defendants. Upon the plea of the general issue the case at the trial was, by consent of the parties, submitted to the court; and the above notes were given in evidence by the plaintiffs in support of the action. The court gave judgment against the defendants, and ordered it to be certified in pursuance to the statute of Ohio, that it appeared to the satisfaction of the court that J. Embree had signed the notes on which the suit was brought as principal, and D. Embree and M. T. Williams as sureties. At the trial of the cause thus submitted to the court, the plaintiffs having proved the demand and the handwriting of the indorsers of the notes, offered the following evidence of the notice to the defendant Williams, namely, "that the notary public, after the protest of the notes and the expiration of the usual days of grace, called at the house of the defendant Williams, who resided in the city of Cincinnati, which he found shut up, and the door locked, and on inquiry of the nearest resident he was informed that the said Williams and family had left town on a visit, whether for a day, week or month he did not know, nor did he inquire. He made use of no further diligence to ascertain where Mr. Williams had gone, or whether he had left any person in town to attend to his business. The witness left a notice at the house of a person adjoining, with a request to hand it to the defendant when he should return." The court being of opinion that this evidence was conclusive of legal notice to charge Williams, his counsel took a bill of exceptions, and the cause is now for judgment before this court upon a writ of error.

§ 1008, General rule as to notice.

The only question which this bill of exception presents is, whether due diligence was used by the defendants in error to give notice to the indorser of the non-payment of these notes by the maker of them? The general rule of law applicable to the subject has long been settled, that to enable the holder of a bill of exchange or promissory note to charge the indorser, it is incumbent on him to prove that timely notice of the dishonor of the bill or of the non-payment of the note was given to the indorser, or, if this could not be done, he must excuse the omission by showing that due diligence had been used to give such notice.

§ 1009. Notice where parties reside in same place.

If the parties reside in the same city or town, the indorser must be personally noticed of the dishonor of the bill or note, either verbally or in writing, or a written notice must be left at his dwelling-house or place of business. Either mode is sufficient, but one or the other must be observed unless it is prevented by the act of the party entitled to the notice.

§ 1010. Notice when indorser leaves town.

In the case now under consideration the banking house of the defendants in error and the dwelling-house of the plaintiff were located in the same city. The notary called at the plaintiff's house, which he found shut up and the door locked. Upon inquiry of the nearest resident he was informed that the defendant, with his family, had left town on a visit, but for how long a period was unknown to this person; no further attempt was made to ascertain where the plaintiff in error was gone, or whether he left any person in town to attend to his business. The question to be decided is, whether, under these circumstances, the defendants are excused for not having given the notice which the law requires? In the case of Goldsmith v. Bland, Bayley on Bills, 224, note, it was decided that it was sufficient to send a verbal notice to the defendant's counting-house, and if no person be there in the ordinary hours of business to receive it, it is not necessary to leave or send a written one. The principle of this decision is, that the counting-house of the defendant is the place in which the holder was entitled, during the regular hours of business, to look for the person for whom the notice was intended or for some person authorized by him to receive it, and that the omission to give it was occasioned, not by the want of due diligence in the holder, but by the fault of the party who claimed a right to receive it. The principle here stated is not peculiar to this class of contracts. If a party to a contract who is entitled to the benefit of a condition, upon the performance of which his responsibility is to arise, dispense with, or by any act of his own prevent, the performance, the opposite party is excused from proving a strict compliance with the condition. Thus, if the precedent act is to be performed at a certain time or place, and a strict performance of it is prevented by the absence of the party who has a right to claim it, the law will not permit him set up the non-performance of the condition as a bar to the responsibility which his part of the contract had imposed upon him.

The application of this general principle of law to the subject before us may be illustrated by other cases than the one immediately under consideration. The holder of a bill or promissory note, in order to entitle himself to call upon the drawer or indorser, must give notice of its dishonor to the party whom he means to charge. But if, when the notice should be given, the party entitled to it be absent from the state, and has left no known agent to receive it; if he abscond, or has no place of residence which reasonable diligence used by the holder can enable him to discover, the law dispenses with the necessity of giving regular notice. So where the parties, as in this case, reside in the same city or town, the notice should be given at the dwelling-house or place of business of the party entitled to claim it, and the duty of the holder does not require of him to give the notice at any other place. If the giving of the notice at either of these places be prevented by the act of the party entitled to receive it, the performance of the condition is excused. In this case, the notary called at the dwelling-house of the indorser, at the regular time and at a seasonable hour, for aught that appears, to serve the notice, and found the house shut up, the doors locked, and the family absent from town upon a visit of unknown duration to the agent of the bank or to his informer. What was he to do? He was not bound to call a second time, nor was he under any obligation to leave a written notice, even if he could have found an entrance into the house. But it is insisted that the defendants in error were bound, under the circumstances of this case, to give notice to the plaintiff through the channel of the postoffice; and the case of Ogden v. Cowley, 2 Johns., 274, is relied upon in support of this position. In that case, the notary called at the houses of the indorser and of his deceased partner, for the purpose of giving them notice of the non-payment of the note, but found their house locked up, and, on inquiring at the next door, was told they were gone out of town. On the same day, the notary put a letter into the postoffice in the city of New York, addressed to the defendant and his partner, informing them of the non-payment of the note, and that they were looked to for payment. It appeared that at that time the yellow fever prevailed in the city. The court decided that all proper steps were taken to communicate the requisite notice to the indorser, and that the notice was, of course, sufficient. It may be remarked upon this case, that the absence of the indorsers from their houses was probably the consequence of a temporary removal from the city, on account of the prevailing sickness, and that the case does not inform us whether the place to which they had removed was known to the notary. We are not prepared to say that in such a case the parties entitled to notice were bound to be at their dwelling-houses, or to have any person there at the time the notary called to receive notice, and, consequently, that their absence and the closing of their houses ought to have excused the holder from taking other steps to communicate notice to them. But laying these circumstances out of the case, the court decided no more than that the steps taken to give notice were sufficient, in point of law, for that purpose; and it is not to be doubted but that they were so. They do not decide that, in a case freed from the circumstances before noticed, it was necessary that notice to the indorsers should have been given through the postoffice.

In the case of Crosse v. Smith, 1 Maule & S., 545, the cashier called at the counting-house of the drawer, for the purpose of giving him notice of the dishonor of the bill. He found the outward door open, but the inner locked. The cashier knocked, and made noise enough to have been heard, if anybody had been within. After waiting a few minutes and no person appearing, he left the house, and took no further legal step to give the notice. It was insisted, in opposition to the sufficiency of the notice, that a notice in writing, left at the counting-house, or put into the postoffice, was necessary. The answer given by the court was, that the law did not require either mode to be pursued. "Putting a letter in the post," says Lord Ellenborough, "is only one mode of giving notice; but where both parties are residing in the same post-town, sending a clerk is a more regular and less exceptionable mode." The decision in this case, as to the sufficiency of the notice, was the same as that given in the case of Goldsmith v. Bland, before referred to. The case of Ireland v. Kip, 10 Johns., 490, and 11 Johns., 231, was much pressed upon the court in the argument of the present cause by the counsel for the plaintiff in error. We have examined that case with great attention and respect, but have not been able to view it in the same light as it seemed to have struck the learned counsel. The place of residence of the defendant, the indorser, was three and a half miles from the postoffice, within the limits of the city of New York, but without the compact part of the city, and without the district of any letter-carrier. The case does not state that the indorser had any counting-house, or place of business in the city, at which the notice could have been left. The only notice given to the defendant was a written one, put into the postoffice in the city of New York, directed to the defendant, and stating that the note had not been paid. The place of the defendant's residence was known to the clerk of the notary, who put the written notice to the defendant into the postoffice. The only question decided by the court was that, under the circumstances of that case, the holder of the note was bound to give personal notice to the defendant, or to see that the notice reached his dwelling-house; and that merely putting the notice into the postoffice was not sufficient. Upon a second trial of the cause it appeared in evidence that the defendant had given directions to the letter carriers of the postoffice, to leave all letters that came to the postoffice for him at a house in Frankfort street, in the city of New York; that the letter carriers called at the postoffice three or four times every day, and took out and delivered all letters left there; and that the defendant usually called or sent every day for his letters to the house in Frankfort street. The learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court stated that, admitting a service of the notice at the house in Frankfort street would have been good and equivalent to a service at the defendant's dwelling or counting house, still the delivery of the notice at the postoffice, unaccompanied with proof that it was actually delivered at the house, was not notice. He adds that "the invariable rule with us is, that when the parties reside in the same city or place, notice of the dishonor of bills or notes must be personal, or something tantamount, such as leaving it at the dwelling-house or place of business of the party, if absent." Now it is apparent that the question which arises in the case under consideration was not and could not be decided in the case just referred to. The objection to the notice in the latter case was, that it ought to have been given at the dwelling-house of the defendant, and could not be given through the postoffice, unless it also appeared that the notice so given reached the dwelling-house, or the house in Frankfort street. No attempt was made to give the notice in the former mode, as was done in this case; and the latter mode, so far from being considered as tantamount to the former, or as being necessary in order to excuse the want of personal notice, is declared throughout to be insufficient without further proof.

The opinion of this court is, that the defendants in error were, under the circumstances of this case, excused from taking any other steps than they did, to give notice to the plaintiff of the non-payment of these notes; and that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed, with costs.

[The counsel for the plaintiff in error stated another point, which he admitted had been settled by this court, in the case of Fullerton v. Bank of United States, 1 Pet., 612 (§§ 1200-1204, infra); but requested permission to reargue the point in case the court should decide the first point against him. I am directed by the court to say that the case referred to was well considered by the court; that we are entirely satisfied with the decision made in it, and see no cause to call for a reargument of the principle there decided.]

UNITED STATES v. BARKER.

(Circuit Court for New York: 2 Paine, 340-348. —.)

Opinion by THOMPSON, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes up by writ of error to the district court for the southern district of New York, and the only question raised and argued was, whether due notice of the non-acceptance of the bill in question was given to the defendant, the drawer. The letter of the secretary of the treasury addressed to Flewelling, inclosing the protest for non-acceptance, with directions to give notice thereof to the drawer and indorsers, was dated on the 7th of December, 1814, at the city of Washington; and if put into the mail of the next day (the 8th), would, according to the course of the mail, arrive here on the 10th. And for the purpose of the question now before the court, it must be taken for granted that the letter containing the protest, and directing notice to be given to the drawer and indorsers, was received by Flewelling on the 10th of December, between eleven and twelve o'clock. But the notice of the dishonor of the bill was not given until the 12th. I do not understand any objection to have been made to the regularity of the notice of non-payment, nor is it necessary to notice that point here. This case is not distinguishable in any respect as to facts from that of The United States v. Barker, decided at the last term of the supreme court (12 Wheat., 559). And the law of that case must of course apply to and govern this.

§ 1011. The rule that each party has one day after notice to notify the party to whom he looks for payment does not apply to an agent.

A question, however, growing out of those facts, has been made here, which does not seem to have attracted the attention of the counsel or the court, according to the report of that case. It appears that the 10th of December, when the letter of the secretary of treasury was received here by Flewelling, was on Saturday, and that notice was given on Monday (the 12th), and this, it has been argued, was all that the law required of the holder. This question does not appear to have been made in that case on the trial in the court below; and I have no recollection of its having been at all started on the argument in the supreme court. If it had been, the opinion of the court would, doubtless, have been expressed upon it. And it is hardly to be presumed that if this circumstance would have furnished an excuse for the delay in giving notice, it would have escaped the notice of the bar and of the bench. But if this should be considered a new point, undecided by that case, it would not, I think, affect the question; the notice was still too late—it should have been given on Saturday; the letter was received here early enough on that day by the agent, to enable him to have given the notice within the usual business hours, without any extraordinary diligence. Mr. Flewelling could not, in any sense, be considered the holder of this bill, or having any interest in it; he was the mere private agent of the plaintiffs, who must be deemed the holders, and chargeable with all the legal consequences resulting from the negligence of their agents. A notice put into the mail at Washington, directed to the defendant at New York, would have been sufficient, and all that could have been required of the plaintiffs; they were not bound to employ an agent here to serve the notice. And had notice been sent by the mail directly to defendant, it would, doubtless, have been received by him on Saturday. The delay, therefore, in bringing the notice home to the defendant is attributable to the plaintiffs. Although notice by the mail would have been sufficient, the plaintiffs were not bound to adopt that mode, but might cause it to be given by a private hand; but the rule seems to be well settled in England, that when such course is adopted, the holder is bound to see that it reaches the party on the same day that it would have arrived by the post. Chitty, 402, 288 and n.; 6 East, 3.

The rule which we find laid down in the books, that each party has an entire day after that on which he is informed of the dishonor of a bill, to give notice to the party to whom he looks for payment, must be a party to the bill, and who has an interest in it, and cannot apply to an agent employed by such party to give the notice. If Flewelling had been a party to this bill, he might, according to this rule, have had until Monday the 12th to give the notice; but the plaintiffs could not claim a day for their agent to give this notice after it arrived here. Such a rule might lead to great delay and abuse by employing a number of agents in succession to give such notice, if each one was entitled to a day for that purpose. This rule in England seems to have received some modification with respect to bankers employed to collect bills. In Haynes v. Birks, 3 Bos. & Pul., 599, it was said that as soon as a banker is informed of the non-payment of a bill, it becomes his business to acquaint his principal of that circumstance, and that if a bill be returned to a banker, he is bound to give notice to his principal that very day, if he can do so by using ordinary diligence. But by subsequent cases the rule seems now to be otherwise, and a banker is considered a distinct holder, though he is possessed of the bill merely to receive payment for a customer. But it may be inferred from what fell from Lord Ellenborough in one of the cases, that it is the custom of bankers to present the bills as distinct customers, and not as mere agents identified with their customers. 2 Taunt., 388; 15 East, 291. This cannot, however, affect the question in this case, for there is no pretense that Flewelling was, in point of fact, or that he professed to be, anything more than a mere agent, acting for and in the name of the plaintiffs. The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

UNITED STATES BANK v. GODDARD.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 5 Mason, 366-377. 1829.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Pickering's note, payable to Goddard, was indorsed by the latter to the Portsmouth branch of the United States Bank. Being payable at Boston, where Goddard resided, it was forwarded to the Boston branch of the United States Bank for collection. As was expected, Pickering failed to pay it at maturity. Notice of non-payment was sent by the Boston branch, on March 5th, to the Portsmouth branch, which received it on the afternoon of the 6th, the mail having been delayed by a snow storm. On the same day the cashier of the Portsmouth branch wrote Goddard, advising him of non-payment of the note. This notice reached him the 8th. In assumpsit against him on the note, he set up in defense that the notice of non-payment was insufficient by reason of delay. It was shown that Goddard's name was not in the directory, and that his residence was not in fact known to the officers of the Boston branch, although they might have ascertained it by reasonable inquiry.

§ 1012. Relation of branch banks to the parent bank is that of agents and principal.

Opinion by STORY, J.

I lay out of the case all consideration of the fact that the note belonged to the branch bank at Portsmouth, and was remitted to the branch bank at Boston for collection, both these branches being but agents of the Bank of the United States, the real holder of the note. In the first place, it is admitted that the known course of business in each of the branches is, in respect to all notes transmitted from another branch, to deal with them in the same manner as if transmitted by a stranger bank, and to return their notes back, upon their dishonor, to the branch from which they have been received. In the next place, the branches being established by the parent bank for its own particular purposes, their agency may be limited and controlled according to the pleasure of the parent bank. So that the present case does not at all differ from that of a private principal who employs different agents in different cities to transact business, or negotiate and discount, and collect notes there upon his account. No distinction was pointed out at the argument, as growing out of this circumstance, differing the case from the common case of holder and agent, or holder and banker; and none is believed to exist. The case may, therefore, for all the purposes of this suit, be considered as if the Portsmouth branch were the real holder of the note and wholly unconnected with the branch in Boston, and employing the latter as its agent to collect the note when due.

§ 1013. Order in which indorsers and makers should be notified of non-payment.

The question, then, is whether notice of the dishonor ought to have been given by the branch bank at Boston to the defendant, or whether the notice sent by the branch bank at Portsmouth to the defendant was in due time and sufficient in point of law. It is admitted that there is no objection to the notice on account of the delay of its arrival to the defendant until the 8th of March, when it ought regularly to have arrived on the 7th. The snow storm sufficiently accounts for that; and the notice was given as early by the holder as, under the circumstances, it could or ought to be.

§ 1014. Duty of agent in giving notice of dishonor.

The case is narrowed down, then, to the consideration whether by law the defendant was entitled to notice directly from the agent in Boston, which, by due inquiry and diligence, he might have given on the 6th of March; or whether a circuitous notice through the holder was sufficient. The argument of the defendant's counsel is this. The agent is bound to give notice of the dishonor to a prior indorser, who is intended to be charged, if his residence is known to him, or if, upon reasonable inquiry, it can be ascertained, and it is in fact nearer to his own than that of the indorser, and a notice will thereby reach him earlier than from the principal holder. Reasonable diligence is in all cases sufficient in giving notice; but what is such must be judged of by all the circumstances of each case. If the agent may in all cases omit to give notice to the indorser, then, although he resides in the same city with the indorser, and the principal holder resides at a great distance, the indorser would be held, although a circuitous notice from the holder might not reach him for a week or a month, which would be unreasonable. And it is said that there is no case which justifies such a doctrine. If there be no such case, then the question must be considered upon principle. Now it is very clear that if the Boston branch had been the holders of the note, they would, under the circumstances, have been entitled to recover against the defendant, since he received due notice from the prior holders, to whom due notice was sent by them, and to whom, upon payment of the note, the defendant would have been answerable over. It is laid down in Bayley on Bills, 163 (4th ed.), and better authority can scarcely be, that "though a holder or any other party gives no notice but to the person of whom he took the bill, yet if notice is communicated without laches to the prior parties, he may avail himself of such communication, and sue any of such prior parties. It is no objection, in such case, that there was no notice immediately from the plaintiff to the defendant." And this doctrine is fully supported by decided cases. Jameson v. Swinton, 2 Camp., 373; Wilson v. Swabey, 1 Starkie, 34; Stanton v. Blossom, 14 Mass., 116, and Stafford v. Yates, 18 Johns., 327, are in point. The reason seems to be that, as the notice is sufficient to charge the defendant with the payment in favor of the person who gives it, it ought to charge him in favor of all subsequent parties, because he sustains no injury from want of notice. It is, as to him, due notice. If, then, as holders, they might affect the defendant with responsibility by such circuitry of notice, what is the reason why, as agents, they may not give their principal the same right? If there be any, it must be upon the ground that the agent is in all cases bound to give direct notice to the indorser intended to be charged, in the same way, and within the same time, and in the same manner, as his principal ought, if there was no agency, and the bill remained in his hands. Such a proposition has never yet been maintained, as far as I know, by any court of justice. And in the argument it was admitted that if the domicile of the party to whom notice is to be given be unknown to the agent, he is not bound to give any notice. And it has been decided that, when a holder transmits a note for payment to his agent, he is not bound to inform the latter where the prior parties live, so as to enable the agent to give them notice.

§ 1015. Whether an agent to receive payment is bound to give notice to any one but his principal.

But how is it established that in any case an agent to receive payment of a note is bound to give notice to any person, but his principal, of the dishonor? The nature of the transaction does not necessarily imply it. The authority to receive payment may be complete without any incidental authority to give such notice. It is certainly competent for the holder to authorize his agent to do no more than to demand payment, and give him notice of the dishonor. If the agent actually gives notice in due time to the antecedent parties, that may be good in favor of his principal. If the latter requires his agent to give such notice, and he neglects to do it, he may be chargeable with any loss sustained by such neglect. But the question is not what the agent may do, or ought to do, as between himself and his principal, but whether the other parties to be charged upon notice have any right to such notice from him, so as to be discharged by his neglect. As I understand the doctrine of law upon this subject, it is that an agent, upon the dishonor of a note remitted to him to procure payment, is bound to give notice of the dishonor to his principal, and transmit to him the proper evidence of it; but he is not bound to give any notice to other parties on the note. That was manifestly the doctrine of the court in Haynes v. Birks, 3 Bos. & Pull., 599, 601, where a bill had been remitted to bankers, as agents of the holder, to procure payment; and the argument there was that in such a case the bankers, being agents of the holder, the defendant (the indorser) was entitled to the same notice, as if the bill had remained in the plaintiff's hands. But the court overruled the objection, and said that it was the banker's business only to acquaint his principal of the dishonor. The same doctrine was held in Tunno v. Lague, 2 Johns. Cas., 1. That case is very strong, for the defendant, who was sought to be charged, lived in the city of

New York, the bill being drawn by him at Jeremie (N. J.) in favor of the plaintiffs upon a house in New York, and dishonored by the latter. The notice was not sufficient in the opinion of the court, having been given at New York long after the dishonor, if the party giving the notice had been the holder; but being an agent only, it was held that the notice was sufficient, because it was earlier than the defendant would have had it, if the bill had been sent back to the plaintiffs, and notice had been sent directly by them. And the court said, that the duty of the agent extended no farther than to give notice to his principal. The same doctrine is also asserted in Colt v. Noble, 5 Mass., 167. The bill was drawn in New South Wales, in favor of the defendant, and by him indorsed at Madras to the plaintiffs, who sent it to their agent in London, where it was dishonored by the drawees. The defendant resided in Portsmouth, N. H., and the defendant might have sent notice to the defendant at Portsmouth in three months; but he merely transmitted the bill and protests to his principal at Madras, who sent notice from thence to the defendant, who did not receive it until more than a year after the dishonor. The court held the notice sufficient. And Mr. Chief Justice Parsons, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, "A person appointed a factor to cause a bill to be presented is intrusted with no other powers, and it is his duty to notify his principal." It is true that in that case it did not appear that the agent knew the defendant's domicile; but that consideration was not relied on. And the court decided generally, that the holder was not bound to give information of the domicile of the indorser to his agent; nor was the latter bound to give notice to the indorser of the dishonor; and that it made no difference whether the bill was remitted to the factor to procure acceptance, or in payment of a debt due to him. The case would seem, therefore, to travel on all-fours with the present.

§ 1016. To whom notice is to be given by a banker who holds a note for collection.

It appears to me, also, that the cases in which it has been holden that a banker who as agent receives the bill of a customer is only bound to give notice of its dishonor to his customer, in like manner as if he were himself the holder, and his customer were the party next entitled to notice, confirm the doctrine. The legal effect of these cases is, that the customer has the like time to communicate such notice as if he had received it from a holder, and therefore by placing a bill or note in the hands of a banker, the number of persons, from whom notice must pass, is increased by one. So it is laid down in Bayley on Bills, 173 (4th ed.); and the cases of Haynes v. Birks, 3 Bos. & Pull., 599; Scott v. Lifford, 9 East, 347, and Langdale v. Trimmer, 15 East, 291, fully support the position; and it has also been recognized in the recent case of Firth v. Thrush, 8 Barn. & Cress., 387. In all these cases the bankers were agents; and if they were bound to give notice at all, they might have given it a day earlier than it was received from their principals. But the court treated the cases exactly as if the agents were holders, and necessarily repudiated the notion that, either as holders or as agents, they were bound to give notice to any other person than their principal. But it is said that in neither of these cases did it appear that the bankers knew the residence of the parties to be charged by notice; or that the banker's residence was nearer to the parties, than that of the principals. If that be admitted, it is still a sufficient answer, that neither of these facts was treated as material; and the judgment of the court proceeded upon a principle which comprehended all such cases. If the sufficiency of the notice depended upon the fact whether the agent had no knowledge of the residence of the parties, or lived farther from them than his principal, that fact ought to have come from the plaintiff as part of his case; for the onus was upon him to show due notice. I am not satisfied, however, that the case in 3 Bos. & Pull., 599, was not a case where the banker lived nearer to the indorser than to the holder. The latter lived at Knightsbridge, and both of the former lived in London. But it seems to me that there is a far stronger reason for requiring that the banker should give notice where he and the principal live in the same town, or at least that notice in such cases should be given as early as the principal might give it if the note were in his own hands, than where the principal resides in a different town, since the communication between them is so much more easy.

It appears to me that the question now before the court has been closed by authorities; if not by direct adjudication, at least by necessary inference. The doctrine is laid down, without any exception, that the agent is not bound to give notice; and if any exception had existed, it could not for so long a period have been overlooked. But if it were otherwise, and there was no authority in point, my own judgment would be the same. It appears to me that an agent is not bound to give notice to the indorser of the dishonor of any note; and that his agency does not naturally include such a duty. If he contracts with his principal to give such notice, that is a mere private contract between the parties, with which the indorser has nothing to do. It neither enlarges nor limits his rights. It may be inconvenient for him to receive a circuitous notice; but that is not sufficient to change the law. I think it would be far more inconvenient to establish the doctrine now contended for in the defense. All that is required by law is that the holder should give notice to the indorser in a reasonable time after he has knowledge of the dishonor, and that there should be no laches in getting that knowledge, if an agent has been employed. This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the point whether, under all the circumstances, the defendant was entitled to notice, he having received security, originally supposed to be sufficient to meet the payment; as well as some other points suggested in the argument at the bar. Judgment must therefore be entered for the plaintiffs, according to the verdict.

Judgment accordingly.

(Circuit Court for Virginia: 2 Marshall, 20-42. 1823.)

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit is brought to obtain payment of two bills of exchange drawn by the late William Byrd of Virginia on Robert Cary & Co., merchants of London, the one in the year 1774 and the other in 1775. These bills were regularly protested, but the defendant makes several objections to paying them. The first to be considered is, that no notice of their non-payment and protest was given either to William Byrd in his life-time, or to his representatives since his death. The plaintiff contends that this notice was unnecessary, because the drawer had no funds in the hands of the drawee.

§ 1018. How far want of funds in the hands of the drawee will excuse notice of dishonor.

Although this application, in consequence of the state of the fund to which the plaintiff must resort, it consisting of equitable assets, is made to a court of equity, it is admitted to be a law case depending entirely on legal principles. It requires an attentive consideration of the question, how far the want of funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee discharges the holder of a bill of exchange from the necessity of giving notice to the drawer of its dishonor. The rule requiring this notice was for a long time supposed to be general, and Mr. Justice Blackstone in his commentaries lays it down without any exception. The first case in which an exception was admitted is Bikerdike v. Bollman, decided in November, 1786, and reported in 1 Durn. & E., 405; in that case the court stated that if it be proved by the holder that "from the time the bill was drawn till the time it became due the drawee never had any effects of the drawer in his hands," notice to the drawer is not necessary. The reason given is that he had no right to draw, and could not be injured by not receiving notice. An additional observation made by one of the judges is that to draw in such a case "is a fraud in itself." It does not appear from the report of this case, nor is there any reason to believe, that there were any running accounts between the parties; the whole complexion of the case, and the reasons assigned by the judges for their opinions, negative the idea; it is simply the case of a debtor drawing a bill on his creditor without a prospect of its being paid. In such a case notice is declared by the court to be unnecessary. It is remarkable that in this case, although the principle is expressly asserted by both the judges, each declares that the case would be decided in the same way on a different principle.

In Goodall v. Dolly, decided in 1787, 1 Durn. & E., 712, the judgment was against the holder of the bill, for want of notice; but in giving his opinion Mr. Justice Buller recognizes the principle established in Bikerdike v. Bollman. In Rogers v. Stephens, 2 Term R., 713, decided in 1788, the law is said to be settled, that no effects of the drawer in the hands of the drawee excuses the holder from the necessity of giving notice; yet it is remarkable that in this case all three of the judges rely very much on a subsequent assumpsit made by the drawer. In Gale v. Walsh, 5 Term R., 239, decided in 1793, the principle appears to be recognized; but a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted for this cause was discharged, because the fact did not exist in the case.

§ 1019. — the early rule on the subject has been modified. Authorities reviewed.

These are the earliest cases on this point; it has occurred very frequently in subsequent cases, and the principle seems to be firmly established; but as the question has come forward in different forms, and been viewed under different aspects, the principle has been greatly modified, and is no longer laid down in the general terms which were carelessly used on its introduction. It has been found necessary to define its extent with more precision and to state the rule with more accuracy. It was perceived that, in the course of commercial dealing, it would frequently occur that a person might draw a bill with the best reasons for believing that it would be honored, although, in fact, he might have, at the time, no funds in the hands of the drawee; and that all the reasons for requiring notice would apply, in such a case, with the same force as if the bill had been drawn on actual funds. In Legge v. Thorpe, 12 East, 171, Le Blanc and Bayley, Justices, stated the principle laid down in Bikerdike v. Bollman, and afterwards adhered to in these terms. They said, "that the court in that case, looking to the reason for which notice was required to be given, laid down the rule, not generally, that where the drawer had no effects in the hands of the drawee at the time (which perhaps might turn out to be the case upon a future settlement of accounts between them), no notice of dishonor should be given; but that it need not be given where the drawer must have known at the time that he had no effects to answer the bill, and could have no reason to expect that his bill would be honored." In Blackhan v. Doren, 2 Camp., 503, Lord Ellenborough said: "If a man draw upon a house with whom he has no account, he knows that the bill will not be accepted; he can suffer no injury from want of notice of its dishonor, and, therefore, he is not entitled to such notice. But the case is quite otherwise where the drawer has a fluctuating balance in the hands of the drawee." In Walwyn v. St. Quintin, 1 Bos. & Pul., 652, one of the strongest cases in the books in favor of dispensing with notice, Eyre, C. J., said: "But it may be proper to caution bill-holders not to rely on it as a general rule, that, if the drawer has no effects in the acceptor's hands, notice is not necessary. The cases of acceptances on the faith of consignments from the drawer, not come to hands, and the case of acceptances on the ground of fair mercantile agreements, may be stated as exceptions, and there may possibly be many others."

In Brown v. Maffey, 15 East, 216, Lord Ellenborough said: "The doctrines of dispensing with notice of the dishonor of a bill has grown almost entirely out of the case of Bikerdike v. Bollman. That decision dispensed with the notice to the drawer, where he knew beforehand that he had no effects in the hands of the drawee, and had no reason to expect that the bill would be paid when it became due." "But that exception must be taken with some restrictions, which, since I sat here, I have often had occasion to put on it, as where the drawer, though he might not have effects at the time of the drawing of the bill in the drawee's hands, has a running account with him, and there is a fluctuating balance between them, and the drawer has reasonable ground to expect that he shall have effects in the drawee's hands when the bill becomes due. In such cases, I have always held the drawer to be entitled to notice, because he draws the bill upon a reasonable presumption that it will be honored." In Rucker v. Hiller, 16 East, 43, Lord Ellenborough said: "Where the drawer draws his bill in the bona fide expectation of assets in the hands of the drawee to answer it, it would be carrying the case of Bikerdike v. Bollman farther than has ever been done, if he were not at all events entitled to notice of the dishonor. And I know the opinion of my lord chancellor to be, that the doctrine of that case ought not to be pushed farther." "The case is very different where the party knows that he has no right to draw the bill. There are many occasions where a drawee may be justified in refusing from motives of prudence to accept a bill, on which notice ought nevertheless to be given to the drawer; and if we were to extend the exception farther, it would come at last to a general dispensation with notice of the dishonor, in all cases where the drawee had not assets in hand at the very time of presenting the bill; and thus get rid of the general rule requiring notice, than which nothing is more convenient in the commercial world. A bona fide reasonable expectation of assets in the hands of the drawer has been several times held to be sufficient to entitle the drawer to notice of the dishonor, though such expectation may ultimately fail to be realized." And in the same case, Bayley, J., said: "The general rule requires notice of the dishonor to be given in due time to the drawer, and it lay upon the plaintiff to show that he could not possibly be injured by the want of it. It would be somewhat hard to call upon the drawer towards the end of six years after the bill given; and when he objected that he had no notice of the dishonor, to tell him that he had no effects in the drawee's hands at the time when the bill was presented, though they might have come to his hands the very day after, and the drawee might have settled his accounts with the drawer on the presumption that the bill was paid."

The subject was considered by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of French v. Bank of Columbia, reported in the fourth volume of Cranch (4 Cranch, 141, 2 Cond. Rep., 58; §§ 983, 984, supra). In that case it was said "to be the fair construction of the English cases, that a person having a right to draw in consequence of engagements between himself and the drawee, or in consequence of consignments made to the drawee, or from any other cause, ought to be considered as drawing upon funds in the hands of the drawee, and therefore as not coming within the exception to the general rule." When the drawer is continually making consignments to the drawee, and continually drawing on those consignments, his conduct may be essentially affected by knowing that any of his bills have been protested. He may stop in transitu, or may suspend further consignments. It may be as material to his interest to place no more funds in the hands of the drawee, in such a case, as to withdraw the funds previously placed in his hands. Notice may be as important to him in the one case as in the other, and there seems to be the same reason for requiring it.

Supposing the rule to be, that every person having a right to draw, or having reason to believe that his bill will be honored, is entitled to notice, I will proceed to apply the principle to the facts of this case; and in doing it I shall consider the two bills separately. On the 19th of July, 1774, William Byrd drew on Robert Cary & Co., in favor of Edward Brisbane, for the sum of £353 6s. This bill was indorsed by Edward Brisbane to Alexander Spiers, and by him to the company. On the 17th of November, 1774, it was protested for non-payment. The first information that appears to have been given of this protest to Colonel Byrd, or his representatives, was the institution of this suit in 1819. The executor of Byrd resists its payment for want of notice, and the plaintiff alleges that notice was unnecessary, because the drawer had no effects at the time in the hands of the drawee. To support this allegation he relies on several letters written by Robert Cary & Co. to William Byrd, which have been exhibited by the executor on his requisition. The defendant objects to this testimony, that the letters are the mere allegations of Robert Cary & Co., and do not contain a full statement of the correspondence between the parties, or of their accounts; that Colonel Byrd may not have acquiesced in the accounts transmitted with these letters, or in the statements they contain, although, from the loss of papers, the death of parties and the great lapse of time, the papers cannot now be produced.

§ 1020. Rule as to acquiescence in accounts rendered.

The general rule is that a long acquiescence in letters containing accounts is prima facie evidence of an acquiescence in their contents; and there is less reason for excepting this case from the rule, because the letters of Robert Cary & Co., from November, 1773, to October, 1775, do not notice any objection on the part of William Byrd to any of the accounts, which, one of those letters says, were annually transmitted to him. The letter from Robert Cary & Co. to William Byrd, dated the 10th of November, 1773, incloses an account current, showing a balance due Robert Cary & Co. of £616 9s. 1d. This letter gives notice of the completion of a contract for the sale of Byrd's English estate; says the money is to be paid the 5th of April; that they shall immediately afterwards take up the whole of his bills; and says that they have referred Farrell & Jones to him, to determine whether they shall pay a debt of about £800, claimed by Farrell & Jones. The next letter is dated the 13th of May, 1774. It states the receipt of £5,000 on account of the estate which had been sold, and the expectation of receiving the farther sum of £11,500 on the same account. It states the payment of debts to the amount of £5,544 7s. 4d., and gives a list of other debts due from Byrd, to the amount of £11,577. The letter concludes with saying that by Greenland's estimate, the produce of the estate will not exceed £15,500, out of which great charges are to be deducted. From this sketch the letter proceeds, "You will be able to judge how the account may stand, and what bills must be returned." It is observable that, among the debts paid, are several bills of exchange, which had been long protested, one of them as early as February, 1768. This fact shows an understanding by which bills were held up after a protest, in the expectation that they would be paid by the drawee, notwithstanding the protest. In such a case, if no notice be given, the law seems to be that the holder looks to the drawee, not to the drawer, for payment. The next letter, of the 5th of August, 1774, states that there are many bills which must be returned, after paying all the money received on account of the English estate. This letter speaks of a further sum for a half year's rent, accruing before the purchaser took possession, to be received after Michaelmas. This would be £371 4s. 6d. There is, too, a subsequent letter, of the 14th of March, 1775, which mentions a farther receipt of £448 12s. 1d., on account of the English estate. Colonel Byrd appears to have drawn to the full amount of his English estate, so far as Robert Cary & Co. had stated the money to have been received; and if the transactions between the parties had gone no farther, these letters would furnish strong reasons for the opinion that, in July, 1774, he acted at least incautiously in drawing the bill under consideration. But there were transactions between the parties. Colonel Byrd held a large estate in Virginia, and the usage of the considerable planters to ship their tobacco to London merchants, and to draw on their consignments, is of general notoriety. In their letter of the 17th of November, 1774, Robert Cary & Co. say: "We shall, in the disposal of your tobacco, hope to render you a safe and pleasing tale."

In a letter of the 10th of February, 1775, is an account of sales of fifteen hogsheads of tobacco, shipped in a vessel commanded by Captain Powers; and there is also notice taken of a mortgage on the estate sold to Mrs. Otway, for which no claimant had appeared, but for which Mrs. Otway had retained a considerable sum in her hands. The letter says: "We were compelled to settle the conveyance in the manner we did, yet at the same time it no ways precluded you from receiving your part of this other mortgage, if no claimants." The letter shows that Colonel Byrd had written on this subject, and had manifested the expectation of receiving a further sum on this account. The letter mentions the payment of some small orders given by Byrd. It may be considered as probable, from these letters, that Colonel Byrd was not perfectly satisfied with the sums retained on account of charges on the estate, and expected more money from it. A letter of the 20th of June, 1775, states the payment of a draft drawn by Colonel Byrd, in favor of Hornsby, for £75, and their payment for his honor of another draft on Farrell & Jones for the same sum. The last letter is dated 2d of October, 1775. It mentions the payment of several little drafts, as desired by Colonel Byrd, "which are mentioned in an account current inclosed," but the account itself does not appear. It shows a balance, as the letter says, of 16*s.* 11*d.* in favor of Colonel Byrd.

§ 1021. Onus probandi where a bill has been held up a long time without notice of protest.

From this review of the letters in the cause, it is obvious that Colonel Byrd was much pressed for money; that he was sanguine in his calculations of the sums to be yielded by his estate in England; that he drew upon that fund by anticipation, and to an amount greater perhaps than was strictly justifiable. It is also apparent that a considerable part of the money for which the estate sold was retained for incumbrances, some of which were questionable, and there is reason to believe that he questioned them. It is also apparent that there were running transactions between the parties, and that the holders of his bills were in the habit of retaining them and of receiving payment long after protest. That he made shipments of tobacco in the time is unquestionable; but the amount of his shipments is uncertain; his letters are not produced; they would throw much light on this transaction. The letters giving notice of this particular draft might, and probably would, show the idea on which it was drawn and the calculations of the drawee; it might be drawn on actual consignment of tobacco, or it might be drawn on a calculation that something farther might be yielded by those items of the English estate, which the letters show had not finally been adjusted. These calculations may have been erroneous; but if they were made, the bill was not drawn with a knowledge that it would not be honored, and therefore notice of its dishonor was unnecessary. The court will not presume that these calculations were made; the court will not presume that the letter of advice which usually accompanies a bill of exchange did show that the drawer calculated on his bills being honored; but the court cannot presume the contrary; and it is to be recollected that when a protested bill is held up for a great length of time without notice, the whole onus probandi is thrown on the holder; he must prove everything, and nothing is required from the drawer. The case furnishes strong reason for the opinion that this bill was not returned to Virginia, but was held up by Spiers, Bowman & Co. in the expectation of its being paid by Robert Cary & Co. It was drawn on the 19th of July, 1774, and protested for non-payment on the 26th day of November of the same year. Another bill for £213 15*s.*, drawn on the 4th of July, 1774, in favor of Spiers, Bowman & Co., and protested on the 9th of November, 1774, was returned to Colonel Byrd, and was taken up; these bills drawn by the same persons, and held by the same house, at the same time, would probably have been returned by the same vessel had they been both returned. The circumstance that one was drawn in favor of Brisbane, an agent of the company, and indorsed by him to a member of the company, and by that member to the company, would not account for the appearance of one bill without the other, if both were returned. They were both the property of the same company, both due by the same person, both in possession of the company at the same time, and would probably have been both returned, if they were both returned, by the same vessel. The bill, said not originally to have been drawn in favor of Spiers, Bowman & Co., would probably have been transmitted to the same agent to whom the other bill was transmitted. The appearance of the one bill without the other is, then, a strong circumstance in favor of the opinion that the bill retained was held up in England in the expectation of its being paid by the drawee. In estimating the probabilities of the circumstances and prospects under which the bill was drawn, this fact is entitled to some consideration.

We have no regular accounts, no statements of the consignments made by Byrd to Robert Cary & Co. We know that their connection was of long standing; that there was a considerable degree of mutual kindness and confidence; that Byrd was in the habit of shipping tobacco to Robert Cary & Co.; that there may have been a shipment at the very time this bill was drawn; that money was paid for Byrd by Robert Cary & Co. after this bill was protested; that a bill of £75 was taken up for his honor; and that in October, 1775, the balance of £616 9s. 5d., which stood against him in November, 1773, was converted into a balance of 16s. 11d. in his favor. We have not all the intermediate accounts, and we do not know how this balance may have fluctuated; add to this that the bill is not said to have been protested for want of effects. Under all these circumstances, I cannot say that the bill was drawn with a knowledge that it would be protested, and that notice of the protest could not be necessary. I cannot say that it was a fraud upon the payee, by giving him a bill which the drawer knew would not be paid. If the onus probandi lay on the drawer of the bill, the case would be clearly against him; but as it lies entirely on the holder, whose laches are without a precedent in a court of law or equity, I think he has not made out a case of complete justification on which he can entitle himself to a decree for the bill drawn on the 19th of July, 1774.

§ 1022. Notice of protest excused by a state of war.

The second bill was drawn on the 26th day of November, 1775, for £246 3s. 7d., and was protested on the 26th day of June, 1776. It was drawn after the commencement of hostilities in Virginia; and before it was protested all intercourse between the two countries was interdicted. Under these circumstances, notice is not to be expected, and ought not to be required. I at first doubted whether a bill, which, for a length of time, is held under circumstances which dispense with notice, does not lose its commercial character, and become an ordinary debt. But, on reflection, I am satisfied that this idea cannot be sustained, and that, to charge the drawer, notice of the dishonor of his bill ought to be given within a reasonable time after the removal of the impediment.

§ 1023. Notice of protest. Small amount of funds in hands of drawee.

The question, therefore, on this bill also is, were the circumstances under which it was drawn such as to dispense with notice? Was it drawn without reasonable ground for an expectation that it would be paid? It may reasonably be supposed that, on the 26th of November, 1775, the letter of the 2d of October, 1775, which came by the last packet to New York, was received. In attempting to show that notice of the dishonor of this bill was unnecessary, because the drawer had no effects in the hands of the drawee, the holder is met in limine by the fact that this letter shows a balance in his favor of 16s. 11d., and the exception under which the plaintiff withdraws himself from the general rule is that the drawer had at the time no effects in the hands of the drawee. If we may depart from the letter of the exception, there is no point at which to stop; and if notice may be dispensed with when a small sum is in the hands of the drawer, it may also be dispensed with when a large sum is in his hands, provided that sum be one cent less than the bill is drawn for. I am aware of this argument, but think it more perplexing than convincing. There are many questions in which no precise line can be marked, which must depend on sound legal discretion, and where the case itself must be decided by a jury, or by the court, acting on the principles which ought to regulate a jury. The sound sense and justice of the exception is, that where a drawer knows he has no right to draw, and has the strongest reason to believe his bill will not be paid, the motives for requiring notice of its dishonor do not exist, and his case comes within the reason of the exception. Where all transactions between parties have ceased, and there is nothing to justify a draft but a balance of one penny, it would be sporting with our understanding to tell us that a creditor for this balance, who should draw for a thousand pounds, would be in a situation substantially different from what he would be in were he the debtor in the same sum. The true inquiry appears to me to be, whether the connection between William Byrd and Robert Cary & Co. remained such as to justify a hope that his bill would be honored, and to afford any shadow of justification for drawing it. I think it as demonstrable as any proposition of this sort can be, that he knew that this bill would not be paid. He had no funds in the hands of the drawee except 16*s.* 11*d.*, and no prospect of having any. He had made no shipment of tobacco by the last vessel, and Robert Cary & Co. speak of the fact with some resentment. In their letter of June, 1775, they had mentioned sending a vessel to Virginia chartered at a high price, in which they expected consignments of tobacco from their friends, and among others, from Colonel Byrd. In their letter of the 2d of October they say: "When Power came in, we were in hopes you would have offered him some assistance, but we observe the high price in the country was the cause of the disappointment, and no compliment to our charter. However, if we are no losers, we are not beholden to our friends for it."

With respect to the mortgage for which it had been supposed that the mortgagee was dead without a representative, he says, "it is feared the representative is found; but be this as it may," he adds, "the estate will be always liable, and, therefore, without a proper indemnity, little can be expected. What indemnity you may offer we know not, but we shall not engage for our own parts." After mentioning the payment of some bills, they add, "but for paying any more, or raising money on the uncertainty of the mortgage, we shall not attempt." With this letter before him, Colonel Byrd must have drawn, I think, with a moral certainty that his bill would be dishonored; and if in any case a holder can be excused for not giving notice, this is that case. There was an end of all consignments, of all intercourse between the parties; there were no funds to withdraw, and no remittances to stop. The want of notice would be no injury to him. This case seems to me to come within the exception of Bikerdike v. Bollman, as modified in the subsequent cases.

This brings me to the consideration of the other objections made by the defendant to the payment of this bill. He contends that, after such a lapse of time, payment must be presumed. Admitting the doctrine of presumption to be the same in respect of a bill as of an instrument under seal, of which I am not so confident, still it is not a positive rule, depending absolutely, like the statute of limitations, on length of time, but is the mere creature of reason, resting on probabilities. The creditor may meet this presumption and rebut it by accounting for the time which has been permitted to elapse, and by showing the improbability that his debt has been paid. He has, I think, met and completely rebutted it in this case. The bill was protested in England on the 26th day of June, 1776, and Colonel Byrd died in 1777 or 1778. In the meantime war raged between the two countries; all intercourse between them was unlawful; and Colonel Byrd's circumstances were too much embarrassed to admit of a suspicion that he would be eager in his search for those creditors who could make no legal demand upon him. It is, then, almost certain that this debt was not paid by him in his life-time. The chief argument in support of this presumption is founded on the time which has elapsed since his death, without any demand on his representatives. The plaintiff ascribes this to the insolvency of his estate; but to this it is answered that a suit had been brought in 1803, for a different claim, by the same agent, who was in possession of these bills; a bill was then filed claiming £70 19s. 10d., as a debt due from William Byrd & Co. for dealings at their store in Manchester, and £10 19s. 6½d., a debt due from William Byrd for dealings at their store in Petersburg. If the solvency of the estate did not prevent this suit, it cannot have prevented a suit on the bills.

The plaintiff assigns two reasons for this suit, by which he attempts to repel the inference which has been drawn from it. One is, that though William Byrd was supposed to be insolvent, William Byrd & Co. were not so. The other, that this suit was only preparatory to an application to the British commissioners sitting under the treaty of 1802; neither of these reasons is satisfactory; the suit does not seek for satisfaction from the effects of William Byrd & Co.; nor does it even charge that William Byrd was the surviving partner of that company, or even had any of its property in his hands; it charges him merely as a member of the company, and seeks for satisfaction out of his private estate, which is alleged to be in the hands of his executor, or of his trustees. But this reason, were it more consistent with the fact, would not apply to the claim against him as an individual. To account for this, we are told that it was necessary to establish the debt, in order to justify an application to the British commissioners. But surely it was not less necessary to establish the claim on this bill than on an open account. The production in 1804, or afterwards, of a protested bill without notice to the drawer of its dishonor, or proof of a single attempt to obtain payment of it, could never be received by the commissioners as a valid claim on the British government. But if these bills were held up in order to be laid before the commissioners, why were they not laid before that board? Is not the fact that no application has been made on them to the commissioners, a proof that this is not the cause which prevented the institution of suits on them in this country? If it be said that they have been laid before the commissioners, I ask what has been the fate of the application? Has it been rejected in consequence of the laches of the holder, or has it been successful? But there is no reason to believe that the suit in 1803 was brought with any other view than to recover the money it demanded; and the question recurs, why were not these bills put in suit also? It has been said they were overlooked by the agent; but this is not credible. There is an indorsement on the envelope which contained them, in his handwriting, and it must be supposed that bonds, bills and notes were not thrown in confusion among general books and papers, but were carefully preserved and listed, and that they would be immediately inspected by the agent to whom their collection was confided. Must it then be presumed that the agent believed them to be paid? The reasons against this presumption, so far as respects a payment made by Colonel Byrd, have already been stated. The reasons against their having been paid by his representatives are still stronger. Their accounts are all preserved, and this credit is not claimed. How could the agent have received an impression that they were paid? He must have received it from the papers themselves, from the entries on the books, or from direct communications made by Spiers, Bowman & Co. But the papers contain no indications of payment. The books, I am told, contain none; and is it reasonable to suppose that the plaintiff would send the bills to be collected, and write to the agent that nothing was due on them? We must impute negligence to the agent, or believe that he was of opinion that the debt was not recoverable at law. The last opinion, however, does not necessarily imply his conviction that it had been paid. The bills were not accompanied with any proof of notice, and he could obtain none. Without this proof, and without any evidence that the drawer had no right to draw, he might have thought the claim desperate; but this does not create a presumption that he believed it to be paid. I think, on a consideration of the circumstances of the case, that the presumption of payment is completely rebutted.

I am next to consider an objection which goes to the right of the plaintiff to sustain this action, even admitting that the right to bring it exists in some person. In 1813 a contract was entered into between the plaintiff and William C. Williams, a citizen of Virginia, by which the former conveyed to the latter all his debts in this country, and authorized him to sue for them, either in his own name or in the name of the present plaintiff. It is contended that these bills passed by this assignment, and that the whole legal and equitable interest being in another, no suit on them can be maintained by the plaintiff. On the part of the plaintiff it is answered that this instrument, being made flagrante bello, is void, and that no action can be sustained on it even after peace. As this may probably become a question between the parties to the instrument, I would not give an opinion on it unless it should be necessary in this cause. I am rather disposed to think it is not necessary. Bills of exchange are transferable, not by force of any statutes, but by the custom of merchants. Their transfer is regulated by usage, and that usage is founded in convenience. It appears to me that it would be extremely inconvenient to separate the evidence of ownership from the bill itself, and I think there is no usage to justify such a separation. Nothing can be more anti-commercial than the idea of transferring a negotiable paper by a deed transferring a vast number of bills, bonds, notes and accounts. Such an instrument may very properly be considered as conveying the equitable interest, the right to receive the money, but cannot be considered as a negotiation of the bill upon mercantile principles, or according to mercantile usage, so as to authorize the holder to sue in his own name. The books treat of no such mode of transfer. The person to whom a bill is transferred is never denominated an assignee. He is always termed an indorsee. Upon this ground I am of opinion that in this case a suit could not be maintained in the name of William C. Williams. Were this even doubtful, the instrument now relied on contains an authority to sue in the name of the plaintiff, and may therefore fairly be considered as not being intended to have the legal effect of an assignment, but to operate as an agreement authorizing William C. Williams to exercise all the powers of ownership in the name of the plaintiff. But I rely on the principle that a bill of exchange is not, by the custom of merchants, transferable by such an instrument as is produced in this case.

§ 1026. Parties in equity. All persons having distinct interests must be joined.

But the defendant contends that, admitting the suit to be maintainable in the name of the plaintiff, still William C. Williams ought to be a party, because in a court of equity all persons concerned in interest must be parties. I do not think the rule applies to such a case as this. All persons having distinct interests must undoubtedly be brought into court; but where the interest of one person is involved in that of another, and that other possesses the legal right, so that the interest may be asserted in his name, it is not, I think, always necessary to bring both before the court. Thus a trustee may sue without naming the cestui que trust as a party; an executor or administrator may sue without naming legatees or distributees. And the obligee in a bond, where it is not by law assignable, may sue, or the equitable assignee may sue in his name, without being named himself as a party. This may, I think, be done in a court of equity as well as a court of law. The person having the equitable interest, if the suit be not really brought for his benefit, may insist on being made a party, and the court will direct it; but I do not think the omission of persons in this situation any objection to the suit. Had this suit been brought by William C. Williams, Hopkirk must have been made a party; but I do not think Williams a necessary party to a suit brought by and in the name of Hopkirk. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for £246 3s. 7d. sterling, with interest thereon, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, for eighteen months, and with interest on the whole sum at the rate of five per cent. per annum, either from the expiration of eighteen months, or from the time that this claim was asserted in court, according to the manner in which the act in the revisal, 1745, which regulates this transaction, has been construed. I shall give the five per cent. only from the assertion of the demand in court, unless by a reference to the records of the general or district court it can be shown that the law has been expounded, to allow interest from the expiration of the eighteen months.

YEAGER v. FARWELL.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Missouri.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Farwell & Co., of Boston, loaned $15,000 to Kerckhoff on his note secured by mortgage on real estate. Yeager & Co., of St. Louis, negotiated the loan for Kerckhoff, and at Farwell's request Yeager indorsed the note with his firm's name. The note fell due; no demand was made, nor was it protested, but on the last day of grace Yeager & Co. wrote to Farwell that the note would not be paid, but that they were responsible and would see it paid. Suit was brought against Yeager & Co. as indorsers, and there was judgment against them.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DAVIS.

This case resolves itself into two points: First. Were Yeager & Co. indorsers of the note in controversy? Secondly. If so, were Farwell & Co. relieved from the necessity of proving on the trial that they demanded payment of the maker, and gave notice to the indorsers of the dishonor of the note?

§ 1027. A person who indorses a note at the request of the payee before negotiations are closed is liable as indorser.

It is very clear that Yeager & Co. were liable as indorsers, if they placed their names on the back of the note in question before Farwell & Co. closed the negotiations for the loan to Kerckhoff, or made any advances on it to him. And the condition of the parties is not altered by the fact that Yeager & Co., without consideration, indorsed the note at the request of Farwell & Co. after negotiations concerning the loan had been some time in progress, and when they had a right to suppose Farwell & Co. were satisfied with the landed security which Kerckhoff offered. It may be true that Farwell & Co. originally intended to let the money go on the security of the trust deed, but they were not legally bound to do so, and could alter their minds on the subject, and forbear to loan the money unless Yeager & Co. (who were the middlemen in the negotiation) should also indorse the note. If they chose to do this before the transaction was completed or any portion of the money loaned was actually advanced to Kerckhoff, then their liability as indorsers is fixed, and so the learned court told the jury. Whether the indorsement was before or after the conclusion of the negotiations for the loan, or before or after the advancements to Kerckhoff, were questions of fact for the determination of the jury. As there was evidence tending strongly to support the finding of the jury on this point, and as they were correctly instructed in relation to it, the plaintiff in error cannot justly complain of the action of the jury.

§ 1028. The promise of an indorser to see the note paid at an early day is equivalent to a waiver of notice, even if made on the last day of grace.

The undertaking, however, of the indorser of a negotiable note is only to pay it in case the maker does not, and he is immediately notified of this default. The remaining defense set up in this action is that this was not done, and, therefore, the indorsers were not chargeable. But the indorser can, by his own conduct, place himself in such a position that he is estopped from alleging want of demand and notice of non-payment. Although, accurately speaking, there can only be a waiver of demand and notice by the indorser before the note is due, yet, after it is due, he can waive proof of them; or, what is more to the purpose, he can so act towards the holder of the note as to render the fact that demand was not made or notice given wholly immaterial. 1 Parsons on Bills & Notes, ch. 13, p. 594. The inquiry is whether Yeager & Co. have, by their course of action, put themselves in this category. The court below held that they had, and, as the evidence on the subject was undisputed, took it from the jury and decided it as a question of law. The letter of Yeager & Co., which constituted this evidence, substantially informed the Farwells that Kerckhoff was unable to pay his note, but would be able to do so in a week or ten days at farthest. After expressing the annoyance felt by the writers, on account of the dishonor of the paper, it concludes in these words: "But we hold ourselves responsible for the payment of the note, and shall see it is done at an early day." Necessarily, this letter could not have reached its destination in due course of mail until after the note was due; but, for the purpose of holding the indorser, this is immaterial, for, as we have seen, he can dispense with the conditions for his benefit as well after as before the paper matures. It has been held by this court, in Sigerson v. Mathews, 20 How., 496, that if the indorser, with full knowledge of the fact that no demand has been made or notice given, makes a subsequent promise, he is liable, and cannot, when sued, set up as a defense the want of such demand and notice; and to the same effect are the decisions of the courts in this country generally. See 1 Parsons on Bills & Notes, p. 595, note m. Applying the principle of these decisions to the admitted facts of this case there is no difficulty in charging the indorsers. Their promise to pay was expressly made after they knew of the laches of the maker of the note, and they cannot now be allowed to repudiate it. The most formal demand and notice could have been of no service to them, for they knew the demand would be useless, and the notice could only tell them what they were advised of without it. Acting under the weight of the knowledge of Kerckhoff's default, they did not choose to wait in order to see whether Farwell & Co. had taken the requisite steps to charge them, but preferred at once to acknowledge their liability, and, accordingly, made the direct promise to pay the note. Under these circumstances this promise is binding, and does not require for its enforcement the proof of demand and notice.

Judgment affirmed.

BURROWS v. HANNEGAN.

(Circuit Court for Indiana: 1 McLean, 309-313. 1833.)

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought by the plaintiffs as indorsees of the defendant. A jury was sworn, and the facts admitted are, that the notes assigned by the defendant to the plaintiffs were given by Tillinghast and Gardner, for goods sold at Cincinnati; the notes were dated there, and Hannegan was to indorse them. The makers of the notes lived at Newport, Indiana. Notes being first drawn, payable at a bank in Indiana, but being objected to, they were drawn payable generally as they now appear. After the goods were forwarded, the notes were sent to Washington city, where they were indorsed by the defendant. When the notes became due, a notary public not finding Tillinghast and Gardner in Cincinnati, made a demand of payment in that city, and protested the notes for non-payment. At this time, and indeed at the time the notes were assigned, Tillinghast and Gardner were in doubtful circumstances, and the defendant obtained a mortgage on a lot as an indemnity. This lot did not give a full indemnity, but it was all the property that could be pledged. The defendant, on being written to by plaintiffs, replied that the notes must be paid without suit, and this was admitted to have been written by him. And he also admitted that he had received a partial indemnity; but eventually he observed that he would not pay the notes, unless compelled by law. On this evidence the counsel for the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant. This motion was resisted by plaintiff's counsel, and they cited 2 Greenl., 809; 2 Am. C. L., 288, 282; 5 Mass., 176; 1 John. Ch., 99; Chitt. on Bills, 279.

§ 1029. Assignment of note governed by law of place.

Whether the assignment be considered as having been made at the city of Washington, or at Cincinnati, it is governed by the law merchant, and a demand of the drawers and notice of non-payment to the indorser was essential to charge him. If the contract of assignment be considered as governed by the Indiana law, then a suit and prosecution to insolvency was necessary. In deciding the case, it is not necessary to determine which law regulates the assignment.

§ 1030. Demand at the holder's counting-house is not sufficient.

The note upon its face was not made payable at a particular place. It was payable to the plaintiffs, who reside at Cincinnati; but the drawers did not promise to pay the money at their counting-house. If they had fixed the place of payment, a demand at such a place, when the note became due, and notice to the indorser, under the law merchant, would have charged him. And this is the kind of diligence relied on by the plaintiffs as entitling them to recover the money from the defendant as indorser. The notary states the demand was made at Cincinnati, but at what place is not specified, and, if specified, the demand would have been equally defective, as the drawers did not agree to pay the money at a particular place. The demand should have been made of the drawers personally, or at their usual place of abode or of business. This was not done, and consequently the diligence which the law requires, to give a recourse against the indorser, was not used by the plaintiffs.

But it is insisted that the defendant, by assurances given to the plaintiffs, and by taking a mortgage from the drawers, for his indemnification, has waived a demand of the drawers and notice. The defendant on different occasions assured the plaintiffs before the note became due, and perhaps afterwards, that the drawers should or would pay the note. But there was no promise on his part to pay it.

It was formerly held that an express promise to pay under a misapprehension of a legal liability by the indorser was not binding, and that a payment of the money under such circumstances could be recovered back again. Bilbie v. Lumley, 2 East, 471; Williams v. Bartholomew, 1 Bos. & Pull., 326; Stevens v. Lynch, 12 East, 38; Chitt. on Bills (ed. 1839), 535. But this doctrine has been overruled. Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt., 143; Brown v. M'Kinally, 1 Esp., 279; Marriatt v. Hampton, 2 Esp., 546, 723. Where a promise of payment is now made by the indorser it is held as an evidence of his liability to pay, and consequently an admission of legal demand and notice. Potter v. Rayworth, 13 East, 417. Contra, Warder v. Tucker, 7 Mass., 449; Freeman v. Boynton, 7 Mass., 483; 9 Mass., 332; 1 Bays., 291; Griffin v. Goff, 12 John., 423; Trimble v. Thorne, 16 John., 152. If an indorser propose to the holder to pay the bill by instalments, and such offer be rejected, he is at liberty afterwards to avail himself of the want of notice. Goodall v. Dolley, 1 Term R., 714. A promise to pay without a knowledge of a refusal to accept will not be binding. Blesard v. Hirst, 5 Burr., 2672; Williams v. Bartholomew, 1 Bos. & Pull., 326; Stevens v. Lynch, 2 Camp., 333; Hopley v. Dufresne, 15 East, 276-7. This is denied by other authorities. But an offer to the holder of a bill of a general composition of so much in the pound of all a party's debts, although not accepted, has been held to dispense with a notice of dishonor. Margetson v. Aitken, 3 Carr. & P., 338. The assurances of the defendant had no reference to his own liability, and they therefore do not come within the rule sanctioned by the above cases.

§ 1033. Partial indemnity taken by the indorser after the maturity of the note does not operate as a waiver of notice.

It appears that the defendant, subsequent, it is believed, to the notes becoming due, took a mortgage from the drawers on a lot of ground of small value, in part to indemnify him, should he be held responsible, and on this ground it is contended there was a waiver of notice. In the case of Bond v. Farnham, 5 Mass., 170, it was held if the indorser before the note becomes due takes an assignment of all the property of the maker as security for his indorsements, it is a waiver of demand on the drawers and notice of non-payment. But, if the assignments of property were made to secure him against the indorsement of other specified notes, it would not have this effect. In the case of Prentiss v. Danielson, 5 Conn., 175, the same principle held. The court held if the indorser of a note, to protect himself from eventual loss, take collateral security of the maker on account of the particular note indorsed, it was a waiver of the legal right to require proof of demand on the maker and notice to himself. Mead v. Small, 2 Greenl., 207. The holder of a bill, by taking collateral security of the drawer, not giving time, does not release the indorser. Nor does he release any one of the names on the bill by receiving payment in part from the drawer or immediate indorser. James v. Badger, 1 Johns. Cas., 131; Kennedy v. Motte, 3 McCord, 13; Hurd v. Little, 12 Mass., 502; Ruggles v. Patten, 8 Mass., 480. It has been considered in the above cases that when an indorser takes an indemnity for indorsing a note he waives a notice of demand. This must be on the ground that having a pledge from the maker of the note his interest cannot be affected by want of notice. But if the holder of the note take additional security from the indorser, the indorser is not released. He has a right to pay the note, and to be substituted to the collateral security held by the holder.

If the above principle be sustainable, still the defendant in this case is not liable. His mortgage was taken after the note became due, and, at best, it was but a partial indemnity. And this property he offered to relinquish to the plaintiffs, which they refused to receive and exonerate him. So that in no point of view does it seem that the defendant has waived the notice which the plaintiffs as holders of the note were bound to give him of its dishonor. A partial indemnity given by the maker to the accommodation indorser of a note to secure said indorser in part against his liability, etc., does not excuse the holder from making due demand, and giving notice to such indorser. Brunson v. Napier, 1 Yerg., 199. But a full indemnity will dispense with demand and notice. Durham v. Price, 5 Yerg., 300. To the same effect is the case of Mechanics' Bank v. Griswold, 7 Wend., 165; Chitt. on Bills (ed. 1839), 473; Corney v. Da Costa, 1 Esp., 303; Brown v. Maffey, 15 East, 216; Baker v. Birch, 3 Camp., 107; Clegg v. Cotton, 3 Bos. & Pull., 239; Bailey on Bills (5th ed.), 303.

THORNTON v. WYNN.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WASHINGTON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, in the circuit court for the District of Columbia and county of Washington, upon a promissory note given by one Miller to Thornton, and by him indorsed to Wynn. The declaration contains a count upon the note, and also the common counts for money laid out and expended, and for money had and received. At the trial of the cause upon the general issue the defendant below took two exceptions to the opinion of the court, which are to the following effect: The first states that the plaintiff gave in evidence the note and indorsement mentioned in the declaration, and in order to dispense with the proof of the ordinary steps of diligence in presenting and demanding the note of the drawer, and giving notice to the indorser, the plaintiff offered evidence to prove that a few weeks before the institution of this suit the note in question was presented to the defendant, who, being informed that Miller, the drawer, had not paid the note, said "he knew Miller had not, and that Miller was not to pay it; that it was the concern of the defendant alone, and Miller had nothing to do with it; that the note had been given for part of the purchase money of a certain race-horse called Ratler, and that the defendant offered to take up the said note if the plaintiff's agent would give time, and receive other notes mentioned in payment;" to the admission and competency of which evidence the defendant objected; but the court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence as competent to support this action without any further proof of demand upon the drawer or notice to the indorser. That the said evidence being so admitted by the court, the defendant offered evidence to prove that the said note was given for part of the purchase money of the said race-horse, then celebrated for his performances on the turf, sold by the plaintiff to the defendant and the said Miller, the drawer of the note, for $3,000, of which $2,000 had been paid; that the plaintiff, at the time of so selling this horse, warranted him sound, and declared him capable of beating any horse in the United States, and recommended the purchasers to match him against a celebrated race-horse in New York called Eclipse; that he also gave a representation of his pedigree, which he described as unexceptionable, and promised to procure his pedigree and send it to the defendant. And the defendant then offered evidence to prove that the said horse at the time of the said sale was utterly unsound and broken down, and had been broken down whilst in the plaintiff's possession, and was reputed and proven by persons in the neighborhood of the plaintiff, who afterwards communicated the same to the purchaser; and was wholly unfit for and incapable of the action and fatigue necessary to a race-horse; and that the plaintiff had wholly failed to procure and furnish the pedigree of the horse, as he had agreed, and that a pedigree was an essential term in the purchase of the horse, or ordinarily is so in the purchase of such horses, without which this horse was worth nothing; and that the said Miller, as soon as it had been ascertained by repeated trials that the horse was incurably unsound, offered to return him to the plaintiff, who refused to take him back, although the former offered to lose what he had already paid for the horse, which offer was made after the note fell due. Whereupon the court instructed the jury, at the prayer of the plaintiff, that if they should be of opinion from the said evidence that the said horse was, at the time of the said sale, utterly unsound and broken down, and had been broken down whilst in the plaintiff's possession, and was wholly unfit for and incapable of the action and fatigue necessary to a race-horse, but that the said facts were not known to the plaintiff at the time of the said sale, the said facts are not a sufficient defense in this action to prevent the plaintiff from recovering. Upon these instructions of the court the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the cause now comes before this court upon a writ of error.

This bill of exceptions presents two questions for the decision of this court. The first is, whether the evidence offered by the plaintiff, and admitted by the court, dispensed with the necessity of proving a demand of payment of the maker of the note, and due notice to Thornton of non-payment; and, secondly, whether the court below erred or not in stating to the jury that the alleged breach of the warranty of the horse, if proved to their satisfaction, was not a sufficient defense in this action to prevent the plaintiff from recovering, unless the facts stated in the bill of exceptions were known to the plaintiff at the time of the sale. In the argument of the first question, the counsel on both sides considered the evidence offered by the plaintiff as presenting a double aspect. 1. As authorizing a conclusion, in point of fact, that the note of hand on which the suit is brought was made and passed to Thornton without consideration, and merely for his accommodation; and 2. As amounting to a promise to pay the note, or at least to an admission by Thornton of his liability to pay it, and of the right of the plaintiff to resort to him, whether it was made solely for his accommodation, or was given for value in the ordinary course of trade.

§ 1034. Whether demand and notice necessary to bind accommodation party to note, quære?

As to the first, the counsel treated the note throughout as an accommodation note, and submitted to the decision of this court the question, whether the indorser of such a note was entitled to call for proof of a demand of payment of the maker, and notice to himself? Whether this question was ever raised in the court below, or in what manner it was there treated, does not appear from the bill of exceptions. It is possible that that court may have intended nothing more by their direction to the jury than to sanction the admissibility of the evidence, and its sufficiency to authorize a verdict for the plaintiff, without other proof of demand and notice, provided the jury should be of opinion that it warranted the conclusion that the note was given without consideration. But such is not the language of the court, as stated in the bill of exceptions. The jury were informed that the evidence was competent to support the action without such further proof of demand and notice, without leaving the inference of fact that the note was given without consideration to be drawn by the jury. Had the court distinctly stated to the jury that this was such a note, and, therefore, that further proof of demand and notice was unnecessary, the incorrectness of the direction could have been doubted by no person, since the court would, in that case, have inferred a fact from the evidence which it was competent to the jury alone to do. And yet it seems difficult to distinguish the supposed case from the one really presented by the bill of exceptions, upon the hypothesis that the court below decided anything as to the particular character of this note, since it is very obvious that no question of fact was submitted to the consideration of the jury. It is, therefore, due from this court to the one whose decision we are revising, to conclude that that decision did not proceed upon the assumption that this was a note drawn for the accommodation of the indorser.

§ 1035. Waiver of demand and notice by express promise to pay.

It remains to be considered whether the direction was correct upon the other aspect of the evidence. It is now well settled, as a principle of the law merchant, that an unconditional promise by the drawer or indorser of a bill to pay it, after full knowledge of all the circumstances necessary to apprise him of his discharge from his responsibility by the laches of the holder, amounts to an implied waiver of due notice of a demand of the drawer or acceptor, and dispenses with the necessity of proving it. Such are the cases of Borradaile v. Lowe, 4 Taunt., 93; Donaldson v. Means, 4 Dal., 109, and others which need not be cited. So if, with a knowledge of these circumstances, he answer that the bill "must be paid;" "that when he comes to town he would set the matter right;" "that his affairs were then deranged, but that he would be glad to pay it as soon as his accounts with his agents were settled," or "that he would see it paid;" or if he pay a part of the bill,—in all these cases it has been decided that proof of regular notice is dispensed with. 2 Term, 713; Bull. N. P., 276; 2 Camp., 188; 6 East, 16; 2 Stra., 1246. The principle upon which these decisions proceed is explained in many of the above cases, and particularly in that of Rogers v. Stephens, 2 Term, 713. It is this: that these declarations and acts amount to an admission of the party that the holder has a right to resort to him on the bill, and that he has received no damage for want of notice. See, also, Stark. Ev., 272. The same principle applies with equal force to promissory notes, which, after indorsement, partake of the character of bills of exchange; the indorser being likened to the drawer, and the maker to the acceptor of a bill. The case of Leffingwell v. White, 1 Johns. Cas., 99, is that of a promissory note, where the indorser, before it became due, stated that the maker had absconded, and that, being secured, he would give a new note, and requested time. The court say that the defendant had admitted his responsibility, treated the note as his own, and negotiated for further time for payment, by which conduct he had waived the necessity of demand of the maker and notice to himself. Taylor v. Jones, 2 Camp., 105; Vaughan v. Fuller, 2 Stra., 1246, and Anson v. Bailey, Bull. N. P., 276, were all cases of actions on promissory notes against the indorser. In this case the defendant below, upon being informed that Miller, the maker of the note, had not paid it, observed that he knew he had not, and that he was not to pay it; that it was the concern of the defendant alone, and that Miller had nothing to do with it, it having been given for part of the purchase money of a horse. These declarations amounted to an unequivocal admission of the original liability of the defendant to pay the note, and nothing more. It does not necessarily admit the right of the holder to resort to him on the note, and that he had received no damage from the want of notice, unless the jury, to whom the conclusion of the fact from the evidence ought to have been submitted, were satisfied that the defendant was also apprised of the laches of the holder in not making a regular demand of payment of the note, by which he was discharged from his responsibility to pay it. The knowledge of this fact formed an indispensable part of the plaintiff's case, since without it it cannot fairly be inferred that the defendant intended to admit the right of the plaintiff to resort to him, if, in point of fact, he had been guilty of such laches as would discharge him in point of law. For anything that appeared to the court below, from the evidence stated in the bill of exceptions, the admissions of the defendant may have been made upon the presumption that the holder had done all that the law required of him, in order to charge the indorser. That due notice was not given to the defendant he could not fail to know; but that a regular demand of the maker of the note could not be inferred by the court from the admissions of the defendant. For the reasons above stated the judgment of the court below must be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

§ 1036. When purchaser may set up breach of warranty in defense to suit for purchase price.

But since the second question before mentioned has been distinctly brought to the notice of this court, has been fully argued, and must again be decided by the court below, it becomes necessary that this court should pass an opinion upon it. That question is whether the alleged breach of the warranty of the horse, the price of which formed part of the consideration of the note, if proved to the satisfaction of the jury, was a sufficient defense in this action to prevent the plaintiff from recovering, unless the facts stated in the bill of exceptions were known to the plaintiff below at the time of the sale. The question is, not whether the purchaser of a horse, which is warranted sound, has a remedy over against the vendor, upon the warranty, in case it be broken, but whether, in an action against him for the purchase money, he can be permitted to defend himself by proving a breach of the warranty? The cases upon this subject are principally those where the vendee, having executed the contract on his part, by paying the purchase money, brought an action of indebitatus assumpsit against the vendor, as for money had and received to his use. But it is perfectly clear that the reasoning of the court in those cases applies with equal force to a case where the breach of the warranty is set up by the vendee as a defense against an action against him to recover the purchase money. The first case we meet with on this subject is that of Power v. Wells, of which a very imperfect report is to be seen in a short note in Doug., 24, and in Cowp., 818. There the plaintiff gave a horse and twenty guineas to the defendant for another horse, which he warranted to be sound, but which proved otherwise. The plaintiff offered to return the horse, which was refused; and the plaintiff brought two actions, one for money had and received, to recover back the twenty guineas which he had paid, and an action of trover for the horse, possession of which the plaintiff had delivered to the defendant. The court decided that neither action could be maintained; not the second, because the property had been changed. This case was referred to, by the judge who had decided it, at nisi prius, in the case of Weston v. Downes, Doug., 23, which soon after came before the court of king's bench. That was an action for money had and received; and the case was, that the plaintiff had paid a certain sum to the defendant for a pair of horses, which the defendant agreed, at the time, to take back, if they were disapproved of and returned within a month. They were returned, accordingly, within the stipulated period, and another pair was sent in their stead, without any new agreement. These were likewise returned, and accepted by the vendor, and a third pair were sent, which, being likewise offered to be returned, the vendor refused to take them back. Lord Mansfield was against the action; because, the contract being a special one, the defendant ought to have notice by the declaration that he was sued upon it. Ashhurst, J., was of the same opinion; but added, that if the plaintiff had demanded his money on the return of the first pair of horses, this action would have lain, but that the contract was continued; from which expression nothing more is understood to have been meant than that the contract remained open. The ground upon which Buller, J., thought that the action could not be maintained was, that, by refusing to take back the horses, the defendant had not precluded himself from entering into the nature of the contract; and that, whenever that is open, it must be stated specially. The meaning of these latter expressions is distinctly stated by the court and particularly by this judge, in the case of Towers v. Barrett, 1 Term R., 133, which followed next in order of time; that was also an action for money had and received. The money was paid for a horse and chaise to be returned in case the plaintiff's wife should not approve of them. They were accordingly sent back to the defendant in three days after the sale, and left on his premises against his consent to receive them.

Lord Mansfield, C. J., and Willis, J., distinguish this case from that of Weston v. Downes, upon the ground that that was an absolute, and this a conditional agreement, which was at an end by the return of the horse and chaise, and was no longer open. Both the judges treat the case as if the vendor had taken back the property, although, in fact, he had not consented to do so. Ashhurst, J., was of opinion that this case would have resembled that of Weston v. Downes, if, in that, the plaintiff had returned the horses. It is very clear, from what was said by the same judge in that case, that his meaning in this was if the plaintiff had returned the first pair of horses, and then demanded his money; for he adds, that in that case there was an end of the first contract by the plaintiff's taking other pairs, and this constituted a new contract, not made on the terms of the first. But in this case the contract was conditional, and when the horse and chaise were returned, the contract was at an end, and the defendant held the money against conscience. Buller, J., is still more explicit.

He says that the defendant, by the contract, had put it in the power of the plaintiff to terminate it, by returning the horse and chaise, and that the plaintiff had no option to refuse to take them back; and that, being bound to receive them, the case was the same as if he had actually accepted them. He adds that the distinction between those cases where the contract is open, and where it is not, is, that if it be rescinded, either by the original terms of the contract, as in this case, where no act remains to be done by the defendant, or by a subsequent assent by him, the plaintiff may recover back his whole money, and then this action will lie. But if it be open, the plaintiff's demand is only for damages arising out of the contract. The court proceeded upon this distinction in deciding the case of Payne v. Whale, 7 East, 274, which followed the one just noticed. The action was to recover back money paid to the defendant for a horse sold by him to the plaintiff, which he warranted sound. The plaintiff offered to return the horse, upon an allegation of his unsoundness, which the defendant denied and refused to take him back, but agreed that, if he was in fact unsound, he would take him back and return the purchase money. The unsoundness was proved at the trial, but the court was of opinion that the action could not be supported, and distinguished this case from the preceding one by observing that in that the plaintiff had an option, by the original contract, to rescind it on a certain event; but here it was no part of the original contract that the horse was to be taken back; and that the subsequent promise amounted to no more than that he would take him back if the warranty were shown to be broken, which still left the question of warranty open for discussion, and then the form of the action ought to give the defendant notice of it by being brought upon the warranty.

The case of Lewis v. Cosgrave, 2 Taunt., 2, was precisely like the present, in which the same distinction and the same principles were recognized by the judge who tried the cause at nisi prius. It was an action on a bill drawn for the price of a horse, which, on the sale of him, was warranted sound, but turned out not to be so. The defendant offered to return the horse, which was refused, and the defendant left him in the plaintiff's stable, without his knowledge. The judge decided that, as the plaintiff had refused to take back the horse, the contract of sale was not rescinded, and, consequently, that the defendant must pay the bill, and take his remedy by action for the deceit. But upon a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, the court said that it was clear the plaintiff knew of the unsoundness of the horse, which was clearly a fraud, and that no man can recover the price of an article sold under a fraud. See, also, the cases of Fortune v. Lingham, 2 Camp., 416, and Solomon v. Turner, 1 Stark., 51.

The result of the above cases is this: if, upon a sale with a warranty, or if, by the special terms of the contract, the vendee is at liberty to return the article sold, an offer to return it is equivalent to an offer accepted by the vendor, and, in that case, the contract is rescinded and at an end, which is a sufficient defense to an action brought by the vendor for the purchase money, or to enable the vendee to maintain an action for money had and received in case the purchase money has been paid. The consequences are the same where the sale is absolute, and the vendor afterwards consents, unconditionally, to take back the property; because, in both, the contract is rescinded by the agreement of the parties, and the vendee is well entitled to retain the purchase money in the one case, or to recover it back in the other.

But if the sale be absolute, and there be no subsequent agreement or consent of the vendor to take back the article, the contract remains open, and the vendee is put to his action upon the warranty, unless it be proved that the vendor knew of the unsoundness of the article, and the vendee tendere. a return of it within a reasonable time. We are, therefore, of opinion that the direction of the court in this case, upon the second exception, was entirely correct. The judgment is to be reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below for a new trial.

FOOTE v. BROWN.

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This action is brought on a guaranty, by the defendants, of a note given to the plaintiffs, by Daniel Brown. The declaration contained three counts: First. On a promissory note. Second. On an agreement to pay on condition. Third. A general count for money had and received, etc. To the first and third counts non-assumpsit was pleaded. To the second the defendants demurred, on the ground that it contains no allegation of notice to delendants of demand and non-payment of the note by Daniel Brown. The defendants also filed two pleas of set-off in the form of "special payments," under the practice act of Indiana of 1838. The pleas were, that certain drafts for money had been given defendants on a house in New Orleans; that defendants left the same with H. and H., of that city, for collection, and took their receipt for them. That afterwards defendants assigned the receipt to the plaintiffs, who receipted for it, agreeing to collect and apply the money to defendants' account. That the plaintiffs had given no notice that the house who held the drafts had refused to deliver them to the plaintiffs, or that the drafts had not been paid, etc. Demurrers were filed to these pleas.

On the part of the plaintiffs it is contended that, as the names of the defendants were not on the note guarantied, they were not entitled to notice. That to avoid their guaranty they must show that they have sustained damage for want of notice. That the principal had property when the note became due, so that they could have secured themselves from loss, if notice had been given. Mr. Chitty, in his Treatise on Bills, page 324, says: "In these cases of collateral guaranties, where the parties' names are not on the bill, they are not entitled to the strict and immediate notice of dishonor, as a party is who has drawn and indorsed the bill, and, unless he has really sustained loss by the want of notice, he continues liable on his guaranty." Warrington v. Furber, 8 East, 242; 6 Esp., 89. Chitt. on Bills, 365: "A person who has guarantied the due payment of a bill may, in some cases, be released from the responsibility by the neglect of the holder duly to present it for payment, if he can show that he was thereby prejudiced." And again, page 441: "In general, if the bill or note be given as a collateral security, and the party delivering it were no party to it, either by indorsing or transferring it by delivery, when payable to bearer, but merely cause it to be drawn or indorsed, or delivered over by a third person as a security, or has guarantied the payment, it has been considered that he is not, within the custom of merchants, an indorser or party to it, so as to be absolutely entitled to strict regular notice, nor discharged from his liability by the neglect of the holder to give him such notice, unless he can show, by express evidence, or by inference, that he has actually sustained loss or damage by the omission." Philips v. Astling, 2 Taunt., 206; Swinyard v. Bowes, 5 Maule & S., 62; Holbrow v. Wilkins, 1 Barn. & Cress., 10; 2 D. & Ry., 59; Van Wart v. Woolley, 3 Barn. & Cress., 439. These authorities are somewhat questioned in the case of Camidge v. Allenby, 6 Barn. & Cress., 373; 9 D. & Ry., 391. In page 497, Mr. Chitty says, "it is expedient, though not in general absolutely necessary, to give notice to a person who has guarantied the payment of the bill."

§ 1038. A collateral guarantor is entitled to notice.

Whatever doubt may exist in England, under their decisions, whether notice is necessary to charge a guarantor whose name does not appear on the note, there can be none under the decisions of the supreme court. In the case of Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet., 126, the doctrine is clearly laid down. That was a continuing guaranty to Reynolds & Co., as indorser, etc., for one Haring. And the court say, "the fourth instruction insists that a demand of payment should have been made of Haring, and in case of non-payment by him, that notice of such demand and non-payment should have been given in a reasonable time to the defendants, otherwise the defendants would be discharged from their guaranty." "And we are of opinion that this instruction ought to have been given. By the very terms of this guaranty, as well as by the general principles of the law, the guarantors are only collaterally liable on the failure of the principal debtor to pay the debt. A demand upon him, and a failure on his part, to perform his engagements, are indispensable to constitute a casus fœderis." This notice need not be given with as much strictness as to charge a party whose name is on the bill, but it must be given in a reasonable time. See the case of Lewis v. Brewster, 2 McL., 21 (§§ 561-565, supra). The principle may be laid down as generally applicable to commercial paper, that where the undertaking is collateral to pay the debt of another, on his default, a notice of demand and non-payment is necessary. And this whether the name of the party be on the dishonored note or not. The only difference in principle seems to be that, where the individual is a party to the note, strict notice is required; but where he is not a party, reasonable notice is sufficient. This view is decisive of this case, as there is in the declaration no averment of a demand of payment and notice to the defendants; but a remark or two may be made on the pleas which are demurred to.

These pleas are filed under a special statute of Indiana. Where negotiable paper is given as conditional payment, the proceeds to be collected by the holder, and applied in payment of the debt, it is incumbent on the holder to use due diligence in collecting the money, by making a demand when it becomes due, and in giving notice of non-payment to those whose names are on the paper. If, in this respect, the holder is guilty of laches, so as to release the parties on the bill, he makes the paper his own, and must sustain the loss. In Camidge v. Allenby, 6 Barn. & Cress., 373, above cited, where, in payment for goods sold, certain notes on a country bank were delivered, which bank, unknown to the parties, had stopped payment at an earlier hour on the same day, and no notice for one week was given to the person who paid the notes, it was held that there were laches which released him from responsibility. Mr. Justice Bailey remarked, "the rule as to all negotiable instruments is, that if they are taken in payment of a pre-existing debt, they operate as a discharge of that debt, unless the party who holds the instrument does all that the law requires to be done, in order to obtain payment of them."

§ 1040. An agent must observe the usual course of transacting business.

An agent to save himself from responsibility must observe the usual course of transacting the business in which he is engaged. If he procure an insurance, and neglect to have inserted in the policy the common and usual clauses in the like policies, and a loss should occur, which would have been covered by such clauses, the agent would be responsible for the loss. Mallough v. Barber, 4 Camp., 150; 6 Taunt., 495. If the agent deposit the money of the principal in his own name and on his own account, and the bank fail, the agent would be responsible. Massey v. Banner, 1 Jac. & W., 245, 248. And so if an agent sell the goods of his principal on credit contrary to usage, or fail to demand the money when the credit has expired; or if he should sell to persons of doubtful credit, or actually insolvent, he is responsible. Story on Agency, 189. And if he give time for payment after the money became due, or should omit to use the common diligence to collect it, the loss would be his own. Caffrey v. Darby, 6 Ves. Jr., 494, 495. In the case under consideration, if the plaintiffs, having possession of the drafts, neglected to make the proper demand when they became due, or to give notice, so as to hold liable the parties to the drafts, in case of non-payment, through which the recourse of the defendants was cut off, the loss must fall on the plaintiffs. Under the circumstances the plaintiffs were bound to do what the law required, to collect the money on the drafts, and, in case of failure, to notify all persons concerned. But, as the case turns upon the demurrer to the second count, the question arising on the pleas need not be decided. Demurrer to the second count is sustained. The plaintiffs abandoned their claim under the other counts.

ALLEN v. KING.

(Circuit Court for Michigan: 4 McLean, 128-133. 1846.)

Opinion of the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action was brought to recover a balance which the defendant owes to the plaintiff, for goods, wares and merchandise purchased. A draft, payable in four months, drawn by Harleston on N. G. Ogden, of New York, and indorsed by King, was procured by King and handed to the counsel of the plaintiff, with the view of paying, when the proceeds should be received, so much on account. This draft was forwarded and accepted, but was eventually protested for non-payment. It seems that due notice was not given to the drawer and indorser, and that was made the principal ground of defense. The trial took place in the absence of the circuit judge, and now a motion is made for a new trial, on points stated, before a full court. The jury found for the defendant.

A new trial is asked: 1. Because the court rejected Harleston, the drawer of the draft, who was offered as a witness to show that the remedy against him has not been lost, as the drawer of the bill, for want of strict notice. 2. Because the jury were instructed that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that the draft had been presented for payment at maturity, at the place where payable, and that it had been regularly protested for non-payment, and notice to the drawer and indorser given. 3. Because, in the instruction, a decision in 2 Washington's Rep., 191, 157, was not followed, on which the plaintiff relied. 4. Because the court refused to charge the jury, upon the request of plaintiff's counsel, that unless the jury are satisfied, from the testimony, there was an express agreement by the plaintiff to take the thousand dollars' draft in payment, and at his own risk; that the plaintiff was but the agent of King for the collection of said draft; and that the draft remained his property, and at his risk; and that although the draft was not presented for payment at maturity, and no notice of non-payment given, yet that constitutes no defense to this action. 5. That if the draft was not taken in payment, although no notice was given, if thereby the amount of the draft, or any part, were lost, by reason of such neglect, it was a ground of action for damages he thereby sustained against the plaintiff by the defendant. 6. Because the court charged the jury that, by failing to make the demand and give notice, the plaintiff made the bill his own, and that the remedy against the defendant upon the open account was consequently lost. Other causes were assigned, but which are substantially embraced in those above stated.

§ 1041. Note or bill no payment unless accepted as such.

There can be no doubt that where a bill has been received payable on time, that it is no discharge of a pre-existing debt, unless there be an agreement to that effect. Nor would a draft payable on presentation be a payment unless it was agreed to be so received. Until the money on a bill is paid, it is at the risk of the drawer and the holder of the bill; whether he be entitled to the money, or a mere agent for the drawer, he is bound to make the demand, and give notice of non-payment, and if he fail he will, in many cases, be responsible to the drawer or indorser for damages.

§ 1042. Measure of damages for failure to make demand.

The damages are not to be estimated by the face of the bill, in regard to the drawer, he having no effects in the hands of the drawee, but by the actual damages suffered by him. It is true when the holder of a bill, regularly negotiated, neglects to make a demand at its maturity, and give notice, he loses his recourse against the names on the bill, who are entitled to notice. There is no evidence to show that the bill in question was taken in payment. It must then have been received for the purpose of applying the proceeds, when paid, to the payment of the balance due by the defendant to the plaintiff. 8 John., 389; 5 John., 69; 5 Wend., 492; 9 John., 310; 1 Cowen, 306; 4 Mason, 248. If it be agreed to receive the bill in payment, the rule is different. 5 John., 69; 3 Cowen, 303; 3 Wend., 344; 10 Pet., 532. In all cases the plaintiff may produce the note at the trial to be canceled. 10 John., 104; 15 John., 249; 8 Cowen, 80. And the court will require the bill to be produced.

§ 1043. An agent failing to make demand and give notice is liable for damages.

The holder of the bill, being an agent merely, is not considered a party to it. As, where a bill is forwarded to a bank for collection, and demand or notice is neglected, the bank is responsible only for the damages sustained, and they are to be ascertained by a jury. The same principle, it is contended, applies where a bill is received, the proceeds of which, when received, are to discharge a debt. Until the proceeds shall be received, the risk is the drawer's, and if there be a failure, the agent is responsible to the extent of the damages suffered. This, it is argued, is under the law of agency. Story on Agency, 217; 20 John., 384; 3 Cowen, 662. "The drawer of a bill, or the indorser of a note, is not discharged by the omission of the holder to make presentment or demand, or to give notice of non-acceptance or non-payment, where it is clearly shown that he has sustained no damages in consequence of such omission." Commercial Bank of Albany v. Hughes, 17 Wend., 94.

§ 1044. When presumption of damages from failure of demand and notice is held to be rebutted.

Where this duty of an agent has been neglected, damages are presumed, but this presumption is rebutted by proof of the entire want of effects in the hands of the drawee continually, from the time of drawing the bill, until and after the day it fell due, and this under such circumstances as to show that the drawer had no right to expect payment.

§ 1045. Every person whose name is on a bill, or who has any recourse on another, is entitled to notice.

In Dennis v. Morrice, 3 Esp. R., 158, an action was brought by an indorser against the drawer; it appeared that no notice had been given to the defendant of non-payment by the acceptor, to excuse which, the plaintiff offered to prove that in fact the defendant had not been prejudiced by the want of such notice. But Lord Kenyon said: the only case in which notice is dispensed with is where the drawer has no effects in the hands of the drawee. The rule is, that every person is entitled to notice whose name is on the bill, and who has any recourse against some other person or persons. On this ground it was held by Lord Kenyon, in 1 Pardess, 459, in an action against the indorser of a bill, drawn by Vaughan on Eustace and Holland; it appeared that notice had not been given to defendant, upon which plaintiff offered to show that Vaughan had no effects in the hands of Eustace and Holland; but the court said that the want of effects in the hands of the drawee by the drawer will not avail the plaintiff, and that the rule extends only to actions brought against the drawer; the indorser is in all cases entitled to notice, for he has no concern with the accounts between the drawer and the drawee. "The plaintiff then proved a letter from the defendant, acknowledging the debt and promising to pay, and upon that he had a verdict."

§ 1046. One who receives bill to apply proceeds on debt due him is a party to it, not an agent to collect it.

Now, if the plaintiff in this case was strictly a party to the bill, his recourse against King, the indorser, was lost by not giving him notice. For it seems he has nothing to do with the matter of account between the drawer and drawee. From the statement of the drawer, there can be no doubt that King had his recourse against the drawer of the bill, who admitted his liability continued. From this it would seem that he could have had no effects in the hands of Ogden, or any just expectation that any one would honor the bill. But still the question recurs, did the plaintiff, by failing to give notice to the indorser, release him from responsibility. And if he did, can the fact be set up in defense to the present action? Although the bill was not received by the plaintiff in payment, yet he cannot be treated as a mere agent. The proceeds of the bill, when received, were his, to be applied in part payment of the balance due him. He was the holder of the bill, and neither the drawer nor indorser had a right to withdraw it, nor take any steps in regard to it, which might in the least degree be prejudicial to the interest of the plaintiff. Now this is not the case with a mere agent, who has no interest in the bill, and the owner of it has a right to withdraw it, or appropriate the proceeds of it as may suit his convenience. In this view, it is difficult to distinguish between the rights and duties of the plaintiff in regard to the bill, and those which appertain to the holder who has received the bill in the ordinary course of business. It is his property, and he has a right to negotiate it if he shall choose to do so. He may receive payment of it in property, and make any other disposition of the bill that may be convenient for him. He is, then, more than an agent. He is the holder of the bill, and has recourse against the indorser, on condition of demand and notice. The drawer may be responsible, but the question here is, whether the indorser is responsible, no notice having been given to him of the non-payment of the bill? He was entitled to notice, and the fact that the drawer still acknowledges himself responsible does not, as regards the indorser, affect the question. In failing to give the notice, the plaintiff made the bill his own, and his recourse against the indorser is lost. He received the bill and was bound, by the commercial law, to demand payment and give notice. Whatever recourse the plaintiff may have against the drawer, he can have none against the indorser as such. And if he cannot recover in this form, by reason of his negligence, it is a good defense against an action on the original consideration. Had the plaintiff given the notice, he might have had his choice, whether to proceed against the defendant, as indorser, or on the original ground of action.

The evidence of the drawer was rightfully rejected, as his admission of liability on the bill could not affect the rights of the defendant in this action. And this was the object for which the witness was offered. Upon the whole, the motion for a new trial is overruled.

CHICOPEE BANK v. PHILADELPHIA BANK.

(8 Wallace, 641-650. 1869.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A bill was sent for collection by the Philadelphia Bank to the Chicopee Bank, which, inclosed in a letter, was laid on the cashier's table, slipped through a crack into a pile of loose papers and was lost until after its maturity. No offer to pay it was made by the acceptor, nor was any presentment made or any regular notice given, nor indeed any notice at all until too late. The Philadelphia Bank sued the Chicopee Bank because its negligence had caused the discharge of the indorsers. Judgment for plaintiffs.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE NELSON.

The case was put to the jury, whether or not the loss of the bill, and consequent inability of the collection bank to take the proper steps against the acceptors to charge the prior parties, was attributable to negligence, and want of care on the part of the Chicopee Bank, and that if it was, the bank was responsible. The jury found for the plaintiffs.

§ 1048. Law of demand and notice.

In cases where the drawee accepts the bill, generally, in order to charge the drawer or indorser, the holder must present the paper, when due, at his place of business, if he has one; if not, at his dwelling or residence, and demand payment; and if the money is not paid, give due notice to the prior parties. If he accepts the bill, payable at a particular place, it must be presented at that place, and payment demanded. In these instances, as a general rule, the bill must be present when the demand is made, as in case of payment the acceptor is entitled to it as his voucher. When the bill is made payable at a bank, it has been held that the presence of the bill in the bank at maturity, with the fact that the acceptor had no funds there, or, if he had, were not to be applied to payment of the paper, constitute a sufficient presentment and demand; and, if the bill is the property of the bank, the presence of the paper there need not be proved, as the presumption of law is, that the paper was in the bank, and the burden rests upon the defendant to show that the acceptor called to pay it. Chitty on Bills, p. 865*a*, 353, Springfield ed., 1842; 1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, pp. 363, 421, 437; Byles on Bills, p. 251 and note; Fullerton v. Bank of United States, 1 Pet., 604 (§§ 1200-1204, infra); Bank of United States v. Carneal, 2 id., 543 (§§ 964-971, supra); Seneca Co. Bank v. Neass, 5 Denio, 329; Bank v. Napier, 6 Humph., 270; Folger v. Chase, 18 Pick., 63.

§ 1049. The presence of a bill in a bank, if unknown to the cashier, is not a sufficient presentment and demand.

In the present case it is argued that the bill was in the Chicopee Bank at the time of its maturity, and as the acceptors had no funds there, a sufficient presentment and demand were made according to the law merchant. It is true the bill was there physically, but within the sense of this law it was no more present at the bank than if it had been lost in the street by the messenger on his way from the postoffice to the bank, and had remained there at maturity; and this loss, which occasioned the failure to take the proper steps, or rather, in the present case, to furnish the holder with the proper evidence of the dishonor of the paper, so as to charge the prior parties, and enable him to have recourse against them, is wholly attributable, according to the verdict of the jury, to the collecting bank. In the eye of the law merchant there was no presentment or demand against the acceptors; and, as a consequence of this default, the holder has lost his remedy against the drawer and indorser, which entitles him to one against the defendant. The radical vice in the defense being the failure to prove a presentment and demand upon the acceptors at the maturity of the bill, the question of notice is unimportant.

But if it had been otherwise, the notice itself was utterly defective. That relied on is the answer of the defendant to the telegram of the plaintiff of the 20th February, which was that the bill had not yet been received. This was after its maturity, and it simply advised the holder and payee indorser, to whom the information was communicated the same day, that the drawer and indorser were discharged from any liability on the paper. It showed that the proper steps had not been taken against the acceptors to charge them.

§ 1051. Refusal to instruct as to burden of proving negligence.

Some criticism is made upon the refusal of the court below to charge as to which side the burden of proof belonged in respect to the question of negligence and want of care, after the paper came into the hands of the defendant. No objection is taken to the charge itself upon this question, and indeed could not have been, as the point was submitted to the jury as favorably to the defendants as could have been asked. We think the court, after having submitted fairly the evidence on both sides bearing upon the question, had a right, in the exercise of its discretion, to refuse the request.

§ 1052. When a bank loses a bill remitted to it for collection, negligence is presumed, and the burden is upon the bank to rebut that presumption.

If, however, the court had inclined to go further and charge as to the burden of proof, it should have been that it belonged to the defendant. The loss of the bill by the bank carried with it the presumption of negligence and want of care; and if it was capable of explanation, so as to rebut this presumption, the facts and circumstances were peculiarly in the possession of its officers, and the defendant was bound to furnish it. Where a peculiar obligation is cast upon a person to take care of goods intrusted to his charge, if they are lost or damaged while in his custody, the presumption is that the loss or damage was occasioned by his negligence, or want of care of himself or of his servants. This presumption arises with respect to goods lost or injured which have been deposited in a public inn, or which had been intrusted to a common carrier. But the presumption may be rebutted. Dawson v. Chamney, 5 Q. B., 164; Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym., 918; Day v. Riddle, 16 Vt., 48; 1 Phillips on Ev., Cowen & Hill's Notes, p. 633.

Judgment affirmed.

ESSEX COUNTY NATIONAL BANK v. BANK OF MONTREAL.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 7 Bissell, 193-200. 1876.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A. sent B. a check to collect. B. presented it, and was told that the cashier was out and that it could not be paid until he came in. B. presented it a second time, was met with the same reply, and thereupon requested that the check be certified, which was done, but the next day the bank failed. The check was never paid, and A. sues B. for the amount of it.

Opinion by HOPKINS, J.

The testimony is not very clear as to whether the bank had currency enough on the 9th to pay the check, if payment had been insisted upon, but as this point is not material in the view I have taken of the law of this case, I shall not stop to settle it; when it was presented after certification it was not paid because the bank was insolvent.

§ 1053. Duty of agents in collecting a check stated.

The defendants had the check to collect. It was transmitted to them for that purpose, and their duty as collecting agents was to present and demand payment within the time prescribed by law, and, if not paid, notify the proper parties of its dishonor. If that had been done, the rights and remedies of all parties liable upon it, when it came into their hands, would have remained intact. If loss occurs by the acts or omissions of the party thus assuming the duty of collection, it should fall upon the delinquent agent, not upon the absent owner.

§ 1054. Drawee of bank check not liable to any but the drawer thereof until acceptance.

The State Street Savings Bank was not liable to the holder of the check without acceptance. It was liable before acceptance only to the drawers. Chapman v. White, 6 N. Y., 412. It could not be made liable to the holder of the check except by its own consent. It had the funds of the drawers, and according to the usual course of dealing with its customers was under obligation to pay on demand all checks drawn upon it by them, but a refusal to do so would not give the holder of the check the right to sue the bank. The drawer in such case would be liable, and he could sue the bank immediately, without redeeming the check, and the bank would be liable for damages for its refusal to perform its undertaking with him as depositor. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604; Bank of Republic v. Millard, id., 152 (§§ 349, 350, supra).

§ 1055. The collecting agent of a check, who accepts a certification thereof by the drawee, becomes liable to the payee for the amount of the check.

This being the law, the duty of the defendant, upon receipt of the check for collection, was plain. It was to present it for payment, and only for payment. This it did at first, and if it had stopped then there would have been no liability upon it. But it did not; it went farther; it asked for and received the certification of the bank upon the check. By this act a new relation was created between the parties. The amount the check called for was withdrawn from the drawers' account and control, and thereafter they had no right of action for it against the bank. The technical operation of the transaction was a transfer to the holder of the check of the drawers' funds and right of action against the bank. It superseded the previous rights and obligations of the parties, particularly of the drawers. Before that the drawers could have stopped payment of the check or withdrawn the funds by other checks. After the certification they had no control over the fund or action of the bank in reference to it, nor any right to sue the bank for it. Nor did the bank owe them any duty in relation to it. It no longer possessed the character of a check. If the drawers had taken it up before its certification it would have been useless, but after that they could only get the money by surrendering it. It resembled after certification more a certificate of deposit than a check. Now, what was the effect upon the legal rights and liability of the drawers? Did it not discharge them from all further liability upon the check? And if such should be found to be the consequence, does it not follow that the defendants are liable to the owners for the amount? If they have by their acts released the responsible drawers, whereby the instrument is made worthless, why should they not make good the loss?

In Smith v. Millar, 43 N. Y., 176, it is said that presenting a check for payment and accepting a certificate as good "is equivalent to payment." In Morse on Banking, p. 282, it is laid down that, if the holder chooses to accept the bank's certification, no matter to suit whose convenience, there can be but one result. The promise of the bank on the drawer's account, accepted as satisfactory by the creditor, discharges the debtor, and by the same action deprives him of all further concern in the premises. The bank no longer owes him any duty which he can enforce, or for the breach of which he can sue. If this is the result of the act of the defendant in accepting the certification of the check, it would seem too clear for discussion that the defendant had incurred a liability to pay the amount of it to its principal. The drawers being released by the certification, and the bank being unable to pay, it follows irresistibly that the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the party releasing the drawers, whereby the amount of the check is lost to them.

It was claimed on the part of the defendant on the trial that the plaintiff must show some damages by the act. If the act released a responsible party that would be damage enough. But the law presumes damages from the negligence or unauthorized act of the collecting agent of commercial paper whereby any party to it is released or not charged. Commercial Bank of Albany v. Hughes, 17 Wend., 94. And if this presumption is not conclusive, but liable to be overthrown by proof to the contrary, it is the duty of the party at fault to show clearly that no damages did result to the holder of the paper from their negligence, which in this case the defendant did not do. It did not clearly show that the check would not have been paid on the 9th of August if payment had been insisted upon.

§ 1057. Agent to collect a check assumes risk of payment when he gets the paper certified.

I think the only safe and maintainable doctrine in this case is that the defendant assumed the risk of payment by the bank when it accepted the certification, and if the bank did not pay, then it must. In laying down this rule I assume that the certificate operated as a release or payment as to the drawers, and that they were no longer liable upon the paper. This release I regard as the pivotal point in this case, and upon that point I am not forced to rely upon my own judgment. I find the precise question has been decided by the court of appeals of New York in the case of the First National Bank of Jersey City v. Leach, 52 N. Y., 350. That was an action on a check drawn by defendant on the 21st of November, 1871, on the Ocean National Bank, payable December 12, 1871. The bank, the plaintiff in that case, discounted it for the payee, and at eleven o'clock A. M., on the 12th day of December, they presented it to the Ocean Bank and got it certified as good. The drawer then had an account there sufficient to pay it, which was on the certification charged up to him on the Ocean Bank books. Within an hour after that the Ocean Bank suspended. The check was again presented on that day for payment, and was duly protested for non-payment. The bank then sued the drawer to recover the amount of it. The court upon that state of facts held that the plaintiff could not recover; that the certification operated as a payment as between the holder and drawer. In the opinion it is said, "the law will not permit a check, when due, to be then presented and the money left with the bank for the accommodation of the holder without discharging the drawer;" that if the holder chooses to have it certified instead of paid, he will do so at the peril of discharging the drawer. But they say that "this would not discharge the drawer of a check who himself procured it to be certified and then put it in circulation; that the reason of the rule would not apply to him;" and conclude the opinion by saying, "that upon principle it must be held that the bank holds the money after certification by request of the holder, not at the risk of the drawer, but of the holder of the check." This is the only direct authority I have found upon this question, from which I judge that the practice of holders of checks getting them certified is not very usual, for if it were, other cases would have found their way into the books and come under judicial consideration.

The defendant on the trial cited Bickford v. First National Bank of Chicago, 42 Ill., 239, and Bounds v. Smith, id., 245. From an examination of those cases, I do not see that they conflict with the case of Bank v. Leach, 52 N. Y., supra. In those cases the checks were certified at the request of the drawer before delivery. This expressly appears in the last case, and the judge in his opinion in that says, "the case in all its important features is the same as Bickford v. Bank," so that I may assume that the checks in both these cases were certified by request of the drawer, which presents an entirely different question from this, and leaves the point involved here unconsidered in those cases. In Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill., 497, cited by the defendant's counsel, the check was also certified by the request of the drawer before it was passed by him, so that the reasoning of the court in that case was not predicated upon the same facts as appear here. But, as I understand those cases, that court holds that a check operates to transfer the amount named in it to the payee, and authorizes him to sue for and receive it from the bank. If such is the doctrine of that court, I am not at liberty to follow it, for the supreme court of the United States, in the Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 10 Wall., 152, has decided differently. And as the question involved is one relating to commercial securities, and belongs to the domain of general jurisprudence, this court is not bound by the decision of the state courts where the matters arise. Township of Pine Grove v. Talcott, 19 Wall., 666. But, waiving this view and difference between the courts on this point, I do not think that the decision of the learned court of Illinois above referred to, when carefully examined, will be found to touch the point involved here. It was not before that court in either of those cases, and, although the general language used might seem to be in conflict with the conclusions I have reached in this case, still, when read and considered as used in reference to the facts and question before that court, no conflict or discrepancy of opinion will be found to exist. Those cases are clearly distinguishable on the facts from this case, and are, therefore, not authority upon the point involved here. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the defendant is liable for the amount of the check, with interest from the certification, as by its certification the drawers were discharged.

A question was suggested as to the right of this plaintiff to sue the defendant, as it was not its agent, alluding to the recent decision of the supreme court of the United States in Hoover v. Wise, 1 Otto, 308, but it was stated, and not disputed, that the plaintiff's attorneys had authority to sue in the name of the German-American Bank as well as in the name of the present plaintiff, the real owner, and that an amendment, under the laws of the state, was allowable, in the discretion of the court, by inserting the name of the German-American Bank as plaintiff in lieu of the present plaintiffs, and as the decision making the change necessary has been announced since the commencement of the suit, and as no injury can result, as it appears to the court, to the defendant thereby, I direct and allow an amendment in that respect, by striking out of the process and pleadings the name of the present plaintiff, and inserting in lieu thereof the name of the German-American Bank, and as so amended that judgment be entered for plaintiff and against defendant for $882.76, the amount of the check and interest, with costs of this suit to be taxed.

BIRD v. LOUISIANA STATE BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case was tried by the court below, a jury being waived. From the findings of fact it appears that R. A. Stewart made a promissory note at New Orleans, on the 28th of January, 1859, payable to the order of H. Doyal, at twelve months after date, with interest, at the Citizens' Bank, New Orleans, and that said note was indorsed by Doyal. A. Bird, of Manchac, La., as the agent of John Bird, of St. Louis, Mo. (the testator of the plaintiffs), before the maturity of the note, indorsed it, and deposited it in the branch of the Louisiana State Bank, at Baton Rouge, for collection. W. S. Pike, the cashier of the said branch bank, indorsed the note, as cashier, before its maturity, and transmitted it for collection to the defendant—the mother bank at New Orleans. When it became due, the defendant placed it in the hands of the notary, whom it usually employed in its own business, for demand of payment and protest; and said notary duly made demand, and protested the note for non-payment, and mailed notices for the indorsers to Pike, cashier of the branch bank at Baton Rouge. Doyal, the indorser, on whom reliance was principally placed, resided, when the note was made and indorsed, on a plantation at New River, in the parish of Ascension, which adjoins that of Baton Rouge; but he died two days afterwards, and executors of his will were immediately qualified. No notice of protest was served on them, and for this cause, in an action brought against them by the plaintiffs, they were held not liable. No suit was ever brought against the maker of the note, he being wholly without credit, as to the payment of any debt when it became payable; and as to him the note is now prescribed. Neither the notary, nor any of the officers of the bank or branch, knew of Doyal's death when the note was protested, nor does it appear that it was known to the testator of the plaintiffs. This suit was brought to recover the amount of the note from the defendant, by reason of its alleged negligence in not giving notice to the executors of the indorser, Doyal, whereby the liability of his estate was lost. The court, having found these facts, and some others which we do not deem material to the decision, gave judgment for the defendant; whereupon the plaintiffs brought this writ of error.

§ 1059. Agent's negligence in failing to notify prior indorser of non-payment.

Without stopping to inquire whether the mother bank and its notary did their whole duty in reference to protesting the note, and giving notice to the indorsers, we think it manifest that the branch bank was delinquent, after receiving the notices from the notary, in not giving notice to Bird and the executors of Doyal, or at least to Bird. Had the notices been sent to the latter, it would then have been his duty to notify the executors of Doyal; but the branch bank, so far as appears from the facts found in this case, did neither. The inclosing of notices by the notary to the branch was notice to it that he (the notary) had not served them on the prior indorsers. And as an agent, charged with the duty of collecting the note, and doing whatever was necessary to insure the liability of the indorsers if it was not paid, the branch was bound to give notice of its non-payment, at least to its principal, in order that he might do what was requisite to protect himself.

§ 1060. Parent bank liable for negligence of its branches.

The neglect to do this rendered the branch bank liable to the plaintiffs' testator for the loss of the money; and it is conceded that the negligence of the branch bank is chargeable upon the defendant. They are one concern as to liability, though treated as separate establishments and distinct entities in the transaction of business.

§ 1061. Holder's laches in not prosecuting maker of note; limitation or prescription.

The only remaining question is, whether the plaintiffs or their testator have by their conduct or laches released the defendant from liability. It is contended that the holder of the note was bound to prosecute the maker, or to have prosecuted his claim against the defendant in time to enable it to do so, on being subrogated to his rights; whereas, the plaintiffs have delayed this suit until all claim against the maker is lost by prescription; and that it is no answer to this defense to say that the maker was insolvent when the note became due, as he may have since become abundantly able to pay. There is much plausibility in this position; but a careful examination of the dates shows that the note was not prescribed on the 5th of January, 1870, when the plaintiffs made a legal demand on the defendant by instituting this action. Less than ten years had then elapsed since the maturity of the note, and, deducting the period during which the war continued, according to the rule adopted in the case of The Protector, 12 Wall., 700, it will appear that the time of prescription of five years had not elapsed. The defendant, by paying the note at that time, could have been subrogated to the rights of the plaintiffs, and maintained suit against the maker in their names. The court below seems to have supposed that the time of trial was the point of time to which the estimate was to be made; but in this it was mistaken. The time of commencing the action was the proper point.

Judgment reversed, and record remanded, with directions to award a venire de novo.

§ 1063. In a suit against A. and B. as partners, on a bill drawn by A., want of notice of non-acceptance is not excused by proof of an agreement between the plaintiff and A. Nicholson v. Patton,* 2 Cr. C. C., 184.

§ 1064. A conversation by the indorser with the indorsee, requesting the latter to pursue the maker, is not evidence of a waiver of demand and notice; but the jury may infer due notice from such fact. Riggs v. St. Claire,* 1 Cr. C. C., 606.

§ 1065. Objection of want of notice may be waived after notice of laches. Bank of Columbia v. Mackall,* 2 Cr. C. C., 681.

§ 1066. A general agent authorized to draw checks and generally to transact business for the drawer may waive notice of non-payment. In re Brown, 2 Story, 502 (§§ 807-811).

§ 1067. Joint indorsers; notice; contribution.— Where there are two joint indorsers, notice of non-payment must be given to both; and if one who has notice pays the note, he cannot recover a moiety from the one who had no notice. Gantt v. Jones,* 1 Cr. C. C., 210.

§ 1068. Want of funds; reasonable expectation; indorsee.— The fact that the drawee of a bill of exchange has in his hands no funds of the drawers, nor any reasonable ground to expect that the bill will be honored, affords no ground for dispensing with notice of the dishonor of the bill to an innocent indorsee who has paid full value for it. Ramdulolliday v. Darieux,* 4 Wash., 61. See § 919.

§ 1069. Where the drawer has no funds in the hands of the drawee, protest for non-acceptance is unnecessary; and suit may be brought immediately on non-acceptance. Baker v. Gallagher,* 1 Wash., 461.

§ 1070. A., having no funds in bank, lent his check to B., who delivered it to C. Held, that if A. expected that funds would be placed in the bank by B. to meet the check, and this was known to C., A. was entitled to notice of non-payment. Mackall v. Goszler,* 2 Cr. C. C., 240.

§ 1071. No notice of non-payment is necessary to charge a drawer where the drawee has not in fact, nor in the expectancy of the drawer, any funds in his hands at the time fixed for payment, and has made no arrangements with the drawer at all events to pay the bill. Especially is this the law where the drawer has withdrawn all the funds in the drawee's hands before acceptance, and has since intercepted funds which might have come into the drawee's hands with which to pay the bill. Valk v. Simmons,* 4 Mason, 118.

§ 1072. Notice is not necessary to charge an indorser who knew at the time of his indorsement that the drawer had no right to draw. Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cr., 270.

§ 1073. The drawer is not entitled to notice of non-payment, if he had not funds in the hands of the drawee. Cox v. Simms,* 1 Cr. C. C., 228.

§ 1074. Days of grace.— Where payment of a note was demanded on the third day of grace, notice given on the next day is good. Read v. Carberry,* 2 Cr. C. C., 417; Bank v. Walker,* 2 Cr. C. C., 294. See §§ 284, 719-725, 841.

§ 1075. Where a foreign bill is protested for non-acceptance, the holder must give notice as soon as possible under all the circumstances, according to the usual course of communication, whether by land or water. Lindenberger v. Wilson,* 1 Cr. C. C., 840.

§ 1076. Notice to an indorser on the third day of grace is sufficient. Lindenberger v. Beall,* 6 Wheat., 104. See §§ 904, 905, 917, 918.

§ 1077. Notice to the indorser on the last day of grace, after three o'clock P. M., not good. Auld v. Mandeville, 2 Cr. C. C., 187. Contra, Munroe v. Mandeville,* 2 Cr. C. C., 187.

§ 1078. Where a note matures on Saturday, notice to the indorser on Monday is good. Crawford v. Milligan,* 2 Cr. C. C., 228.

§ 1079. A usage to give notice on the day following the last day of grace binds an indorser who knows and assents to it. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence,* 2 Cr. C. C., 510.

§ 1080. By mail; time.— Where an indorser resides in a different place from the holder, notice of default of the maker of a note should be put into the postoffice early enough on the last day of grace to be sent by the mail of the succeeding day. Lenox v. Roberts,* 2 Wheat., 373. See §§ 902, 903, 912, 913.

§ 1081. Notice should be mailed so as to go by the first mail leaving after the opening of business hours of the day succeeding the last day of grace. Fullerton v. Bank of United States, 1 Pet., 604.

§ 1082. Saturday being the last day of grace, notice was put in the postoffice on Monday. Held, too late. It should have been mailed Saturday or Sunday. King v. Foyles,* 2 Cr. C. C., 303.

§ 1083. A note matured on Saturday. Held, that notice of its dishonor should have been mailed to an indorser the following Monday before the departure of the mail carrying letters in the indorser's direction. This mail left at three P. M. The notice was not in fact put into the postoffice until seven P. M. of Monday, and was decided insufficient. Seventh Ward Bank v. Hanrick,* 2 Story, 416.

§ 1084. The general rule is that notice to an indorser must be personal, or left at his usual place of abode, business or "the place where he ought to be found." If the indorser and holder live in the same town or postoffice district, a notice left in the postoffice is not sufficient, unless sanctioned by usage of the banks. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence,* 2 Cr. C. C., 510.

§ 1085. A notice not mailed until the day after the note was dishonored is too late. Bank of Alexandria v. Swann,* 4 Cr. C. C., 136.

§ 1086. Where notice to the indorser at Alexandria was put into the postoffice at Washington on the day after the last day of grace, and after the Alexandria mail had closed, it was held too late. The Bank v. Swann,* 2 Cr. C. C., 368.

§ 1087. Leaving a notice of demand and non-payment in the postoffice, all parties living in the same city, and the person notified in fact receiving the notice, is sufficient. Hyslop v. Jones,* 3 McL., 96.

§ 1088. Demand of payment should be made on the last day of grace, and notice of the default of the maker should be put into the postoffice early enough to be sent by the mail of the succeeding day. Lenox v. Roberts,* 2 Wheat., 373.

§ 1089. The question as to the residence of the indorser of a note at the time it was protested, and whether the postoffice to which notice was sent was the one nearest the residence of the indorser at that time, are questions for the jury; and if it is found that notice was sent to the nearest postoffice, it is sufficient notice to the indorser, and that the holder used due diligence. Whitney v. Hunt, 5 Cr. C. C., 120.

§ 1090. A notary having made demand and protest in New York must deposit the notice in the postoffice, directed to the party notified. Orr v. Lacey,* 4 McL., 243.

§ 1091. Where notice to an indorser is sent by mail it must be directed to the postoffice of his place of residence. Fowler v. Warfield,* 4 Cr. C. C., 71.

§ 1092. The indorser had an office in town, at which he generally attended every day, and in his absence had a servant there to receive messages, etc. He lived five miles out of town, and the town postoffice was the nearest office. Held, that a notice put into the town postoffice was not sufficient without proof that the indorser actually received it on the day on which it was put into the mail. Nowell v. Patton,* 2 Cr. C. C., 312.

§ 1093. It is not indispensable to send a notice to an indorser's nearest postoffice, if he is in the habit of receiving his mail from another postoffice more remote from him. Sherman v. Clark,* 3 McL., 91.

§ 1094. An indorser lived about two hundred yards outside the city limits, and about half a mile from the banking house where the note was payable. Notice of protest was deposited in the postoffice. And there was testimony tending to show that he did not receive it until seven days had elapsed, and that he had a place of business in the city which he attended daily. Held, that if this was a place where his own business was conducted by him — a place known to be his place of doing business, — notice of protest ought to have been left there, and could not have been given through the postoffice, although if given in the latter mode and actually received by the indorser from the postoffice on that day or the next, or if within such time it was received from the postoffice by those in charge of his business house, it would be sufficient. Spalding v. Krutz,* 1 Dill., 414.

§ 1095. Notice to indorser's employee. — A notary went to the indorser's shop and demanded payment. He did not remember whether he demanded it of the indorser or of his employee, but thought he did not see the indorser. Held, not a sufficient notice of non-payment by the maker. Mechanics' Bank v. Taylor,* 2 Cr. C. C., 217. See §§ 888-890.

§ 1096. Notice to assignee. — Both maker and indorsers of a note became bankrupt and the same assignee was appointed for each. Held, that generally notice of protest might be given to the bankrupt or the assignee, as might be most convenient to the holder; but that in this case no notice to either was necessary, the assignee having, as assignee of the bankrupt maker, knowledge of the non-payment of the note, and his knowledge as such assignee being imputable to the indorsers whose assignee he also was. Russell v. Paul,* 16 N. B. R., 477.

§ 1097. Notice to members of congress.— Leaving a notice at the postoffice of the place where an indorser resides is not a good service; it must be delivered personally to the indorser or left at his place of business or dwelling. If the indorsers are members of congress, they are residents of Washington for the time being, and leaving notices in the postoffices of the respective houses of congress to which they belong is not a good service. Such postoffices cannot on principle be considered as different from the postoffice of the city. Hill v. Norvell,* 3 McL., 582.

§ 1098. Notice given to servant.— A written notice of the dishonor of a note, delivered to a servant of the indorser at the indorser's dwelling, is sufficient. Greatrake v. Brown, 1 Cr. C. C., 541.

§ 1099. To attorney; executors.— Notice of non-payment given to the attorney of the indorser, after the death of the indorser, will not excuse the holder from giving notice to the indorser's executors. Bank of Washington v. Pierson, 2 Cr. C. C., 685.

§ 1100. Death of indorser; notice.— A notice of non-payment left with a person who was authorized by the indorser, when alive, to receive such notices for him, does not bind executors of the indorser. Brent v. Bank of Washington, 2 Cr. C. C., 517.

§ 1101. Indorser's deputy.— Delivery of the note to the indorser's deputy is not per se notice. Bank of Columbia v. Mackall, 2 Cr. C. C., 681.

§ 1102. Demand at bank.— Dishonor.— Demand at the bank where a note is payable will charge the indorser; and if the maker has no funds there, the note is dishonored. The Bank v. Oneale,* 2 Cr. C. C., 466.

§ 1103. Where the payee sues, he need not prove demand at the place specified in the note. Beverley v. Beverley,* 2 Cr. C. C., 470.

§ 1104. Leaving notice in indorser's room.— It is competent to prove that an indorser, who is a clerk, has a separate room in which he attends to the business of his employer, and that a written notice was left at such room, though the indorser was not there. Bank of United States v. Macdonald,* 4 Cr. C. C., 624.

§ 1105. At shop of indorser's son.— Notice left at the shop of the indorser's son is insufficient, although the shop was in the dwelling-house of the indorser, but having a separate entrance. The Bank v. Corcoran,* 3 Cr. C. C., 46.

§ 1106. Leaving at house.— Where the notary calls at the dwelling-house of the indorser, and does not find him at home, he may leave the notice with the person who comes to the door when he knocks. Cana v. Friend,* 2 Cr. C. C., 870.

§ 1108. Absence in New York.— Notice in Philadelphia.— An indorser's known place of residence was in Philadelphia. He was in the habit of visiting other cities temporarily. He went to New York intending to embark for England, but informed no one of his intention. Held, that a notice of non-payment left at his known place of residence in Philadelphia was sufficient. MMurtrie v. Jones,* 3 Wash., 206.

§ 1109. Personal service.— Where made.— Where the service of notice of demand is personal, it is immaterial where it was made. Hyslop v. Jones,* 3 McL., 96.

§ 1110. Death; leaving notice with son.— Where a note became due on the 8th-11th, and the indorser died on the 9th, a notice left at his counting-house, with his son, on the 11th, was sufficient. The Bank v. King,* 2 Cr. C. C., 570.

§ 1111. So where another note matured on the 15th-18th, a notice left with the son on the 18th was good, although the administrator was appointed on that day. Ibid.

§ 1112. But where the next note matured on the 22d-25th, notice served on the son is not sufficient. Ibid.

§ 1113. Surety.— Where a party signs as surety for any part of the amount of the note, he is entitled to strict notice; but he is not entitled to notice if he was jointly interested in property the forfeiture of which was prevented by the execution of the note. Thornton v. Stoddert,* 1 Cr. C. C., 534.

§ 1114. To accommodation indorser.— An accommodation indorser is liable without strict notice, unless he has suffered damage from want of notice. Bank of Columbia v. French,* 1 Cr. C. C., 221.

§ 1115. To guarantor.— A collateral guarantor of a note, whose name is not indorsed upon it, is entitled to reasonable notice of demand and non-payment. Foot v. Brown, 2 McL., 369 (§§ 1088-40).

§ 1116. Claiming a credit.— Claiming a credit upon a note sued upon, without objection for want of demand and notice, is a waiver of such notice. Bank of United States v. Lyman, 1 Blatch., 297 (§§ 1189-98).

§ 1117. Part payment or acknowledgment.— A part payment, a promise to pay or an acknowledgment of liability, by an indorser of a promissory note, after its maturity, is presumptive evidence of presentment and notice. Bank of United States v. Lyman, * 20 Vt., 666.

§ 1118. Where an indorser, with knowledge that he has not had notice, promises to pay a balance due on the note if the maker does not, he waives notice. Perry v. Rhodes, * 2 Cr. C. C., 87; Sherman v. Clark, * 3 McL., 91.

§ 1119. Where the indorser, after suit brought, told a stranger that he was willing to pay the note if he knew the amount of the costs, held, that this did not dispense with proof of demand and notice, and of the defendant's handwriting. Gassaway v. Jones, * 2 Cr. C. C., 334.

§ 1120. Failure of holder to return bill.— If an indorser once receives due notice of the non-acceptance of a bill no delay of the holder to return the bill and demand payment takes away his right to recover upon it, although the drawer may in the intermediate time have failed. Wild v. Bank of Passamaquoddy, 3 Mason, 505 (§§ 308, 309).

§ 1121. Indorser also a joint maker; notice to.— An indorser who is jointly interested in the discount of a note is not entitled to notice of non-payment, notwithstanding he may have signed as surety for the amount in excess of his interest. The Bank v. Way, * 2 Cr. C. C., 249.

§ 1122. War; notice by packet; duplicate.— Where notice of protest was sent to an indorser in London, by a British packet, in time of war between England and France, and not followed by a duplicate, held, insufficient. Philips v. Janney, * 1 Cr. C. C., 502.

§ 1123. Premium notes; duty as to demand and notice.— The taking of a draft by a life insurance company, in payment of a premium, imposes upon it all the duties as to presentation and notice that devolve upon a holder who takes the draft for any other consideration; and a failure on the part of the company as to presentation and notice is a breach of duty that precludes it from claiming a forfeiture of the policy, unless such failure is excused by want of funds in the drawee's hands or by want of reasonable expectation that he will accept or pay it. Pendleton v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co., 5 Fed. R., 238.

§ 1124. Protest necessary on foreign bills.— A foreign bill of exchange, in order to charge the drawer, must have been regularly protested by a notary public. Orr v. Lacey, * 4 McL., 243.

§ 1125. Notice of non-acceptance should be given. United States v. Parker, * 4 Wash., 461.

§ 1126. Checks.— If payment of a check be refused, and notice is not given to the drawer, but the payee retain possession of the check until the bank fails, the loss falls upon the holder. Clark v. Metropolitan Nat. Bank, * 2 MacArth., 249.

§ 1127. The holder of a time check on a bank must give notice to the drawer if the bank refuse payment, and allege such notice in the declaration. Sherman v. Comstock, * 3 McL., 19.

§ 1128. Collateral security.— A creditor who takes a note as collateral security for a debt is not held to the same strict rule as to giving his indorser (debtor) notice of its non-payment at maturity as if the note were indorsed to him in the ordinary course of business. Westphal v. Ludlow, 2 McC., 506.

§ 1129. Where a debtor remits to his creditor a bill of exchange in discharge of the debt, and the creditor in any manner accepts it as such, the debtor is thereafter liable only as an indorser, and must have due notice of dishonor to be charged. Denniston v. Imbrie, 3 Wash., 396.

§ 1130. When notice is necessary.— A protest is only necessary in the case of foreign bills. It is not necessary to employ a notary to make demand of a promissory note. Nicholls v. Webb, 8 Wheat., 326; Young v. Bryan, 6 Wheat., 146; Ish v. Mills, * 1 Cr. C. C., 567. See §§ 880, 882, 886.

§ 1131. In Mississippi the holder of an inland bill of exchange can recover against an indorser the amount due on the bill, with interest, upon proof of default and notice; protest is only necessary to recover the five per cent. damages given by the statute. Wanzer v. Tupper, * 8 How., 234, following Bailey v. Dozier.

§ 1132. One who puts his name on the back of a note before delivery is considered by the law as a maker, and notice of its non-payment is not necessary to charge him upon it. McGee v. Connor, * 1 Utah T'y, 98.

§ 1133. Failure to give indorser notice of protest releases him. Craig v. Brown, * Pet. C. C., 171.

§ 1134. In Virginia an indorsee may recover against a remote indorser without giving notice of the maker's default or insolvency. Dunlop v. Silver, * 1 Cr. C. C., 27.

§ 1135. Conditional payment; notice to creditor.—Creditors of an indorser who transfers his bill to an agent for collection, directing him to pay such creditors out of its proceeds, are not entitled to notice of the dishonor of the bill, they not being parties or indorsers of it, and such creditors cannot hold the agent liable for a failure to give them notice. Hutz v. Karthause,* 4 Wash., 1.

§ 1136. Protest need not name bank officer who made demand.—A protest showing that the M. Bank, where a bill was payable, was the holder of it, and that the notary presented it for payment at the bank and demanded payment thereof, and was answered that it could not be paid, is sufficient. It is not necessary to give the name of the person or officer of the bank to whom it was presented, or by whom the notary was answered. Nor will a statement in the protest that the bill was presented to the proper officer of the bank give any additional validity to the protest. For when the law requires the bill to be presented to any particular person or officer of a bank, the protest must show that it was presented accordingly, and it would not be sufficient to say that he (the notary) presented it to the proper person. Hildeburn v. Turner,* 5 How., 69.

§ 1137. Error as to name in notice.—Notice of non-payment of a note of John B. is good as to a note by James B., if the indorser was not misled by the error. Underwood v. Huddestone,* 2 Cr. C. C., 93.

§ 1138. Protest must state demand.—A protest which stated that the notary had, upon the day following the last day of grace, demanded payment of the maker, who did not pay, and from the indorser, who did not pay, but did not state that he informed the indorser that a demand had been made upon the maker and payment refused, is not evidence of a sufficient notice. Bank of Alexandria v. Wilson,* 2 Cr. C. C., 5.

§ 1139. Protest; what sufficient.—A protest in which the notary swears that he made a demand for payment at the bank at the maturity of the bill; that he regularly protested it for non-payment and gave notice at a date named, which protest is sealed by the notary in the manner prescribed by the law of the place where the notary acts, is, prima facie, a sufficient protest. Orr v. Lacey,* 4 McL., 243.

§ 1140. A protest which states a demand on the drawer, the non-payment, and that notice was given to the indorser, is sufficient prima facie evidence of notice. Eldredge v. Chacon,* Crabbe, 296.

§ 1141. Misstatement of amount.—A notice of protest describing the note as being for $1,457, when in fact it was for $1,400, is not a good notice. Bank of Alexandria v. Swann,* 4 Cr. C. C., 136.

§ 1142. Reasonableness; question for jury.—Reasonableness of notice is a question for the jury. Cox v. Simms,* 1 Cr. C. C., 238; Ish v. Mills,* 1 Cr. C. C., 567.

§ 1143. Sufficiency a question of law.—The sufficiency of the protest and notice of dishonor of a bill is a question of law for the court. Watson v. Tarpley, 18 How., 517 (§§ 1174-77).

§ 1144. When the facts are not disputed, due notice of protest is a question of law. United States v. Barker,* 1 Paine, 156.

1145. Notice; requisites; printed signature.—The following notice of protest: "New York, 8d July, 1839, $2,250.00. Gentlemen—Please to take notice that a promissory note made by Sidney Ketchum, for $2,250.00, with interest, indorsed by you, is protested for non-payment, and that the holders look to you for payment thereof. Signed, Stephen Mernhew, Notary Public," and directed to the indorsers, contains all the requisites of a good notice, although the signature is printed, that being the mode of signing in New York. Cooper v. Gibbs,* 4 McL., 396; Spalding v. Krutz,* 1 Dill., 414. See §§ 883-890.

§ 1146. Notice must state demand.—A notice must be sufficient to apprise the drawer of the bill that it was not paid, though demand for payment was made, and that the holder will look to him for payment. Orr v. Lacey,* 4 McL., 243. See §§ 883-890.

§ 1147. Notice to an indorser that a bill has not been received by a bank for collection is not such a notice of non-payment as will bind the indorser and drawer, although the fact of non-payment might have been inferred from the fact of the non-receipt of the bill. Chicopee Bank v. Philadelphia Bank, 8 Wall., 641 (§§ 1048-52).

§ 1148. Protest need not go with notice.—The protest of non-acceptance or a copy thereof need not accompany the notice to the drawers. Wallace v. Agry, 4 Mason, 386 (§§ 773-776).

§ 1149. Nine days' delay fatal.—Where the parties live about two miles from each other, a delay of nine days in giving notice is fatal. Morris v. Gardner,* 1 Cr. C. C., 213.

§ 1150. Mistake in date.—Notice to an indorser is not vitiated by a mistake as to the date of the note. Bank of the United States v. Watterston,* 4 Cr. C. C., 445.

§ 1151. Notice may be written after business hours.—The certificate of a notary need not show that notice of demand and non-payment was written during business hours, after demand. Any time during the day will suffice. Bonner v. City of New Orleans, 2 Woods, 135.

§ 1152. By notary's clerk.—A notice of non-payment made by a clerk but signed by the notary is sufficient. Not being a matter regulated by statute, nor by local law, but of general commercial law, federal courts are not bound by state decisions as to the sufficiency of a notice of protest. Browning v. Andrews, * 3 McL., 576.

§ 1153. Negligence by agent in giving notice.—The agent of the United States treasury in New York, where the bills were drawn and where the drawer and indorsers resided, received a letter from the secretary of the treasury dated Washington, December 7, 1814, requesting him to notify the drawer and indorsers of the bills of the non-acceptance of the first set of bills, and notice was accordingly given on December 12, 1814. The mail which left Washington December 8th arrived in New York December 10th at 10:35 A. M. The agent received a letter from the secretary of the treasury, dated May 8, 1815, directing him to give notice of non-payment of the second set of bills to drawer and indorsers, and they were notified on May 12, 1815. Letters mailed in Washington on the 8th were proved to have reached New York on the 11th, early in the morning. No notice of non-acceptance of the second set of bills was proved. Held, not due diligence. United States v. Barker, * 12 Wheat., 559. See §§ 918, 938-937.

§ 1154. Presence of indorser.—The presence of the indorser at the time demand is made of the maker is not constructive notice, or such knowledge as will excuse notice. Grant v. Spencer, * 1 Mont. Ty, 130.

§ 1155. Creditor; conditional payment; duty as to collecting.—A debtor remitted a bill of exchange on a third person to his creditor, who presented it for acceptance, which was refused, with an intimation that it might possibly be accepted when the drawer (a person other than the debtor) should be heard from. The creditor held it for a time and again presented it, when acceptance was refused. He then kept it over three months and then returned it by mail to the debtor, but the letter never reached him. Held, that he could not recover the amount of the bill from the creditor; that the bill was not received in satisfaction of the pre-existing debt and hence no discharge of it, there being no laches of the creditor in collecting it; that the creditor was not bound by the same strict rules as to presentation and notice as an indorsee in due course of trade; and that the debtor could not recover of the creditor the amount of the bill. Gallagher v. Roberts, 2 Wash., 191; Westphal v. Ludlow, 2 McC., 505. See §§ 930, 931.

§ 1156. Notary agent of holder; negligence; liability of bank.—A note was sent to a bank with instructions to present it, and, if not paid upon presentation, to protest it, and notify the indorser. It was not so paid, and the bank handed it to a notary public with instructions to demand payment, make protest and send notices. Held, that the notary became the agent of the holder, and the bank was not liable for any default upon his part as to demand, protest and notice. Britton v. Niccolls, 14 Otto, 757. See BANKS, §§ 207, 208.

§ 1157. The United States are bound to observe the usages of the commercial world when dealing with commercial paper. United States v. National Bank, etc., * 6 Fed. R., 184.

§ 1158. Note held as collateral; negligence; extinguishment of debt.—The holder of a note as collateral is not bound by strict rules as to demand and notice, but if, through his negligence, the amount of the note is lost, as by insolvency of the maker after the note matured, the original debt is extinguished. Westphal v. Ludlow, 2 McC., 505. See §§ 930, 931, 1155.

§ 1159. Lex loci.—A note made and indorsed in Cincinnati is governed by the laws of Ohio as to what demand, notice and diligence are required to charge an indorser. Where suit on such note was brought in Indiana against an indorser, held, that demand of maker and notice of non-payment to indorser was sufficient to show due diligence according to the Ohio laws, although the laws of Indiana would have required also the prosecution of the maker to insolvency. Burrows v. Hannegan, 1 McL., 309 (§§ 1029-1033).

§ 1160. For non-acceptance.—Protest of foreign bills for non-acceptance is not required by the custom of merchants in order to justify a recovery on a protest for non-payment. Brown v. Barry, * 3 Dal., 365.

§ 1161. Where presentment for acceptance is unnecessary, a bill need not be protested for non-acceptance owing to the drawee's absence from home; and a failure to protest under such circumstances is not negligence. Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet., 25 (§§ 760-768).

§ 1162. Government orders on sub-treasuries.—When the federal government by its authorized agent becomes a party to negotiable paper, it has all the rights and assumes all the responsibilities of other parties to such instruments. But this is a general rule to which exceptions may be established by the practice of the departments. Thus, requisites of time or notice may be dispensed with, e. g., where drafts of the treasurer on various local depositaries of the government are returned unpaid; such drafts are always paid in Washington without regard to time or notice. Government Drafts, * 8 Op. Att'y Gen., 1.

WATSON v. TARPLEY.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Mississippi.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DANIEL.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— On the 29th April, 1850, the plaintiff in error, a citizen of Tennessee, brought this action of assumpsit against the defendant, a citizen of Mississippi, in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi, upon a bill of exchange, dated 4th April, 1850, drawn by the defendant upon Messrs. McKee, Bulkely & Co., of New Orleans, Louisiana, for $2,327.49, payable twelve months after date, in favor of James Bankhead, and by him indorsed to the plaintiff, and declared in two counts — one on the non-acceptance and the other on the non-payment of the said bill. Pr. Rec., p. 4. The defendant pleaded "non-assumpsit," and on this plea issue was joined (page six), and the action tried on the 11th of January, 1855, when a verdict was found for the defendant. On the trial a bill of exceptions was taken by the plaintiff in error, from which it appears that the plaintiff read in evidence the bill of exchange, and proved the presentment thereof to the drawers, at their office in New Orleans, for acceptance on the 27th of April, 1850, the due protest thereof for non-acceptance, and a notification of its dishonor given the same day by letter addressed to the defendant at his residence in Mississippi. See notarial protest and depositions, 17-22. The plaintiff also proved the presentment of the said bill for payment on the 7th April, 1851, the refusal of payment, the due protest thereof, and notice to the defendant. See notarial protest and depositions of H. B. Cenas, A. Commandeur, and Charles F. Barry, 7-15.

The defendant then offered to read in evidence a certificate, set out on the twenty-third page of the record; and which being read, after objection taken thereto by the plaintiff, the judge instructed the jury (Record, 23): "That the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the count in the declaration on the protest of the bill for non-acceptance, unless due and regular notice was proved of the protest of the bill for non-payment, though the jury might be satisfied from the proof that the bill had been regularly protested for non-acceptance, and due notice thereof given to the defendant; that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, notwithstanding the proof of protest for non-acceptance and due notice thereof, the plaintiff must prove protest for non-payment and due notice thereof, to the defendant; and that the jury were the judges of the testimony, and could give to the witnesses such credit as they thought them entitled to, looking to all the circumstances of the case."

The material questions involved in this case are comprised within a comparatively narrow compass, and present themselves prominently out upon the face of the record. On each of the questions thus deemed material, we think that the circuit court has erred. Upon the relevancy or effect of the certificate of H. B. Cenas, under date of the 7th of April, 1851, and which was, under an exception by the plaintiff, permitted to be read in evidence with the view of impairing the previous statement of this witness as to the regularity of his proceedings upon the dishonor of the bill, we do not think it necessary to express an opinion. Our views of the law of this case as applicable to the instruction given by the circuit court are in no degree affected by the character of the statements in that certificate.

§ 1174. The sufficiency of protest and notice of dishonored bill is a question of law for the court.

We think that the instruction of the court was erroneous in committing it to the jury to determine whether the proceedings as to protest and notice upon the dishonor of the bill for non-payment were regular and legal. This is a matter which must, upon the facts given in evidence, be determined by the court as a question of law, and which cannot be regularly submitted to the jury. Such is the doctrine uniformly ruled by this court; we mention the cases of the Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 1 Pet., 578 (§§ 995-997, supra); Dickins v. Beal, 10 id., 572 (§§ 950-957, supra); Rhett v. Poe, 2 How., 457 (§§ 974-979, supra); Camden v. Doremus, 3 id., 515 (§§ 585-588, supra); Harris v. Robinson, 4 id., 336 (§§ 980-982, supra); Lambert v. Ghiselin, 9 id., 552 (§§ 1001-4, supra). To the same point might be cited the several English decisions referred to in the case of Rhett v. Poe, already mentioned.

We also hold to be erroneous the instruction of the court declaring that after presentment of the bill for acceptance, and after regular protest and notice for non-acceptance, an action could not be maintained by the payee or indorsee until after the maturity of the bill, and then only upon proof of demand for payment, and of a regular protest and notice founded upon the refusal to pay. It is a rule of commercial law too familiarly known to require the citation of authorities, or to admit of question, that the payee or indorsee of a bill, upon its presentment and upon refusal by the drawee to accept, has the right to immediate recourse against the drawer. Upon no principle of reason or justice can he be required to await the maturity of the bill, by the dishonor of which he has been assured that it will not be paid, and with which the drawee has disclaimed all connection. Justice to the drawer, with the view of enabling him to guard himself from injury, imposes upon the holder the obligation of protest and notice upon non-acceptance; but beyond this, he sustains no connection with the drawee of the bill, and is under no obligation afterwards to present the latter for payment; of course, he cannot be rightfully held to protest and notice for non-payment. In the several compilations of the law of bills and notes by Kyd, Bayley, Chitty, Byles, and Story, are collected the decisions by which this doctrine has been settled.

§ 1176. State laws of no force in federal courts, except in purely local matters.

It has been suggested that the instruction by the judge at circuit may have been founded upon a provision in a statute of the state of Mississippi of 1836, contained in a collection of the laws of that state by Howard and Hutchinson, pp. 375, 376, § 18, by which, amongst other enactments, it is declared that "no action or suit shall be sustained or commenced on any bill of exchange, until after the maturity thereof;" and this prohibition or postponement of the right of action it is thought may have been interpreted by the judge as requiring after presentment for acceptance, and after protest and notice upon non-acceptance, a like presentment and demand for payment upon the maturity of the bill; and upon refusal to pay, a like protest and notice, in order to authorize a recovery. The answer to the above suggestion is this: that if such be a just interpretation of the statute of Mississippi, that interpretation, and the consequences deducible therefrom, we must regard as wholly inadmissible. Whilst it will not be denied that the laws of the several states are of binding authority upon their domestic tribunals, and upon persons and property within their appropriate jurisdiction, it is equally clear that those laws cannot affect, either by enlargement or diminution, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States as vested and prescribed by the constitution and laws of the United States, nor destroy or control the rights of parties litigant to whom the right of resort to these courts has been secured by the laws and constitution. This is a position which has been frequently affirmed by this court, and would seem to compel the general assent upon its simple enunciation. In the case of Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, supra), this court in giving a construction to the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act, which declares "that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," he said: "It never has been supposed by us that this section did apply, or was intended to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation; as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves; that is, to ascertain upon general reasoning and legal analogies, what is the true exposition of the contract, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case." Again, in the same case it is said by this court: "The law respecting negotiable instruments may be truly declared, in the language of Cicero, adopted by Lord Mansfield in Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr., 883, 887, to be in a great measure not the law of a single country only, but of the commercial world." In the cases of Keary v. Farmers, etc., Bank of Memphis, 16 Pet., 89, and of Dromgoole v. Farmers' Bank, 2 How., 241, it was ruled by this court that the courts of the United States themselves can have no authority to adopt any provisions of state laws which are repugnant to or incompatible with the positive enactments of congress, upon the jurisdiction, or practice, or proceedings of such courts.

The general commercial law being circumscribed within no local limits, nor committed for its administration to any peculiar jurisdiction, and the constitution and laws of the United States having conferred upon the citizens of the several states, and upon aliens, the power or privilege of litigation and enforcing their rights acquired under and defined by that general commercial law, before the judicial tribunals of the United States, it must follow by regular consequence, that any state law or regulation, the effect of which would be to impair the rights thus secured, or to divest the federal courts of cognizance thereof, in their fullest acceptance under the commercial law, must be nugatory and unavailing. The statute of Mississippi, so far as it may be understood to deny, or in any degree to impair, the right of a non-resident holder of a bill of exchange, immediately after presentment to, and refusal to accept by the drawee, and after protest and notice, to resort forthwith to the courts of the United States by suit upon such bill, must be regarded as wholly without authority and inoperative. The same want of authority may be affirmed of a provision in the statute which would seek to render the right of recovery by the holder, after regular presentment and protest, and notice for non-acceptance, dependent upon proof of subsequent presentment, protest, and notice for non-payment. A requisition like this would be a violation of the general commercial law, which a state would have no power to impose, and which the courts of the United States would be bound to disregard.

We think that the instruction given by the circuit court in this case was erroneous; that its decision should be, as it is hereby reversed; and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, to be proceeded in upon a venire de novo, in conformity with the principles above ruled.

EVANS v. GEE.

ERROR to U. S. District Court, Southern District of Alabama.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought upon a bill of exchange, of which the following is a copy:

"$5,350.

WILCOX COUNTY, Dec. 16, 1834.

"Twelve months after date of this, my sole and only bill of same tenor and date, pay to the order of Thomas Evans, five thousand three hundred and fifty dollars; negotiable and payable at the office of discount and deposit branch bank of the United States at Mobile for value received, this the 16th day of December, 1834.

H. SMITH EVANS.

"To George M. Rives, Mobile."

The plaintiff in error, the payee of the bill, indorsed the same in blank, and the defendant in error became the bona fide holder of it by delivery; though the indorsement in blank was at the time of delivery to the holder by himself, and subsequently by his attorney, converted into a full indorsement, the words, pay to Sterling H. Gee, having been written over the indorser's name. Upon the trial of the cause in the court below, the bill, with proof of protest for non-acceptance and notice to the drawer and indorser of the bill, was given in evidence. To resist a recovery, "the defendant offered to prove that the bill was given by him to Charles Gee for property purchased by himself; that the property belonged jointly to Charles J. Gee and Sterling H. Gee, the plaintiff; that they then were and continue to be, and now are, general copartners; that when the indorsement was made it was in blank, and that the said indorsement has been filled up by the plaintiff's counsel since the suit had been commenced; that Charles J. Gee resides in this state, and did when the suit was brought, and is a citizen of the state of Alabama; and that H. Smith Evans and George M. Rives, the drawer and drawee of the bill, are also and were citizens of the state." The court rejected this evidence, stating: "That the indorsement having been made and given in blank, the plaintiff was authorized to fill it up, as had been done; and that the facts set forth could constitute no defense and were not proper evidence; the court further instructed the jury that the bill being drawn in this state by a person residing in this state, and made payable in the state, upon non-acceptance and notice, the indorser was liable for ten per cent. damages on the amount of the bill for non-acceptance. We consider the court was right in rejecting the evidence and in instructing the jury as to the liability of the indorser for damages.

§ 1178. Jurisdiction of United States courts where indorser and indorsee are citizens of different states.

If by the evidence proposed it was intended to deny the jurisdiction of the court on account of the citizenship of the parties to the action, that being averred on the record, a plea to the jurisdiction should have been filed, and such evidence was inadmissible under the general issue. If it was intended to apply to the jurisdiction on account of the original parties to the bill having been citizens of the same state when the bill was drawn, then the rule laid down by this court in Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dal., 8, which was a suit by the indorsee of a promissory note against the drawer, does not apply to the parties in this case; but the rule established in Young v. Bryan, 6 Wheat., 146, does apply, which was that the circuit court has jurisdiction of a suit brought by the indorsee of a promissory note, who was a citizen of one state, against the indorser, who is a citizen of a different state, whether a suit could be brought in that court by the indorsee against the maker or not. This is a case of an indorsee of one state suing an indorser of a different state. If the evidence was intended to resist a recovery upon the merits on account of the interest which another copartner or other person had in the consideration for which the bill was indorsed, we observe, the plaintiff being the bona fide holder of it, such a fact could not be inquired into in an action on the bill, as it would import a different bargain and agreement from the tenor of the bill and indorsement when the bill was given or transferred; and a copartner's interest could only be inquired into in a suit in equity between the copartners for its recovery.

§ 1179. A bona fide holder may fill out a blank indorsement without becoming an indorser.

As regards the right of a bona fide holder of a bill to write over a blank indorsement to whom the bill shall be paid at any time before or after the institution of a suit against the indorser, it has long been the settled doctrine in the English and American courts; and the holder, by writing such direction over a blank indorsement, ordering the money to be paid to particular persons, does not become an indorser. Edie v. East India Co., 2 Burr., 1216; Com., 311; Str., 557; Vincent v. Horlock, 1 Camp., 442; Smith v. Clark, Peake, 225.

§ 1180. Non-acceptance gives right of action against drawer and indorser, even though bill has not matured.

But it was urged in argument that this suit could not be maintained, because it appears by the record that the action was brought before the expiration of the time limited by the bill for its payment. The law is otherwise upon reason and authority. The undertaking of the drawer is not that he will pay the bill, but that the drawee will accept and pay; and the liability of the drawer only attaches when the drawee refuses to accept; or having accepted, fails to pay. A refusal to accept is then a breach of the contract, upon the happening of which a right of action instantly accrues to the payee to recover from the drawer the value expressed in the bill, that being the consideration which the payee gave for it. Such is also the undertaking of an indorser before the bill has been presented for acceptance, he being in fact a new drawer of the same bill upon the terms expressed on the face of it. The case of an indorser is not distinguishable from that of a drawer in regard to such liability. Ballingalls v. Gloster, 3 East, 481; Milford v. Mayor, Doug., 55; Mason v. Franklin, 3 Johns., 202.

§ 1181. Damages allowed in Alabama against indorser.

As to the damages which the court ruled the indorser in this case to be liable for, we need only say the statute of Alabama gives them, and applies directly to the case. Aiken's Alabama Digest, 328, § 5. "Every bill of exchange of the sum of $20 and upwards, drawn in, or dated at, and from any place in this territory, and payable at a certain number of days, weeks or months after date or sight thereof, shall, in case of non-acceptance by the drawee, when presented for acceptance, or if accepted in case of non-payment by the drawee, when due and presented for payment, be protested by a notary public, in like manner as foreign bills of exchange, and the damages on such bill shall be ten per cent. on the sum drawn for, and shall in every other respect be regulated and governed by the same laws, customs and usages which regulate and govern foreign bills of exchange. Provided, that such protest shall, for want or in default of a notary public, be made by any justice of the peace, whose act in such case shall have the same effect as if done by a notary public."

§ 1182. Irregularities waived by going to trial.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error also contended for the reversal of the judgment on the ground of sundry irregularities in the progress of the cause in the court below, apparent on the record. Such as that a general demurrer had been filed, and had not been disposed of; that a non-suit had been taken by the plaintiff in error, and that a motion to set it aside had been overruled; that the case had been submitted to a jury, without an issue between the parties; and, finally, that the verdict, if an issue was made, had been returned by eleven instead of twelve jurors. These irregularities, whatever might have been their original imperfections, if not waived, were, in our opinion, waived by the defendant going to trial upon the merits, and cannot now constitute any objection upon the present writ of error. For a writ of error does not bring up for review any irregularities of this sort. Judgment affirmed, with six per cent. damages.

DOWNES v. CHURCH.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is the case of a certificate of division of the judges of the circuit court for the district of Mississippi. The action was assumpsit, founded on the second part of a foreign bill of exchange, by the indorsee against the indorser for non-acceptance. The plaintiffs declared upon the second of the set of exchange, which second of the set was protested for non-acceptance, and the same, with the protest attached thereto, was read to the jury. Whereupon a question arose, whether the plaintiffs could recover upon the said second of exchange without producing the first of the same set, or accounting for its non-production; upon which question the judges were opposed in opinion, and the same has been accordingly certified to this court under the act of congress.

We are of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover upon the second of the set without producing the first, or accounting for its non-production. No authority has been referred to which is exactly in point, nor are we aware that the question has ever been judicially decided. Mr. Starkie, in his work on Evidence, part 4, p. 228, 1st ed., has said: "In the case of a foreign bill drawn in sets, both the sets should be produced." But for this proposition he has cited no authority. The question must, then, be decided upon principle. The object of drawing a foreign bill in sets is for the convenience of the payee, or other holder, to enable him to forward the same for acceptance by different conveyances, and thus to guard against any loss, by accident or otherwise, which might occur if there were but a single bill. But from the very frame of the set, if one is paid or discharged by the acceptor, or other party liable on it, he is ordinarily discharged from the others, since each part contains a condition that it shall be payable only when the others remain unpaid.

§ 1183. When one of a set of bills is protested for non-acceptance, the drawer and indorsers are prima facie liable on it.

Now, when one of the set is protested for non-acceptance, and due notice is given to an indorser, and on the trial of an action brought against him by the indorsee, the same bill of the set on which the protest is made is produced, that is prima facie proof of his being responsible thereon.

§ 1184. —and a right of action arises against all antecedent parties to the bill, upon notice, without any other of the set being presented.

Either of the set may be presented for acceptance, and, if not accepted, a right of action presently arises upon due notice against all the antecedent parties to the bill, without any others of the set being presented; for it is by no means necessary that all the parts should be presented for acceptance before a right of action accrues to the holder.

§ 1185. The law does not presume that the other bills of the set have been negotiated to other persons; this is matter to be shown on defense.

Under such circumstances, it is properly a matter of defense on the other side, to show either that some other bill of the set has been presented and accepted, or paid; or that it has been presented at an earlier time and dishonored, and due notice has not been given; or that another person is the proper holder, and has given notice of his title to the party sued; or that some other ground of defense exists, which displaces the prima facie title made out by the plaintiff. The law will not presume that the other bills of the set have been negotiated to other persons, merely because they are not produced. And the indorser is not put to any hazard or peril by the non-production of them; since, like the acceptor, if he once pay the bill, without notice of any superior adverse claim, by a negotiation of another of the set to another party he will be completely exonerated. On the other hand, great inconveniences might arise from compelling the plaintiff to produce the other parts of the set, or to account for their non-production, as he might not be able satisfactorily to prove that they had not been negotiated, or that they had been lost. In short, if the plaintiff, before he could recover, were required to produce or to account for all the parts of the set, he would be obliged in every case where the bills had been transmitted by different conveyances abroad, to arm himself with proofs of every stage of their route and progress, until they should come back again into his hands, as preliminaries to his right to recover upon their being dishonored. Such a requirement would create most serious embarrassments in all commercial transactions of this sort; and instead of bills drawn in sets being a public convenience, they would be greatly obstructed in their negotiability, since the rights and the remedies of the holder might be materially impaired thereby. We are therefore of opinion that the question upon which the judges of the circuit court were opposed ought to be answered in the affirmative, and we shall send a certificate to the court accordingly.

WHITE v. NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Colorado.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action by White, who was plaintiff below, for the sum of $60,000, against the Miners' National Bank of Georgetown, Colorado. The declaration contains twelve special counts, upon as many drafts, drawn by the Stewart Silver Reducing Company on Thomas W. Phelps, payable in the city of New York to the order of the defendant, and indorsed by J. L. Brownell, its president, to S. V. White, and duly protested for non-payment. To these counts is added another, in this language: "And for that also, heretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1876, at the said county of Clear Creek, the said defendant was indebted to plaintiff in $60,000, for so much money, by the plaintiff, before that time, paid to the use of said defendant at its request, which said sum of money was to be paid to the plaintiff on request," with an allegation of request and refusal. To this declaration the defendant pleaded the general issue and several special pleas, which it is unnecessary to notice. The case was tried by a jury. The plaintiff recovered $15,000 debt and $2,625 damages for interest, on account of three of the drafts. His claim on the other drafts, and for money paid at defendant's request, was rejected.

He therefore brings this writ, and assigns for error the rulings of the court in the progress of the trial, which are set forth in a bill of exceptions.

J. L. Brownell, a partner in the firm of J. L. Brownell & Brother, doing business as bankers and brokers in the city of New York, was also president of the defendant, and interested in the Stewart Silver Reducing Company during the time of the transactions involved in this suit. As such president, he sold or transferred the several drafts on which this suit is founded to White, and received of the latter for the use of the bank the amount of said drafts less the discount. They were not paid at maturity, but due demand, protest and notice were made. Those on which plaintiff recovered need not be further noticed. The others were rejected by the court as evidence against the defendant, on account of the form of the indorsement. As they were, in this respect, alike, the form of one will be given here as a specimen of the whole:

"$5,000.]

OFFICE OF THE STEWART SILVER REDUCING COMPANY,

"GEORGETOWN, COL., Oct. 25, 1875.

"Four months after date pay to the order of the Miners' National Bank, Georgetown, Colorado, payable at the Third National Bank, New York City, five thousand dollars.

"STEWART SILVER REDUCING COMPANY,

"By J. OSCAR STEWART, President.

"To Thos. W. Phelps, Esq., Georgetown, Colorado.

Across the face, in red: "Accepted.—THOS. W. PHELPS.

Indorsed:

"No. . Pay S. V. White or order, for account Miners' National Bank, Georgetown, Colorado. J. L. Brownell, p't. S. V. WHITE."

Because of the words "for account of Miners' National Bank of Georgetown, Colorado," in this indorsement by Brownell, as president of the bank, the circuit court ruled that there arose out of the transaction no obligation on the part of the bank to pay the draft or return the money, although due demand of the acceptor and refusal to pay was proved, with notice to the bank. This is the principal question which we are to decide.

The plaintiff relies largely on two propositions to establish his right to recover against defendant on this indorsement. The first of these is that these words are merely directory and capable of explanation, and when it is shown by parol testimony, as in this case, that the plaintiff bought and paid full value for the draft, with the understanding that he was buying it as commercial paper, with the usual incidents of such a transaction, the indorser is liable in the usual manner, notwithstanding the words we have quoted. The other proposition is that such is the custom of bankers who deal in such paper in New York, where these drafts are payable, and that the custom must control the construction of the contract. We are not satisfied that either of these propositions is sound.

§ 1186. An indorsement to A. "for account," etc., only constitutes A. an agent to receive the money.

The language of the indorsement is without ambiguity, and needs no explanation, either by parol proof or by resort to usage. The plain meaning of it is that the acceptor of the draft is to pay it to the indorsee for the use of the indorser. The indorsee is to receive it on account of the indorser. It does not purport to transfer the title of the paper or the ownership of the money when received. Both these remain, by the reasonable and almost necessary meaning of the language, in the indorser. It seems to us that the court below correctly construed the effect of the indorsement to be to make White the agent of the bank for the collection of the money.

If this be a sound view of the legal effect of the written indorsement, neither parol proof nor custom can be received to contradict it. But we are aware of the necessity of proceeding with great caution in a case of first impression in regard to questions affecting commercial transactions, and we do not, therefore, decide this one, because we do not think it absolutely necessary to the case. For, assuming this to be correct, we think the plaintiff was still entitled to recover more than he did.

§ 1188. Under a common count one who has paid his money to the use of the owner of negotiable paper under the mutual mistake that he was buying it can recover it back.

The court below seems to have paid but little attention to the issue on the count for money paid to the use of defendant. It appears distinctly by the evidence, and is uncontradicted, that the money paid by plaintiff on account of these drafts was placed to the credit of the defendant with its corresponding bankers in New York, and paid out on checks of the defendant, so that there is no question that the latter received the money. There is also no question but that plaintiff thought he was buying these drafts, and that they became his property by their delivery to him. It is also evident that Brownell, the president of the bank, thought he was selling him the drafts, and there is evidence that neither White nor Brownell noticed the restrictive words of the indorsement. But if the court below was correct in holding that the indorsement — the evidence in writing of what the parties did — only made White the agent of the bank, and left the bank the owner of the drafts, then both White and Brownell were mistaken, and the money was paid and received under a mutual mistake. If White paid his money as purchase money of the drafts, he paid it without any consideration, for he did not purchase the drafts. He only burdened himself with the duty of collecting the money for the bank, and the bank received and used his money without giving him any consideration for it. So, also, if White did not become the owner of the drafts, and if, when he should collect the money on them, he would hold it, in the language of the indorsement, "for the account of the bank," the jury might have been left at liberty to presume that the money which he paid was a loan or advance on the security of the paper delivered to him at the time. Either of these views of the transaction would justify a recovery under the money count, in which the delivery of the money and the delivery of the drafts with the qualified indorsement would be evidence of the payment and receipt of the money and the circumstances which attended it. This indorsement is treated by counsel here as an assignment of the paper without recourse, in which the title to the paper passed but the right to recourse to the assignor was cut off. But this is evidently an error. If the court below was correct neither the title to the paper nor the right to the money under it passed. The only effect was to justify the acceptor in paying to the indorsee for the account of the bank. The legal effect of the transaction, as evidenced by the writing, was merely to enable White to collect the money for the bank. Though a restricted indorsement, it was no assignment at all. It is not, therefore, a contradiction or a varying of the meaning of the written instrument to prove that, in the delivery of this paper to White, he and the bank were under a mistake as to the effect of it, or that he paid this money to the bank without any consideration, or that he advanced money to the bank in the idea that he was to be reimbursed out of the draft when collected.

The instructions given by the court and the refusal of the prayer of plaintiff fairly raised this question. All the drafts except the three which had no such indorsement were excluded from the jury. The jury were told that nothing else was before them. The thirteenth instruction asked by plaintiff and refused by the court distinctly affirmed that if Brownell obtained from plaintiff sums of money on account of the drafts, which the court had refused as evidence, which money was placed to the credit of defendant in a New York bank and afterwards drawn by defendant, the defendant was liable for such money.

The judgment will be reversed and the case remanded with directions to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial; and it is so ordered.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. LYMAN.

(Circuit Court for Vermont: 1 Blatchford, 297-317. 1848.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The Bank of the United States, created by congress, had located a branch at Burlington, Vermont. On March 10, 1836, the defendants offered to purchase of the Bank of the United States the property of the office at Burlington as it was upon the 2d day of March, 1836, for a specified sum, on an estimate of itemized assets, which offer was accepted, and on April 1st was consummated, the defendants giving their notes for the purchase.

Opinion by PRENTISS, J.

The declaration in this case contains two counts, one for money had and received, and the other on an account stated. In support of the counts two promissory notes were given in evidence, with several accounts current, letters of correspondence and other documents and testimony. Out of the evidence so given various questions have arisen, some involving the admissibility, and others the effect or sufficiency of the evidence. The questions possess different degrees of importance, both intrinsically and in their bearing upon the case; and I shall notice them in such order and manner as will enable me to dispose of them with as much brevity and as little repetition as practicable, entering no further into the facts than may be necessary to present, fully and intelligibly, the grounds of decision upon each particular point.

§ 1189. Presumption as to time of organizing bank.

1. The plaintiffs were incorporated as a banking company, by the name of the Bank of the United States, by an act of the state of Pennsylvania, passed February 18, 1836. The contract which is the origin or foundation of the principal claim in question was made sometime after the 10th of March, and was carried into execution on the 1st of April, in the same year. The precise day of the organization of the plaintiffs as a banking company not being shown, it is objected that it does not appear that they were organized and competent to act as a corporate body at the time the contract was made. To this, it seems to me, an answer was given by the counsel for the plaintiffs which is quite sufficient. The act of incorporation having provided that notice of the organization should be given on or before the 3d of March then next ensuing, and the bank being found in operation afterwards under the act, it is to be presumed that it was organized as early as the time prescribed, which was of course before the making of the contract.

§ 1190. Successor of bank, under new charter, held entitled to enforce contracts made with bank.

2. It appears that the Bank of the United States, incorporated many years before by an act of congress, although it ceased to have any power to carry on banking operations after the 3d of March, 1836, continued in existence two years thereafter for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement of its affairs, and for the sale and disposition of its estate and effects. As that company established the branch at Burlington, and was in existence at the time the contract for the purchase of the property of the branch was entered into, it is insisted that it must be taken, in the absence of direct proof showing it to be otherwise, of which it is said there is none, that the contract was made with that company, and, consequently, that the plaintiffs, as to one and much the most considerable of the claims in question, are mere strangers, for anything that appears, without right or interest. But it is to be observed that the company established by the act of Pennsylvania was established in anticipation of the dissolution, so far as banking powers were concerned, of the company established by the act of congress, the new company having, with one exception, the same stockholders and capital, the same name and style, and the same capacity, so far as a state institution could have the capacity of a national institution. It was the substitution of a new charter under the state government in place of the old charter under the general government, so that the banking operations which would cease under the one might be continued, without intermission or interruption, under the new powers given by the other. Accordingly, the new company, as we have seen, was to come, and did come, into existence as an organized corporate body before or simultaneously with the termination of the banking powers and operations of the old company; and all the estate and effects of the old company were transferred to the new. The particular time of the transfer, it is true, does not appear. But it is obvious that it would naturally follow the organization immediately, in order to fulfil the purpose in view; and one of the witnesses states expressly that it included the estate and effects sold the defendants. This, therefore, connected with the bringing of the action and possession of the written evidences of the debt by the plaintiffs, is sufficient and very decisive evidence that the contract was in fact made with the new company.

§ 1191. Acts and admissions of one of several joint promisors admissible against the others, when.

3. To establish several material facts in the case, various letters, acts and admissions of John Peck, one of the defendants, were given in evidence. This evidence, it is said, was inadmissible, at least so far as it concerns any of the defendants but Peck himself. The objection to it rests upon the ground that though the defendants were joint purchasers of the property, and gave their joint notes for the price, they were not partners, at least in such a sense as to make the acts and admissions of one evidence against the others. Admitting that the defendants are to be regarded, not as partners, properly and strictly speaking, but only as joint contractors or promisors, still the evidence, for some purposes, was undoubtedly admissible. It is a familiar rule of law that an acknowledgment by one of several joint debtors, either by word or act, is evidence to take the debt out of the statute of limitations as to all. Thus, "payment by one," says Lord Mansfield, in Whitcomb v. Whiting, Doug., 652, "is payment for all, the one acting virtually as agent for the rest; and, in the same manner," he adds, "an admission by one is an admission by all." This principle, however, does not extend to the creation of a new substantive obligation, or a new additional liability; nor to anything which is necessary to be done by the party claiming, to perfect or give effect to a conditional or imperfect obligation or liability—such, for instance, as a demand of payment and notice of non-payment of a promissory note indorsed by several joint payees. There the admission of one of the indorsers, either as to the demand or notice, is probably no evidence against the others; especially so as notice is necessary to each. But payment by one on a note, in pursuance of an existing joint liability, or an admission by one that the note is unpaid, or that a particular balance is due upon it, whether by stating an account or otherwise, is good evidence against all, in an action for the money due upon the note. That neither creates a new contract nor enlarges the pre-existing obligation or liability, but merely shows that that obligation or liability has not been discharged, or discharged but in part only. But, however that may be, if it sufficiently appears that Peck was the agent to take care of the joint concern, and transact the business growing out of it, in behalf of the other defendants as well as himself, his acts and admissions while so acting, relative to anything within the scope of his authority, are, undoubtedly, in law, the acts and admissions of all and binding upon all. Now it very fully appears that the business was in fact conducted and transacted wholly by and through Peck. The original proposition for the purchase was signed, "John Peck for himself and others;" and this was ratified by the others, by their joining in the notes and completing the contract in pursuance of that proposition. As at the first, so throughout to the last, Peck acted as the ostensible manager, without the appearance, from anything that is disclosed in the evidence, of any objection or interference on the part of the other defendants. It is obvious that it would be quite inconvenient, in a joint concern of such a nature, for all to take part personally in the correspondence, or to sign every letter and paper that passed, or for notices, accounts current, and other necessary communications, to be sent to and answered by all. It is usual in such cases to commit the transaction of the business and the charge of the correspondence to some particular one, and have it done by and through him for all. And where it is done by and through one professedly for and in behalf of all, for a series of years, as in this case, without objection, all residing in the same neighborhood, and having daily intercourse and communication with each other, the assent of the others, they having adopted the first act, is to be presumed from their silence and acquiescence.

§ 1192. Where plaintiff's bill of particulars is a promissory note only, he cannot recover on a pre-existing debt or original consideration.

4. The bill of particulars filed by the plaintiffs having stated their claim to be two promissory notes particularly described, it is made a question, and it becomes necessary to decide, whether it was competent for them to give evidence of and recover upon the pre-existing debt or original consideration. According to the general rule of practice as established by the authorities, it seems that the particulars are considered and treated as incorporated with the declaration, and the plaintiff is not allowed to give any evidence out of them. Thus it has been held that where the particular of the plaintiff's demand was a promissory note only, and on being produced it appeared to be improperly stamped, so that it could not be given in evidence, the plaintiff, though he might otherwise have gone into the consideration of the note, was precluded therefrom by his particular. Wade v. Beasley, 4 Esp., 7; Brown v. Watts, 1

Taunt., 353; 1 Tidd's Prac., 537. On these authorities, which are obviously directly in point, the plaintiffs in the present case were confined, by the terms of their bill of particulars, to the two notes specified, and were not at liberty to proceed upon the original consideration or cause of action.

5. The note first specified in the bill of particulars, and first given in evidence, if the plaintiffs could maintain an action upon it in any form, was undoubtedly admissible under either count in the declaration — not only under the count for money had and received, but also, being a liquidated debt, under the count on an account stated. To the admission of the note, however, an objection was made, arising upon the face of the instrument, which presents the principal and most important question in the case. The note is signed by the defendants, and is in this form: "We jointly and severally promise to pay to Samuel Jaudon, Esqr., cashier, or order, etc." On the one side it is insisted that Jaudon is the payee of the note; that the legal interest and right of action are in him; and that the plaintiffs, the note not being indorsed by Jaudon, can neither maintain an action directly upon it in their own name nor an action in any form in their own name to recover the money due upon it. On the other side, it is urged that, as it appears from the evidence in the case, that the note was given for a debt due the plaintiffs, and that Jaudon was their cashier, acting merely as their agent in taking the note, having no personal interest whatever in it, the plaintiffs are to be regarded as the real payee of the note, and, as such, may sue and recover the money in their own name. Upon this question I might content myself with a general statement of the conclusion at which I have arrived, with a summary reference to authorities and reasons; but the nature and importance of the question seem to entitle it to more full and particular consideration. It seems now to be settled in England, whatever difference of opinion there may have formerly been in regard to it, that parol evidence is admissible to show that a person not named in a written simple agreement is the real party to it, either for the purpose of charging him upon it or enabling him to take the benefit of it, as the case may be; but not, however, to discharge a party who has contracted in his own name. Thus the real principal or a partner from or to whom the consideration has moved may sue or be sued upon a written simple agreement, though he do not appear upon its face to be a party to it. This was so decided in the court of exchequer, in the case of Beckham v. Drake, 9 Mees. & W., 79, afterwards affirmed in the exchequer chamber, in Drake v. Beckham in error, 11 Mees. & W., 315. But however clear, undoubted and now well established this doctrine may be as to mere written simple agreements, the question is, is it applicable to negotiable instruments?

In a very early case, Evans v. Cramlington, Carth., 5, affirmed in the exchequer chamber, in Cramlington v. Evans in error, 2 Vent., 307, it was determined that where a bill is payable to A. for the use of B. the right of action and of transfer is only in A., he having the legal interest, and B. only the equitable or beneficial interest. This decides that the person named as the payee in a bill, and not the person for whose use or benefit it is made payable, is the party entitled to sue upon it. If this be so where the trust is expressed and declared upon the face of the bill, the case must be much clearer and stronger where neither the trust nor the name of the party having the beneficial interest appears at all upon the instrument. The observations of Buller, J., in Fenn v. Harrison, 3 Term R., 757, show very plainly that in his opinion no person could be considered as a party to a bill unless his name, or the name of his firm, if a partner, appeared upon it. In Siffkin v. Walker, 2 Camp., 308, where a person not appearing to be a party to a promissory note was joined as a defendant in an action upon it, Lord Ellenborough said that a note made and signed by one in his own name could not be treated as the note of him and another person neither mentioned nor referred to. And in Emly v. Lye, 15 East, 7, the same eminent judge, with the concurrence of all his learned associates, held that on a bill of exchange drawn by one only, it could not be allowed to supply by intendment the names of others in order to charge them, and that the plaintiff, if he would rest his claim on the bill, must confine it to the party who signed the instrument. In the case of Beckham v. Drake, to which I have before referred as settling the general rule as to written simple agreements, Lord Abinger said: "Cases of bills of exchange are quite different in principle from those which ought to govern this case. By the law merchant, a chose in action is passed by indorsement, and each party who receives the bill is making a contract with the parties upon the face of it, and with no other party whatever. That is a class of cases quite distinct in its nature from the present." And Parke, B., said that where a contract in writing, not under seal, was made in another name than that of the real principal, the real principal could sue and be sued. "But," he added, "the case of bills of exchange is an exception, which stands upon the law merchant, and promissory notes another, for they are placed on the same footing by the statute of Anne. In neither of these can any but the parties named in the instrument by their name or firm be made liable to an action upon it." Thus it appears that negotiable instruments, according to these authorities, are exceptions to the rule which governs written simple agreements in general, and that this, for supposed good and sound reasons, is the established doctrine in England.

The same doctrine, I may safely say, prevails in general in this country, though there may have been, now and then, an occasional departure from it. There can be little doubt, I think, when we refer to the case of Van Ness v. Forrest, 8 Cranch, 30, how the rule of law on the subject is understood in the national court. There a note was executed to Joseph Forrest, president of the Commercial Company, for merchandise belonging to and sold as the property of the company. On the question whether an action could be maintained upon the note in the name of Forrest, Marshall, Ch. J., said: "The suit is instituted on a promissory note given, not to the company, but to Joseph Forrest, president of the company. Although the original cause of action does not merge in this note, yet a suit is clearly sustainable on the note itself. Such suit can be brought only in the name of Joseph Forrest. It can no more be brought in the name of the company than if it had been given to a person, not a member, for the benefit of the company. The legal title is in Joseph Forrest, who recovers the money in his own name as a trustee for the company."

To notice particularly all the decisions in the various state courts having a bearing upon the question one way or the other, would not only take up much time, but be assuming an unnecessary task. I have looked, however, into a very considerable number of these local decisions, and it will be sufficient for every useful purpose, without going further, to state the purport of such as have been made in the courts of some of the older and more commercial states. The decisions in the courts to which I refer present three classes of cases. The first is, where a promissory note is expressed to be payable, for instance, to A.

B., agent of C. D., both agent and principal being named in the note. In such case it is decided that the principal cannot sue though named. It is held that a note payable to a person by name, though he is described therein as the agent of another, is a note payable to the person so described as agent, and that a suit upon it must be in his name, or in the name of his indorsee. The second class is where a promissory note is made payable to the cashier of a particular bank, giving the name of the bank without the name of the cashier. In such case it is determined, and very rightly, as I think, that the interest and right of action are in the principal who is named, rather than in the agent who is not named. The third class is where a bill or note is made payable to or is signed by a person designated as agent generally, as A. B., agent, without naming the principal. In such case it is held that the simple addition of agent, and of course the simple addition of cashier, without any specification whatever of the name of the principal, will not authorize the admission of parol testimony to show who the principal is, and make him a party to the instrument. There may be, and indeed are, decisions in some of the state courts, not entirely reconcilable with the doctrine of the authorities which have been cited and referred to; but however much such local decisions may be entitled to consideration and respect on account of the source from which they proceed, they can have no influence upon the question before us, so far as they are at variance with the general prevailing rule of commercial law. In suits in the courts of the United States, as is laid down in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, supra), the true interpretation and effect of contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence.

Upon the whole it appears to me that the true rule of law as deducible from the adjudged cases, American as well as English, is, that no person, although in fact a principal or partner, can sue or be sued upon a bill or negotiable note unless he appears upon its face to be a party to it. A promissory note, according to the expression of very great judges, partakes in some measure of the nature of a specialty, importing a consideration and creating a debt or duty by its own proper force. Being assignable and passing by mere indorsement, it is necessary that the parties to it should appear and be known by bare inspection of the writing; for it is on the credit of the names appearing upon it that it obtains circulation. It is for these qualities and on these considerations that it is distinguished from written simple contracts in general and made subject to a different rule. The note in question here is a perfect instrument without ambiguity in form or purpose, and must have operation and effect according to the terms in which it is expressed. It is made payable to "Samuel Jaudon, Esq., cashier, or order." The promise therefore is to pay him, or the person to whom he shall order it to be paid, and it would be repugnant to the terms of the instrument to allow the Bank of the United States or any one else without his order to demand and enforce payment of it by suit. The bank is not named in the note at all, either as principal or otherwise; nor can it be inferred from anything contained in the note, that it was made even in trust for or for the benefit of the bank, or that the bank has any interest whatever in it. To let in parol evidence to show that the bank is the real principal, and hold that it may sue upon the note as such, would be to subject negotiable paper to the very uncertainty the law intended to avoid. It would be putting promissory notes on the footing of other written simple contracts, and prostrate entirely the distinction which sound policy as well as the nature and purpose of negotiable securities demands should be kept up between the two classes of cases. As the plaintiffs cannot be regarded as the payee of the note, it is almost superfluous to say that the note is neither evidence of money had and received to their use, nor evidence of an account stated with them. The note creates no privity whatever between them and the defendants, and we have already seen that by the bill of particulars they are limited to the note, and cannot go upon the antecedent cause of action, supposing they might otherwise do so under the declaration.

It is insisted, however, that there is evidence, aside from the note, of an actual stated account, showing the balance due, and that that, with the note, is sufficient to enable the plaintiffs to recover under either count. This might be so if the plaintiffs, though not the payees, were the real owners of the note, and there had been an actual accounting with them, personally or through their agents. But it appears that the accounting, whatever there was, was with Robertson and others, to whom the beneficial interest of the bank in the note, with the other effects of the bank, had been assigned in trust for certain purposes, and who, for aught that appears, are still owners of the property in the note. There is no evidence that the account of April, 1840, which was prior to the assignment, was ever delivered or sent to the defendants; and as to the accounts of April, 1842, and November, 1843, each is stated and rendered by the assignees, and each states the balance as due to them. The letter to Peck inclosing the account of April, 1842, is signed "Herman Cope, agent for J. Robertson et al., trustees," and states the account to be an account with them. The letter to Peck of May, 1844, is signed in the same way, and speaks of the account of November, 1843, as an account with the same persons. The accounts being stated and rendered as accounts with the assignees, to whom the property in the note belonged, I do not well see how the accounts can be treated as stated accounts of money due and owing upon the note to the plaintiffs, or as evidence of indebtedness to them. Even viewed as implying a promise which would follow the right of action on the note, or simply as evidence of indebtedness on the note generally, it would not help the plaintiffs; for, as we have already seen, they are not the payees of the note and have no right of action upon it.

If there had been an account stated by the defendants directly with the plaintiffs while owners of the note, recognizing their right to be accounted with for the note, or such an admission of their title to the money due upon it as would amount or be equivalent to an express promise to pay them, so that a cause of action might be considered as having accrued to and vested in the plaintiffs before the assignment, I do not mean to say that, in such case, the assignees might not sue and recover upon such cause of action in the name of the plaintiffs. How that might be it is unnecessary to inquire, because the evidence presented, in any just view of it, falls short, as it appears to me, of making out any such case.

§ 1194. Waiver of notice by part payment, or subsequent promise to pay.

6. The other note given in evidence is the promissory note specified in the bill of particulars, executed by Lyman & Cole to the defendants, and by them indorsed to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs being indorsees, and the defendants indorsers, the note was unquestionably admissible in evidence under the count for money had and received, if not under the other count. But the defendants can be chargeable only as indorsers; and this would be so, without any reference to the limited terms of the bill of particulars, whether the transaction be treated as a discount, and therefore a purchase of the note, or as a loan of money, taking the note in payment, or even as a taking of the note in payment of an antecedent debt. Viewed in either light, due presentment for payment and due notice of non-payment were indispensable to create any liability on the part of the defendants. There is proof sufficient of due presentment of the note for payment, but there is no direct proof of notice of non-payment. The only question, therefore, is whether there is evidence from which notice may be inferred. It has been often held that part payment, a promise to pay, or an acknowledgment of liability by the indorser after the note becomes due, is prima facie evidence, not only of notice, but of presentment. Now, what are the facts in relation to the note in question? We have already seen that there is sufficient presumptive evidence that Peck was the agent of the defendants, acting for himself and the others, and that his acts and admissions, relating to the joint interest, within the scope of his presumed authority, which of course extended to this note as a part of the joint concern, are to be considered as the acts and admissions of all. It appears that, after the note became due, several payments were made upon it; but as it does not appear but that these payments were made by the makers of the note, they will be passed by. What is material to be noticed is, that after the note had been duly protested for non-payment, it was charged and kept in a separate account, and that Peck, on a proposal to him to have it transferred to the general account, requested that it might continue, for the sake of convenience, to remain charged and kept, as it had been, in a separate account. In May, 1842, an account of this note, together with an account of the other note, separately stated, was rendered to Peck. He acknowledged the receipt of both accounts in June following, making no objection whatever to the account of this note, nor indeed any objection to the account of the other note, except that credit was not given the defendants for certain demands, called the Truesdell and Burrows notes, for which they claimed an allowance. Now, is not the request to have this note remain charged and kept, as it had been in a separate account, coupled with the fact of an account so charged and stated being rendered, received, and retained without objection, an acknowledgment of liability to pay the note, and can it be at all material whether the acknowledgment was before or after the assignment, or whether to the plaintiffs or the assignees?

I have said that no objection was made to the account of this note; and such, I think, is the just inference from the letter of Peck. But if the objection was intended to apply to the account of this note as well as to the account of the other note, it was not an objection to the justness or correctness of any item in either account, but merely to the amount of the balance claimed. The objection was that a certain credit had not been given, thereby impliedly admitting that the note was a proper item in the account. In Campbell v. Webster, 2 Mann., G. & S., 258, where the defendant, in answer to an account sent him by the plaintiff, admitted it to be all correct, except that the plaintiff had not credited him for a certain claim he had, and said he would pay the bill mentioned in the account if the plaintiff would allow that claim, it was held that this amounted to an admission of liability to pay the bill, a counterclaim being made the only objection to paying; and that an admission of liability amounted to an admission that all had been done which was requisite to constitute such liability. This is decisive that the setting up, in the present case, of a claim for a credit as the only objection, with total silence as to the want of notice, is an acknowledgment of liability to pay the note in question, and thereby an admission that notice had been given.

7. The only remaining question in the case arises upon the claim set up by the defendants on account of certain demands, called the Truesdell and Burrows notes, alleged to have been included in the purchase from the plaintiffs, and to have been controlled or discharged by them. The circumstances attending the Truesdell debt appear to be these. On the 10th of January, 1835, resolutions were passed by the directors of the branch bank, recommending a compromise of the debt, and an acceptance of an offer which had been made by the Truesdells to pay fifty per cent. as a composition. The resolutions were transmitted the same day to the parent bank, and the compromise so recommended was approved of by the parent bank on the 16th of the same month. The return made by the branch to the parent bank on the 1st of June thereafter, contains the debt in the list of the suspended debt, marked as "desperate," that is, of little or no value. The same return states that the compromise had been carried into effect. So it appears that the debt had not only been marked and returned as bad and hopeless, as early at least as the 1st of June, 1835, but had in fact then been compounded, and was so stated in the return, by the payment of fifty per cent. The debt, notwithstanding, still continued on the books of the branch bank, through some inadvertence or negligence, in the list of suspended debts, up to the 2d of March, 1836, to which time the contract of purchase had relation; the debt never having been transferred, as it is said it should have been, to the general loss account. The inference from all this is, that though the debt stood on the books apparently as a subsisting debt for a balance of fifty per cent., it was not in fact a subsisting debt, but had been canceled and discharged. If this fact was known to the defendants at the time of the purchase, the circumstance of the debt continuing on the books in the list of suspended debts can be of no real importance. It appears that two of the defendants, Peck and Lyman, acted as directors of the branch, from some time in 1834 to September, 1835, when the branch office closed. This of course included the time when the resolutions referred to were passed, and the compromise in pursuance of them was carried into effect. These two defendants, therefore, one of them being, as we have seen, the agent in making the purchase, must be presumed to have had knowledge of the facts in relation to the debt; and if so, it would seem to be very clear that the defendants, especially as the purchase of the suspended debt was in the lump on an estimate of its value in gross, and at a great discount on that estimate, cannot make the debt in question the foundation of a claim.

The other debt, the Burrows debt, consisting of two notes, also stood on the books of the branch, in the list of suspended debts, apparently a debt due at the time of the contract of purchase. It appears that a compromise of this debt had been agreed upon by and between the parent bank and Burrows, and that the compromise was carried into effect on the 1st of May, 1835, by giving up the two notes to Burrows, and taking his note for thirty-three and a third per cent. of the amount. Burrows failed to pay the note so given by him, and the compromise, by its own terms, became null and void; but the two notes which had been given up were retained by him. In the return made by the branch to the parent bank on the 1st of June, 1835, before spoken of, this debt is mentioned in a memorandum at the bottom as having been compromised at thirty-three and a third per cent., which memorandum is signed by Mr. Lyman, one of the defendants, as director. The defendants, therefore, are to be taken as having full knowledge of the condition and circumstances of the debt at the time of the purchase. They purchased the claim, whatever it was, in the state in which it then existed, as they purchased the other claims composing the lump of the suspended debt. For anything that appears, the claim exists in the same state now as it did then. The plaintiffs have not discharged it, interfered with it in any way, or done anything to deprive the defendants of any right or benefit they could claim in or out of it under the purchase. The plaintiffs sold the debt as it was, as they sold the rest of the suspended debt, without any guaranty or representation whatever on their part; and the appearance of it, as presented by the books, could not have deceived or misled the defendants, two of them having officiated as directors of the branch at the time the compromise was effected. It must be presumed that these two defendants, one of whom, as before remarked, was the agent in making the purchase, knew the terms of the compromise, and all that had been done in pursuance of it. I am obliged, therefore, to say that I see no legal grounds on which this claim, any more than the other, can be sustained.

Having thus disposed of all the questions raised in the case, I have only to say, in conclusion, that the result from the whole is that, for the reasons given on some of the points reserved, the verdict, in my opinion, ought to be set aside and a new trial granted.

§ 1196. Bank cannot sue in its own name upon note payable to its cashier.

Opinion by NELSON, J.

The plaintiffs cannot recover the amount of the large note made by the defendants on the 1st of April, 1836, and payable to Samuel Jaudon, four years after date, because they do not show a legal title to the same. That is in Jaudon. The addition of "cashier" is but a description of the person. I find no authority which will authorize the admission of parol evidence for the purpose of showing that the note arose out of a transaction between the parties to this suit, in which Jaudon acted as agent, and took the note in his own name for the benefit of the bank. The parties to the note must appear upon its face. If the name of the principal appears there, that will be sufficient, though the note is taken in the name of his agent. It is then, in contemplation of law, taken in the name of the principal, and he is the payee. Any other rule would very much embarrass the negotiability of this species of commercial paper.

2. The legal interest in the note being in Jaudon as payee, the note is evidence under the money counts only of money had and received by the defendants from him, and not from the plaintiffs, and is not available to sustain the count for money had and received. If the declaration had embraced a count founded on the original consideration, it may be that on canceling the note the plaintiffs could have sustained the suit. It is a note given to Jaudon for property sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and I do not see but that upon surrendering it the plaintiffs might have gone on the original consideration the same as if the note had been given to themselves.

§ 1198. Account stated.

3. The plaintiffs cannot recover on the count for an account stated. The accounts were rendered to Robertson and others, assignees and owners of the demands by virtue of the assignment of the 4th of September, 1840. The accounts were stated between them and the defendants, and any promise, express or implied, arising therefrom, or to be predicated upon the rendering of such accounts, is a promise to Robertson and others, not to the plaintiffs. No four-dation is laid for implying a promise to the latter. Robertson and others were not their agents. They were owners, acting for themselves, as trustees for the creditors. The plaintiffs are neither the legal nor beneficial owners of the note.

4. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover in their name the balance due on the small note of $5,000, made by Lyman & Cole, and indorsed by the defendants. The proofs in the case are full to show that John Peck acted as the agent of the other defendants throughout the transaction, both in negotiating the purchase, and in conducting and arranging the payments subsequently. This being so, his acts and admissions afford satisfactory evidence that all the defendants were properly charged as indorsers of the note. Payments were made and arrangements entered into, wholly irreconcilable with the idea that they or any of them had become discharged from their obligation by the laches of the holder or otherwise. The rendition of the accounts, also, including this note, and the claiming of a balance without any objection being made to this item, lead to the same conclusion.

5. The debt of Truesdell & Son was compromised conditionally at the branch office at Burlington for fifty per cent. on the 10th of January, 1845; the transaction was approved by the parent bank on the 16th of January, and the amount was paid before the purchase of the assets of the branch, all which was known to some, if not all, of the defendants at the time. The S. E. Burrows debt of $2,766.57, including interest, was compromised on the 11th of April, 1845, for thirty-three and one-third per cent., and his note was taken for that amount, $922.19, on the 1st of May thereafter, and the original paper given up. This was the Burlington debt, and the transaction was well known at the branch office. The compromise, as it regarded other debts due the parent bank, was afterwards annulled on account of the failure of Burrows to carry it into effect, and another was then effected with the bank, but it had nothing to do with the Burlington debt. That remained as it stood at the time of the purchase by the defendants. The defendants, or some of them, must have been fully acquainted with the situation of these debts at the time of the negotiation for the purchase, and the bank has not interfered or changed the condition or character of them since. There was no guaranty of the amounts due, and as the demands had accrued at the Burlington office, where two of the defendants were directors, they, it is to be presumed, knew more about them in every respect than the officers of the parent bank.

6. The proof is sufficient to show that the purchase was made by the defendants from the bank chartered by the state of Pennsylvania, and not from the old bank. For these reasons, I think, there should be a new trial, with costs, to abide the event.

New trial granted.

BANK OF NEWBURY v. BALDWIN.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 1 Clifford, 519-524. 1860.)

Opinion by CLIFFORD, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case was in some respects similar to the preceding, being an action of assumpsit upon a promissory note signed by James W. Baldwin. The note was in the following terms:

"$3,500. Five months after date I promise to pay to the order of O. C. Hale, Esq., cashier, thirty-five hundred dollars at either bank in Boston, value received."

The plaintiff bank was a corporation of Vermont, and the defendant, at the time of making the note and when the suit was brought, was a citizen of Massachusetts. As stated in the previous case, the defendant had, before the commencement of the suit, obtained a certificate of discharge from his debts in the insolvency court of Massachusetts, but the plaintiff in this case took no part in the insolvent proceedings. Defendant pleaded the general issue, and also the certificate of discharge in bar of the suit. It was agreed that O. C. Hale was the cashier of the Bank of Newbury at the time of the making of the note. The court said: "Two questions are presented for decision, but one of them is the same as that decided in the preceding case, and must be ruled in the same way;" and it was held, "first, that the power given to the United States to pass bankrupt laws is not exclusive; second, that the fair and ordinary exercise of that power by states does not necessarily involve a violation of the obligation of contracts; third, but where in the exercise of that power the states pass beyond their own limits and the rights of their own citizens, and act upon the rights of citizens of other states, there arises a conflict of sovereign power and a collision with the judicial powers granted to the United States which renders the exercise of such a power incompatible with the rights of other states. Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat., 213, 271; Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet., 635."

§ 1199. Parol evidence admissible to show note to cashier belonged to bank.

Another question, however, is presented in this case which deserves to be very carefully considered. It is insisted by the defendant that, inasmuch as the promise is expressed to O. C. Hale, cashier, without any designation of the plaintiff corporation, that the law applicable to negotiable paper deems the promise to be made to O. C. Hale as the payee of the note, and that no one else can have the legal title without indorsement; and consequently it is immaterial in whom the equitable interest may be. Mere abstract propositions are of little utility in the determination of a case, unless they are based upon the actual facts, as proved or admitted by the parties. Hale was in fact the cashier of the plaintiff bank at the time the note was given, and that fact appears by the unconditional admission of the parties; and the defendant also admits, if the evidence is admissible, that in taking the note he was acting as the cashier and agent of the plaintiff corporation. It is clear, therefore, that the only question presented is, whether the corporation plaintiffs can be permitted to introduce evidence to show that the person named in the note in taking it acted on their account, and not in his private capacity. Under recent decisions in this country it cannot be doubted that if the payee had been described in the note as cashier of the Newbury Bank, the suit in this case would have been well brought in the name of the corporation. Assuming the fact to be so, the case would then fall directly within the decision in the case of the Commercial Bank v. French, 21 Pick., 486, and several other cases therein cited. Now it seems to me that the agreement made by the parties supplies the omission in the note, and brings the case within the principle of that decision.

Reference is made by the defendant to the case of the Bank of United States v. Lyman, 20 Vt., 666, (a) as asserting a contrary doctrine. But it should be observed that there was no agreement in that case showing that the person named as payee in the note was the cashier of the plaintiff corporation. On the face of the note in this case it appears that O. C. Hall was cashier, and with the agreement superadded to what is written, I am of the opinion that the case must be viewed precisely as it would be if the words "cashier of the Bank of Newbury" had been written in the note, and on that state of the case no doubt is entertained that it would be competent for the plaintiffs to prove by parol evidence that the cashier, in taking the note, was acting as cashier and agent of the corporation. Banking corporations necessarily act by some agent, and according to the uniform usage the principal portion of their business is transacted through their cashier. There is some conflict in the authorities applicable to the particular question under consideration, and it may well be admitted that it is not easy to reconcile them, or to deduce from them a rule of universal application. Between the original parties to a note or bill of exchange, the general rule appears to be that the facts are open to inquiry, and consequently that an agent is not liable to be sued upon contracts made by him in behalf of his principal if the name of the principal is disclosed and made known to the person contracted with, at the time of entering into the contract. Accordingly it was held, in the case of Watervliet Bank v. White, 1 Denio, 608, that the indorsement of a note to "E. Olcott, Esq., cashier, or order," made upon it at the time of the purchase of the note by the bank of which the indorsee was the cashier, had the effect to transfer the same to the corporation, it appearing from the pleadings and proof that such was the design of the transaction. Folger v. Chase, 18 Pick., 63; Hartford Bank v. Barry, 17 Mass., 94. Where individuals subscribe their proper names to a promissory note, prima facie they are personally liable, although they add a description of the character in which the note is given; but it was held in the case of Brockway v. Allen, 17 Wend., 40, that such presumption of liability might be rebutted by proof that the note was in fact given by the makers as the agent of the corporation for a debt of the corporation due to the payee, and that they were duly authorized to make such a note as the agents of the corporation; and the court say that such facts may be pleaded in bar of an action against the makers averring knowledge on the part of the payee. Numerous other cases have been decided, in this and other states, which must have proceeded upon the same ground as that last cited, else the principle on which they rest cannot be sustained. Long v. Colburn, 11 Mass., 97; Mann v. Chandler, 9 Mass., 335; Episcopal Soc. of Dedham v. Episcopal Church, 1 Pick., 372; Emerson v. Prov. Hat Man. Co., 12 Mass., 237; Ballou v. Talbot, 16 Mass., 461; Rice v. Gove, 22 Pick., 158; Shaw v. Nudd, 8 Pick., 9; New Eng. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Dewolf, 8 Pick., 56; Medway Cotton M. Co. v. Adams, 10 Mass., 360; Thacher v. Winslow, 5 Mason, 58; Taunton & So. Boston Turnpike v. Whiting, 10 Mass., 327; Gilmore v. Pope, 5 Mass., 491; Inhabitants of Garland v. Reynolds, 20 Me., 45; Varner v. Nobleborough, 2 Me., 121; Irish v. Webster, 5 Me., 171.

Morton, J., says in Commercial Bank v. French, 21 Pick., 490: "The principle is that the promise must be understood according to the intention of the parties. If in truth it be an undertaking to the corporation, whether a right or wrong name, whether the name of the corporation or some of its officers be used, it should be declared on and treated as a promise to the corporation. Where the instrument appears to be executed in the name of the principal, the form of the words is not material." Wilks v. Back, 2 East, 142; Spittle v. Lavender, 5 Moore, 270; Pigott v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & Pull., 147; Combe's Case, 9 Coke, 77a; Frontin v. Small, 2 L. Raym., 1418; Taylor v. Dobbins, 1 Strange, 399; Mott v. Hicks, 1 Cow., 513. So, also, where a check was drawn by a person who was a cashier of an incorporated bank, and it appeared doubtful upon the face of the instrument whether it was an official or private act, parol evidence was held to be admissible to show that it was an official act. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat., 326. That case is a much stronger one than the case at bar, because the promisor had signed his name to the check without any designation of his official character, and in disposing of the case Mr. Justice Johnson says, it is by no means true, as was contended in argument, that the acts of agents derived their validity from professing on the face of them to have been done in the exercise of their agency. In the more solemn exercise of derivative powers, as applied to the execution of instruments known to the common law, rules of form have been prescribed; but in the diversified duties of a general agent the liability of the principal depends upon the facts that the act was done in the exercise and within the limits of the powers delegated. These facts, says the learned judge, are necessarily inquirable into by a court and jury. See, also, Hodgson v. Dexter, 1 Cranch, 345. Although it is stated that the defendant objects to the admission of the note in evidence, still it is evident that the question is not broadly presented for decision independently of the agreed statement, because the admitted fact that the payee of the note was the cashier of the Bank of Newbury at the time of the making of the note is as much a part of the agreed case as the note itself; so that in determining the question, that fact must be superadded to the note, else the decision of the court would turn upon something less than the whole case; and, indeed, the agreed statement proceeds throughout upon the ground that nothing is wanting to make out the plaintiff's case under the general issue, except proof of the fact that, in taking the note, O. C. Hall was acting as cashier and agent of the plaintiff corporation; whether that evidence is admissible or not is the question submitted to the determination of the court, and nothing else is submitted under the plea of the general issue. Under the special circumstances of this case, I am of the opinion that the evidence is admissible, and, according to the agreement of the parties, the defendant must be defaulted.

FULLERTON v. BANK OF UNITED STATES.

(1 Peters, 604-619. 1828.)

The act of Ohio, referred to in the opinion, permitted a joint action by banks or bankers against the drawers and indorsers of bills and notes, saving to each defendant all separate defenses.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This cause comes up from the circuit court of Ohio on a writ of error. The record exhibits a judgment recovered by the defendants here against the plaintiffs, in an action for money lent and advanced. The plea was non-assumpsit, with notice of a discount and a verdict for plaintiff below.

The errors assigned arise upon various bills of exception, the first of which was taken to the evidence offered to maintain an action, in these words: "The plaintiff, in support of his action, offered in evidence the following promissory note drawn by Isaac Cook, and indorsed by Humphrey Fullerton, John Waddle and John Carlisle."

"$4,000.

CINCINNATI, February 1, 1820.

"Sixty days after date I promise to pay John Carlisle or order, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States at Cincinnati, $4,000, for value received.

(Signed)

"ISAAC COOK."

Indorsed — "John Carlisle, John Waddle, Humphrey Fullerton."

"To the introduction of this evidence the defendant, by his counsel, objected, as evidence of a several contract of the drawer and each of the indorsers on the note, and not of any joint undertaking or liability of the defendants; which objection was overruled by the court, and the note permitted to be read in evidence under the act of the general assembly of Ohio, entitled 'An act to regulate judicial proceedings where banks and bankers are parties, and to prohibit the issuing of bank bills of certain descriptions,' passed 18th of February, 1820, to which decision the counsel excepted."

Cook, it appears, was originally made a party defendant to the action, but died pending the suit; the plaintiff suggested his death on the record, and went to trial against the remaining three defendants. In order to understand the bearing which the instruction moved for has upon the cause, it is necessary to remark that the state of Ohio was not received into the Union until 1802, so that the Process Act of 1792 (1 Stats. at Large, 275), which is expressly confined in its operation to the day of its passage, in adopting the practice of the state courts into the courts of the United States, could have no operation in that state. But the district court of the United States established in the state in 1803 was vested with all the powers and jurisdiction of the district court of Kentucky, which exercised full circuit court jurisdiction with power to create a practice for its own government.

§ 1200. United States courts may adopt state practice as to bringing joint action against drawers and indorsers.

The district court of Ohio, it appears, did not create a system for itself, but finding one established in the state in the true spirit of the policy pursued by the United States, proceeded to administer justice according to the practice of the state courts, or in effect adopted by a single rule the state system of practice in the same mode in which this court at an early period adopted the practice of the king's bench in England. So that when the seventh circuit was established in the year 1807, the judge of this court who was assigned to that circuit found the practice of the state courts adopted in fact into the circuit court of the United States. It has not been deemed necessary to make any material alterations since; but as far as it was found practicable and convenient, the state practice has, by a uniform understanding, been pursued by that court without having passed any positive rules upon the subject. The act of the 18th of February, 1820, alluded to in the bill of exceptions, was a very wise and benevolent law, calculated, principally, to relieve the parties to promissory notes from accumulated expenses. Its salutary effects produced its immediate adoption into the practice of the circuit court of the United States; and from that time to the present, in innumerable instances, suits have been there prosecuted under it. The alteration in practice (properly so called) produced by the operation of this act was very inconsiderable, since it only requires notice to be given of the cause of action by indorsing it on the writ and filing it with the declaration, after which the defendants were at liberty to manage their defense as if the note had been formally declared upon in the usual manner. It is not contended that a practice, as such, can only be sustained by written rules; such must be the extent to which the argument goes, or certainly it would not be supposed that a party pursuing a former mode of proceeding, sanctioned by the most solemn acts of the court, through the course of eight years, is now to be surprised and turned out of court, upon a ground which has no bearing upon the merits.

But we are decidedly of opinion the objection cannot be maintained. Written rules are unquestionably to be preferred, because their commencement, and their action, and their meaning, are most conveniently determined; but what want of certainty can there be, where a court by long acquiescence has established it to be the law of that court, that the state practice shall be their practice, as far as they have the means of carrying it into effect, or until deviated from by positive rules of their own making. Such, we understand, has been the course of the United States court in Ohio for twenty-five years past. The practice may have begun and probably did begin in a mistaken construction of the process act, and then it partakes of the authority of adjudication. But there was a higher motive for adopting the provisions of this law into the practice of that court; and this bill of exceptions brings up one of those difficult questions, which must often occur in a court in which the remedy is prescribed by one sovereign, and the law of the contract by another. It is not easy to draw the line between the remedy and the right, where the remedy constitutes so important a part of the right; nor is it easy to reduce into practice the exercise of a plenary power over contracts, without the right to declare by what evidence contracts shall be judicially established. Suppose the state of Ohio had declared that the undertaking of the drawer and indorser of a note shall be joint and not several, or contingent, and that such note shall be good evidence to maintain an action for money lent and advanced: would not this become a law of the contract? Where then would be the objection to its being acted upon in the courts of the United States? Would it have been prudent or respectful, or even legal, to have excluded from all operation in the courts of the United States an act which had so important a bearing upon the law of contracts as that now under consideration? An act in its provisions so salutary to the citizen, and which, in the daily administration of justice in the state courts, would not have been called upon otherwise than as a law of the particular contract; a law which, as to promissory notes, introduced an exception into the law of evidence and of actions. It is true, the act in some of its provisions has inseparably connected the mode of proceeding with the right of recovery. But what is the course of prudence and duty where these cases of difficult distribution, as to power and right, present themselves? It is to yield rather than encroach; the duty is reciprocal, and will, no doubt, be met in the spirit of moderation and comity. In the conflicts of power and opinion, inseparable from our very peculiar relations, cases may occur in which the maintenance of principle and the administration of justice, according to its innate and inseparable attributes, may require a different course; and when such cases do occur, our courts must do their duty; but, until then, it is administering justice in the true spirit of the constitution and laws of the United States to conform, as nearly as practicable, to the administration of justice in the courts of the state. In the present instance, the act was conceived in the true spirit of distributive justice; violated no principle; was easily introduced into the practice of the courts of the United States; has been there acted upon through a period of eight years, and has been properly treated as a part of the law of that court. But it is contended that it was improperly applied to the present case, because the note bears date prior to the passage of the law; and this certainly presents a question which is always to be approached with due precaution, to wit, the extent of legislative power over existing contracts.

§ 1201. An act modifying the remedy on contracts of a certain class is not inapplicable where the contract was made before its passage.

But what right is violated, what hardship or injury produced by the operation of this act? It was passed for the relief of the defendant, and is effectual in relieving him from a weight of costs, since it gives to the plaintiff no more than the costs of a single suit, if he should elect to bring several actions against drawer and indorser. Nor does it subject the defendants to any inconvenience from a joint action, since it secures to each defendant every privilege of pleading and defense of which he could avail himself if severally sued. The circuit court has incorporated the action, with all its incidents, into its course of practice; and having full power by law to adopt it, we see no legal objection to its doing so in the prosecution of that system upon which it has always acted. It cannot be contended that the liabilities of the defendants under their contract have been increased, or even varied; and as to change in the mere form of the remedy, the doctrine cannot be maintained that this is forbidden to the legislative power or to the tribunal itself, when vested with full power to regulate its own practice.

The next bill of exceptions has relation exclusively to the discount. It sets out a great deal of evidence, and sixteen specifications, if they may be so called, of the prayers asked of the court by the defendant's counsel; the whole making out this case. It appears that in December, 1817, Isaac Cook's note, with these indorsers upon it, was discounted at the Bank of Cincinnati, and renewed every sixty days down to February 1, 1820. It commenced at $6,000, and in September, 1818, was reduced to $4,000, for which amount it was renewed uniformly down to the last date. In its origin, one M'Laughlin's name was also on the paper, and sometimes he, and sometimes Cook, was the last indorser, until March, 1819, when Cook was uniformly the last indorser down to the date of the present note. The proceeds of the successive renewals were, of course, credited to him, and passed to the payment of the preceding note. But on this note Fullerton stands as the last indorser, and the proceeds were credited to him, and Cook's note of the preceding date was charged to Fullerton's account without his check, thus balancing the credit which the discounting of the last renewal gave to Fullerton on the books of the bank. The note so charged was, of course, not protested, and thus Fullerton and his co-indorsers escaped payment of that note; and now they propose to escape the payment of this by insisting that without a check from Fullerton, authorizing the application of the proceeds as credited to him to the payment of the previous note, the bank is still indebted to him to that amount. This is an ungracious defense, and one which no court of justice can feel disposed to sustain. To repel it the plaintiffs introduced witnesses to prove that this note was expressly discounted in order that the proceeds might be applied to the previous note, and would not have been discounted otherwise; and contend that the bank, having the fund in hand to pay itself, had a right so to apply it without a check, upon the ground of implied assent. With a view to that question, the defendants below have introduced thirteen out of sixteen of their prayers. They all go to maintain the single proposition that Fullerton, as last indorser, was entitled to credit for the proceeds of this note, and is still entitled if they have not been legally applied to the payment of the note which preceded it.

The remaining three prayers, to wit, the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth, raise a question on the sufficiency of the demand on the drawer, and of the notice of non-payment to the indorser, and the proof introduced to establish both facts. The entry in the record on the subject of the charge to the jury is in these terms: "But the court, instead of the foregoing instructions as asked, charged and instructed the jury that to enable the plaintiffs to recover, the jury ought to be satisfied from the evidence that the note had been discounted by and become the property of the bank; that it was in the bank and not paid when it came to maturity; that due notice of the protest and non-payment had been given to the parties, and that such notice had been put into the postoffice the day after the last day of grace in time to go by the succeeding mail; that every note discounted in bank was prima facie to be regarded as a business note, and that when such notes were discounted, generally and regularly, the proceeds, of the note should be carried to the credit of the last indorser and paid to his check; that the printed and published rules of the bank ought, in the absence of other testimony, to be considered as regulating the course of business of the bank; but that if the jury were satisfied from the evidence that a practice and course of business in the office of discount and deposit in Cincinnati had prevailed and was known to defendants, and that the note in question had been discounted and treated in all respects according to such practice and course of business, but not according to the printed rules, the plaintiffs had a right to recover. That the bank had not a right to apply the proceeds of the note contrary to the understanding and directions of the last indorser, or to any other use than the use of the last indorser without his consent; but that if the jury were satisfied from the evidence that, according to the custom and practice of the bank, in the case when a new note was put into the bank for the purpose of renewing and continuing a former loan or discount, the check of the last indorser was sometimes required and sometimes dispensed with, and that in the latter case it was the practice to file away the old note as a check, and that if the note sued upon had been discounted and treated in the latter manner with the consent of the parties to it, the plaintiffs had a right to recover, and that such consent may be inferred and found by the jury from the facts and circumstances given in evidence, without direct or positive proof, if, in the opinion of the jury, the facts and circumstances proved warrant such inference. That if the jury find the note was not discounted the plaintiff cannot recover, or if they find that it was discounted but the proceeds remain in the bank carried to the credit of the last indorser, and not drawn or applied with his consent to any other purpose, the money may and ought to be set off against the note; but if they find that the note sued on was put into bank for the purpose of renewing a former note or loan, and for no other purpose, and with the understanding of all the parties that, if discounted, the proceeds could and would, by the course of business in the bank, be applied solely to the discharge of the former note, and that they had been so applied, and the old note retained and written off as a check by the bank, that the plaintiffs ought to recover."

The exception taken is to refusing to give the instructions as asked and to giving them in the form in which they were propounded to the jury. And the question is whether the instructions given covered the whole ground of the instructions prayed for and were legally correct in the form in which they were rendered. We are of opinion they cover the whole ground taken by the defendants, or at least as far as they had a right to require. This will be obvious from a simple analysis of the charge. The propositions which it imports will be examined in their order. The first is upon the sufficiency of the demand, and the law laid down on this point is "that on a note made payable at a particular bank it is sufficient to show that the note had been discounted and become the property of the bank, and that it was in the bank not paid at maturity." Nothing more than this could have been required of the court, for the positive proof that the bill was not paid will certainly imply that there were no funds of the drawer there to pay it. The fact could not have been made more positive by inspection of the books. The charge is, perhaps, too favorable to the defendants, since modern decisions go to establish that if the note be at the place on the day it is payable, this throws the onus of proof of payment upon the defendant. 4 Johns., 188. This is more reasonable than to require of the plaintiff the proof of a negative, and comports better with the general law of contracts.

§ 1203. Notice should be mailed so as to go by the first mail leaving after the opening of business hours of the day succeeding the last day of grace.

The next instruction is, in the language of the court, "that notice of the non-payment and protest should have been given to the indorser through the medium of the postoffice the day after the last day of grace, in time to go by the succeeding mail." The defendant's counsel, in arguing on this part of the instruction, insisted much on the obligation on the plaintiff to establish definitively and positively that the notice given was in time to go by the next mail, but has not adverted to his own omission in not putting into the case evidence that there was a mail established from Cincinnati to the place of the defendant's residence. Yet, if the jury might be left on this point to take that fact upon notoriety or personal knowledge, it would be difficult to maintain that they might not, on the same grounds, find the minor fact that the notice deposited in any part of the business hours of that day would be in time for the mail ensuing the third day of grace. It is argued that the language used by the court on this point is equivocal, and may have led the jury to suppose that sending the notice by the mail which succeeded the day after the last day of grace was sufficient. But we think the construction is forced. The words are: "the day after the last day of grace, in time to go by the succeeding mail." Succeeding what? Obviously the last day of grace; otherwise there might be no necessity for putting it in the office until the second day after the last day of grace, whereas the necessity of putting it in on the first day after is expressed in the charge. With this signification it was rather more favorable than need be given, since the mail of the next day may have gone out before early business hours, or no mail may have gone out for several days.

§ 1204. Where one note is discounted in renewal of another the bank may charge the old note to the last indorser and credit him with the proceeds of the new one.

The residue of the charge relates to the application of the proceeds of this note to the previous note without the check of the last indorser, and this also, we think, embraces all the defendants asked, and is as favorable as the law would sanction. It admits that this should be regarded as a business note; that the proceeds should have been passed to the credit of the last indorser, and should not have been applied otherwise than by his assent; but it then goes on to assert what surely could not be controverted, that with the assent of the last indorser the money, instead of being passed to his credit, might be otherwise applied; that, with his consent, it might be applied to the satisfaction of another note, for which he was indorser, without his checking for the amount, and that his consent may be implied from circumstances as all other facts may be. The jury have found, then, that with his consent it was so applied, and the evidence fully bore them out in their finding; if competent, it was all the law requires.

It may be proper to observe that every discount is in the nature of a cross-action, and if the discount filed in this case were thrown into the form of an action, it would be for money had and received to defendant's use. The merits of this defense need only be tested by the law which governs that action to make it clear that the evidence would not sustain it. It goes, in fact, to show that, in what are called renewals of bank loans, the lending is qualified, and not absolute; that, when credit is given and money advanced upon a note of that description, it is not an advance on general account, but only for the purpose of a specific application. Any act done by the bank, therefore, whatever be the mere form, if it have for its end the carrying of the contract into effect, in its true spirit and intent, must be binding upon all the parties to the contract. Nothing more is affirmed in this charge or verdict.

One general objection was taken in argument to the instruction given, importing a charge of inconsistency, inasmuch as, although it admits the note to be a business note, as it is called, and therefore to be passed to the credit of the last indorser, it permits it to be treated as an accommodation note in allowing it to be passed to the credit of the drawer. But if this were strictly the fact, what defense does it afford to the action if such were the agreement and the real understanding of the parties? In strictness, however, it was not passed to the credit of the drawer alone; for, in the progress of the ruinous system of loans which prevails over the country, the note discounted as the renewal of an accommodation note cannot be called a business note, nor can it, in correctness, be predicated of such a note that it is passed to the credit of the drawer alone, when the last indorser has, in effect, an equal relief from the application of the proceeds.

We do not deem it necessary to consider a question commented upon in argument by the counsel for the bank, and perhaps glanced at by the opposite counsel, whether this note was not void as an accommodation note under the rules of the bank, because not secured by a deposit of stock. No one of the exceptions raises the question, and we should think it injustice to the counsel for the plaintiffs here to suppose that he intended to raise it.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

HOWE MACHINE COMPANY v. HADDEN.

(Circuit Court for Indiana: 8 Bissell, 208-210. 1873.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Action on promissory notes executed by Hadden, payable to Good, who indorsed them to Fisher, who reindorsed them to Good, who indorsed them to plaintiff. Suit was brought against Hadden, Good and Fisher. Fisher demurred to the declaration.

§ 1205. Indorsee who reindorses note to his indorser not liable upon it.

Opinion by GRESHAM, J.

It is clear that Good could not maintain an action against Fisher on the latter's indorsements. The law presumes from Good's possession of the notes, after their reindorsement to him by Fisher, that they were paid by Good as the first indorser. And further, if Good could sue Fisher on the latter's indorsement, Fisher could turn round and sue Good on his prior indorsement. To prevent this circuitry or multiplicity of actions, the law in such cases allows the liability of the first indorser to extinguish the liability of the second. Byles on Bills, 154; Bishop v. Hayward, 4 Term R., 470. Fisher's liability being extinguished as between him and Good, can the plaintiff, Good's indorsee, recover from Fisher? In reason it would seem not unfair to say that the indorsement and possession of Good, the payee, was prima facie evidence that he had got the notes back by payment or purchase. But if the indorsements on these notes were in blank, there is authority for saying the presumption would be that Fisher had signed for the accommodation of Good. If a bill or commercial note be bought from the maker or some prior indorser before maturity, in good faith, the indorsement being in the usual form, in blank, the presumption is that the subsequent indorsements were made for the accommodation of the maker or prior indorser. Palmer v. Whitney, 21 Ind., 58; Runyan v. Ræd, 6 Am. L. Reg. (O. S.), 305; Maulden v. Branch Bank, 2 Ala., 502. The third note in suit was past due some time before any of the indorsements were made on it; as to it there is no ground for presuming that Fisher indorsed for Good's accommodation. The indorsements on the first, second and fourth notes are without date, and the presumption is that they were made before maturity. But it will be observed that all the indorsements are special. Good, Fisher and the plaintiff are the only persons who have held the notes. Good, the payee, indorsed to Fisher, who reindorsed to Good, who then indorsed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff had no right to infer that Fisher had indorsed for the accommodation of Good. In fact, the special indorsements were notice to the plaintiff to the contrary, and informed it that Good had come into possession of the notes by payment or purchase. Knowing this, the plaintiff had no more right to buy the notes from Good, expecting to hold Fisher liable, than if it had known that Good had released Fisher for a consideration. It will not do for the plaintiff to insist that Fisher must be held to have indorsed for accommodation of Good, when in each paragraph of the complaint it is alleged that "said Good indorsed the same (note) to the defendant Fisher, who in course of trade indorsed the same to said Good, who, in like manner, indorsed the same to this plaintiff."

§ 1235. — indorsee against indorser; bankruptcy of maker.—An indorsee may sue an indorser, although the maker is in bankruptcy, and his estate will pay fifty per cent. of the claims against it. The indorser cannot sue the maker, neither is he obliged to proceed against the maker's estate. The case is not parallel with that of a maker who is deceased, and the indorser is obliged to proceed against his estate. National Bank of Commerce v. Booth, * 5 Biss., 129.

§ 1237. While an instrument under seal transferring to an assignee a vast number of bills, bonds, notes and accounts, constituting all the debts owned by the assignor, will operate to pass to the assignee an equitable interest in a bill of exchange, it is not such an assignment of it as will authorize the assignee to sue the drawer in his own name. Suit must be brought in the name of the assignor, and the assignee is not even a necessary party. Hopkirk v. Page, 2 Marsh, 20 (§§ 1018-1026).

Green*, 4 Hughes, 446.

§ 1242. — acceptor without funds.—One who accepts a bill of exchange without funds cannot recover against the drawer without showing that he has paid the bill, or has done something equivalent thereto, e. g., been imprisoned for not paying it. Parker v. United States, Pet. C. C., 262.

§ 1243. — holder not obliged to sue.—The holder of an unpaid bill of exchange need not sue any of the parties to it, in order to strengthen his claim on his indorser. Brown v. Jackson, * 2 Wash., 24.

§ 1244. — agent cannot sue.—A mere agent cannot maintain an action in his own name on a negotiable note in his hands, although it be with the consent of his principal. He must be the owner of the note or have some substantial interest in it or sue in the name of the real owner. Prima facie, the possession of a negotiable note is evidence of the party's being a holder for a valuable consideration, and, unless the note has been previously stolen or received by him under suspicious circumstances, he is not bound to prove by other evidence that he is such a bona fide holder. But if it is admitted or proved aliunde that he is but a mere agent and holds the note as such, he is not competent to recover judgment upon it in his own name. Thatcher v. Winslow, * 5 Mason, 58. See, also, Gunn v. Cantine, 10 Johns., 387; Gilmore v. Pope, 5 Mass., 491.

§ 1247. — no action on void assignment.—A. assigned notes to B. On one of the assignments "P. City Savings Institution" was named, but B. was not designated as acting for that institution. The notes were discounted by that institution, and assigned to B., its secretary and cashier. Held, that the assignment was void under an act forbidding unincorporated banking institutions from doing business which an incorporated bank might do; and held, that B. could not sue upon such assignment, even in Indiana. Where, by the laws of a state, an assignment made therein is void, the assignee cannot sue the maker in a sister state where the note was originally made. McClintick v. Cummins, * 3 McL., 158.

§ 1248. — note payable to bearer; assignee may sue.— One who holds a note payable to A. or bearer may sue upon it in his own name, although his assignor could not have sued upon it in a federal court, and although there were other joint assignees interested in the note beside the holder. Possession of the note by such holder is evidence of ownership and right to sue. Halsted v. Lyon, * 2 McL., 236.

§ 1249. — action by one partner against sureties.— Where sureties sign a note payable to "M." and "F." M. cannot alone sue them on the ground that F. was by error made the payee, unless it be alleged and proved that the sureties understood and agreed to sign and secure the note simply as the obligation of F. McMicken v. Webb, * 6 How., 292.

§ 1250. — liability of assignor by deed.— The liability of one who by deed assigns an overdue note depends exclusively upon the covenants in the deed. Richards v. Holmes, 18 How., 143.

§ 1251. — accommodation indorsers.— A note being offered for discount, the bank demanded a town-indorser, and the plaintiff indorsed it, and subsequently paid it; held, that he could recover the full amount paid by him from either of two accommodation indorsers. Mason v. Mason, * 3 Cr. C. C., 648.

§ 1252. An indorser who is obliged to take up a note may recover the whole amount from either of two prior accommodation indorsers. Mason v. Mason, * 4 Cr. C. C., 401.

§ 1253. A drawer who pays a bill for the benefit of the acceptor may sue the acceptor upon it in the name of the payee. Davis v. McConnell, * 3 McL., 331.

§ 1254. — money had and received.— An action for money had and received will not lie against one shown to have been a mere accommodation indorser. Such indorser is chargeable only on a special count on the note. Page v. Alexandria, * 7 Wheat., 35.

§ 1255. — against acceptor.— An action for money had and received lies against the acceptor of a bill of exchange payable to plaintiff out of a particular fund, where the fund is afterwards received but paid to the holder of a subsequent draft. Grommer v. Carroll, 4 Cr. C. C., 400.

§ 1256. — agent; liability of.— An agent is personally liable on his indorsement. M'Murtrie v. Jones, * 3 Wash., 206.

§ 1257. — assigner against acceptor.— Where a non-negotiable order, payable to A. or bearer, is accepted by the drawee and subsequently assigned, the assignee may maintain an action for money had and received against the acceptor, the latter having had notice of the assignment. Weston v. Penniman, 1 Mason, 806.

§ 1258. — renewal; change in order of accommodation indorsers.— In an action upon a series of promissory notes indorsed for the accommodation of the maker, it appeared that the notes were given in renewal of other notes, on which the defendant was second indorser and the plaintiff first indorser; but when the notes sued upon were given in renewal of the prior notes, the name of the defendant was used as payee and first indorser, and that of plaintiff as second indorser. There was no agreement or understanding that this change in the order of names was to change the liability of the parties. Held, that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff upon the notes for the amount the plaintiff had advanced upon them. Pomeroy v. Clark, * 1 MacArth., 606.

§ 1259. — drawee against drawer of bill chargeable to third person.— The drawer of a bill of exchange which directs the drawee to charge the amount of it to a third person is not liable to the drawee who pays it, it not being shown that the drawer was the agent of the third person to whom it was directed to be charged. Bell v. Davidson, 3 Wash., 329.

§ 1260. — administrator of partner of drawee.— Ryder & Co. drew a bill of exchange on Varrin, payable to Reel, Barnes & Co. or order. Varrin was a member of the firm of Varrin & Reel. Reel died, leaving Barnes as his administrator, who proceeded to settle Reel's estate, including the affairs of Varrin & Reel. In doing so, he came into possession of a large partnership fund, $30,000, one-half of which he turned over to the executor of Varrin, who had also died, without paying the bill upon which Barnes subsequently brought suit. Held, that Barnes was not obligated to pay, out of the portion of partnership funds in his hands belonging to Varrin's estate, the bill drawn upon Varrin. These funds he held as administrator of Reel, and it was not his duty to pay the debts of Reel's partner, Varrin, even though they were debts owing to himself or his firm. Barnes v. Ryder, * 3 McL., 374.

§ 1261. — executors of deceased partner may be sued; surviving partners.— Payment of a bill of exchange will be enforced in equity against executors of a deceased partner, where the survivors have become insolvent. The court will not enter a decree against the survivors, but against the executors for the full amount. Van Reimsdyk v. Kane, 1 Gall., 630.

§ 1262. — officer of corporation; who liable.— Where a note is signed "A., General Manag. & Supt. St. L. Co.," A.'s personal liability is not absolutely presumed, but evidence is admissible to prove that he acted for and as the agent of the company, and that at the time the note was given it was agreed he should not be bound personally. Gerber v. Stuart,* 1 Mont. T'y, 172.

§ 1263. Right to sue in federal courts.—The bona fide holder of a note may sue in the federal courts upon it, although the indorser indorsed it for the purpose of enabling the indorsee to sue in a federal court. Lanning v. Lockett, 10 Fed. R., 451. See § 1104.

§ 1264. In an action upon a negotiable promissory note it was proved that the plaintiff was to account to a bank for the note, as agent; that the note was never actually delivered to him, and that the assignment was made to him as a citizen of a foreign jurisdiction for the sole purpose of enabling the bank, through him, to bring suit in the federal court. Held, that he could not, as indorsee, maintain an action on the note in the federal court. Welles v. Newberry, 4 McL., 226.

§ 1265. The fact that a note sued upon in a federal court is the property of a citizen of the state in which the defendant is also a citizen, and that it is not, in truth, the property of the plaintiff, may be pleaded in defense to such action. Such a plea is in bar, and not to the jurisdiction; and the local law of the state cannot be applied so as to cut off this defense. Lanning v. Lockett, 10 Fed. R., 451.

§ 1266. The eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, relative to the jurisdiction of federal courts as to suits by assignees of choses in action, has no application to a suit by such an assignee to recover possession of the thing in specie, or damages for its wrongful caption or detention. It only applies to suits brought to recover the contents of the chose, or to enforce the contract contained in the instrument assigned. Deshler v. Dodge, 16 How., 622.

§ 1267. — removal of payee to another state; assignee.—Where both maker and payee of a promissory note are citizens of the same state, and the payee afterwards becomes a citizen of another state, he may sue upon the note in the federal courts, as may also one to whom he assigns the note after becoming a citizen of another state, where the assignee is himself a citizen of a different state from that of the maker. Kirkman v. Hamilton,* 6 Pet., 20.

§ 1268. — check; indorsee against indorser.—An indorsee of a check may sue his immediate indorser in a federal court if they are citizens of different states, although a suit could not be maintained there against the drawer. Coffee v. Planters' Bank, 13 How., 183.

§ 1269. — notes payable to bearer.—The judiciary act of 1789 does not apply to notes payable to bearer. The parties to an action upon such a note being citizens of different states may maintain the action in a federal court. So held in an action on a note payable to A., or bearer; and it need not be shown that A. is a fictitious person, or a resident of a different state from the plaintiff. Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason, 243; Varner v. West, 1 Woods, 493.

§ 1270. — indorsement to bearer.—An indorsement to bearer makes a contract with the bearer, who may sue in a federal court, regardless of the citizenship of the payee. Codman v. V. & C. R. Co., 17 Blatch., 1.

§ 1271. — indorsee against indorser.—The indorsee of a note may sue the indorser in a United States court, they being citizens of different states, although the payee and maker were citizens of the same state. Dennison v. Larned, 6 McL., 493; Gaylord v. Johnson, 5 McL., 448; Campbell v. Jordan, Hemp., 534; Young v. Bryan, 6 Wheat., 146.

§ 1272. An indorsee, resident in one state, may sue his immediate indorser in a federal court in another state, where such indorser resides, even though the maker resides there also. But if the suit is against a remote indorser, plaintiff must show that his intermediate indorser could have sued in the federal court. Mollan v. Torrance, 9 Wheat., 537.

§ 1273. — alien against county.—The federal courts have jurisdiction of an action on a negotiable county order, brought by the holder, a citizen of Great Britain, against the county supervisors. Lyell v. Supervisors of Lapeer Co., 6 McL., 446.

§ 1274. — joint makers.—A suit against joint makers, one of whom was a citizen of Michigan (on whom process was served) and the other (not served and not appearing) was a citizen of New York, as was also the plaintiff, was held within the jurisdiction of the United States court. Doremas v. Bennett, 4 McL., 224.

§ 1275. — executors against executors.—In an action on a note by the payee's executors against the drawer's executors, it is not necessary to entitle the United States court to jurisdiction to show that the parties to the note were citizens of different states. If the executors were citizens of the different states it is sufficient. Childress v. Emory, 8 Wheat., 642.

§ 1276. — assignee of bank.—The assignee of a bank may sue another bank in a United States court for damages for negligence in collecting drafts, although neither bank could have sued the other in such court. Barney v. Globe Bank, 5 Blatch., 107.

§ 1278. By the statutes of Alabama, promissory notes may be assigned by indorsement and the assignee may maintain an action in his own name on such notes. By the act of 1833, the same rights are given to the holder of notes given to a certain person or bearer, or to a fictitious person or bearer only; and the assignment of such notes by delivery only authorizes a suit by the holder in his own name. The holder of a note payable to A. B. or bearer may avail himself of these provisions of law, call himself an assignee of the note from A. B.; but the holder of such a note payable to bearer is not an assignee within the provisions of the judiciary act of 1789. Ibid.

§ 1279. — concurrent remedies; bankruptcy.— Where an indorsee of a protested bill of exchange brought suit against the drawers, who were also payees and indorsers of the bill, in a state court of Louisiana, and the suit was, by order of the court, transferred to another court of the state, and cumulated with the proceedings in bankruptcy which were pending against the drawers of the bill in the last named court, and the plaintiff performed no act to make himself a party to the proceedings in insolvency, and the plaintiff also being a citizen of New York, held, that these proceedings did not disable the plaintiff from maintaining an action on the bill in the circuit court of the United States. Hyde v. Stone, 20 How., 170.

§ 1280. — indorsee against maker.— An indorsee cannot sue the maker in a federal court where the indorser and maker resided in the same state at the time of the indorsement and making of the note. And it matters not that the indorsement was for the accommodation of the maker. Small v. King, 5 McL., 147; Shuford v. Cain, 1 Abb., 302; Gregg v. Weston, 7 Biss., 860.

§ 1281. — maker and indorser; suing jointly.— The maker and the indorser of a note cannot be sued jointly in a United States court. They must be proceeded against separately, even where the statutes of the state where the court is held provide that they may be sued jointly. Shuford v. Cain, 1 Abb., 303.

§ 1283. — aliens.— United States courts have no jurisdiction of actions upon promissory notes the parties to which are aliens. Nor can a suit be maintained on such paper in such courts by a subsequent holder who is a citizen of the United States. Montalet v. Murray, 4 Cr., 46.

§ 1284. Assumpsit; evidence.— Assumpsit may be maintained on a promissory note, and also on a count for the money for which the note was given. If the note is valid it is admissible evidence under either count; if void, it may be laid out of view entirely, and the case decided upon the evidence introduced under the money counts. Evidence of an original loan by a bank to J., M. and P., on their joint and several note, followed by several renewals of such note, is sufficient to sustain the count for money advanced. Moore v. Bank of Metropolis,* 13 Pet., 311.

§ 1286. An indorsee may sue his indorser in assumpsit. Campbell v. Jordan, Hemp., 534; Morgan v. Reintzel,* 7 Cr., 273.

§ 1287. Debt; indorsee against acceptor.— Debt lies by an indorsee against an acceptor of an inland bill. Vowell v. Alexander,* 1 Cr. C. C., 38; Raborg v. Peyton, 2 Wheat., 385.

§ 1288. Debt lies in North Carolina and Tennessee upon a promissory note in the hands of an assignee. Kirkman v. Hamilton,* 6 Pet., 20.

§ 1291. Debt lies against the drawer of a bill by an indorsee, the intermediate indorsements first being stricken out. Home v. Semple,* 3 McL., 150.

§ 1292. In Virginia, debt upon a promissory note lies against a secret partner who has not signed it, and a creditor of the firm is a competent witness to prove the partnership, although the partner who signed the note has been discharged under an insolvent act. Bank of Alexandria v. Mandeville, 1 Cr. C. C., 575.

§ 1293. Debt lies against the maker of a note for $214, reduced by payments indorsed upon it, and which reduce it to $3.94. Hays v. Bell, 1 Cr. C. C., 440.

§ 1294. Several suits; consolidation.— The court will not order a number of actions of debt upon promissory notes due at different times, consolidated, although the parties were—the same in all, and each note was payable before any of the suits were brought. Bank of Alexandria v. Young, 1 Cr. C. C., 458.

§ 1293. Debt against stockholders.—Where the charter of a bank provided that, in case of default in paying its notes, the stockholders should be personally liable, held, that an action of debt would lie by a holder of such notes against a stockholder. Bullard v. Bell, 1 Mason, 243.

§ 1296. In equity; remote indorser.—In Virginia, an indorsee can sue a remote indorser only in equity. Harris v. Johnston, 3 Cr., 311.

§ 1297. A. made a note to B., an insurance company, by whose officers it was fraudulently transferred to C. C. presented it to A., who paid it. Subsequently the insurance company, by its receiver, sued A. for the note, alleging that he paid it with notice of the fraudulent transfer. Held, that C. was an indispensable party to the action, even though he is outside the jurisdiction of the court. Alexander v. Horner, 1 McC., 684 (§§ 1467-71).

§ 1299. A holder of a note or bill in Kentucky cannot sue a remote indorser at law, but may in equity. Bank of the United States v. Weisiger,* 2 Pet., 331.

§ 1300. Although a holder may not have a remedy at law upon a note against a remote indorser, this fact is not per se sufficient to give him relief in equity. Dean v. Marsteller,* 2 Cr. C. C., 121.

§ 1301. Covenant.—Covenant will not lie on a note. United States Bank v. Dounally, 8 Pet., 373.

§ 1302. Accommodation party; money had and received.—Where the evidence shows the defendant was an accommodation indorser, a recovery cannot be had against him under a count for money had and received, etc., the money having in fact been received by the maker. This is true, although the indorser frequently promised payment of the note after it became due. Page v. Bank of Alexandria,* 7 Wheat., 85.

§ 1303. Vendor's duty as to returning note of third person to vendee.—If the purchaser of goods indorses the note of a third person to the vendor, it is not necessary for the latter to return the note to the purchaser in order to sue him for the goods sold. Clark v. Young, 1 Cr., 181.

§ 1304. But if the vendor has disposed of the note, he cannot maintain an action against the vendee for goods sold and delivered, without putting himself in a position to return the note to the vendee if desired to do so. Harris v. Johnston, 3 Cr., 311.

§ 1305. Action on original demand.—An action may be sustained on the original account, notwithstanding a bill of exchange has been drawn to pay it. Taking a bill of exchange is only prima facie evidence of absolute payment; it is not conclusive where other circumstances qualify or repel the presumption. Wallace v. Agry, 4 Mason, 336 (§§ 778-776).

§ 1306. Goods bought; bills against purchaser; money paid for drawer's use.—A. bought goods for B. at his written request, and B. directed A. to draw on him for the amount. A. drew bills on B. for the amount in favor of third parties, whereupon B. refused to accept them, and A. then paid them, together with damages and costs. Held, that he might recover from B. the amount so paid by him under a count for money paid for B.'s use; and held, also, that A. might sell the goods purchased for B., without rendering an account of the sales. Riggs v. Lindsey, 7 Cr., 500.

§ 1307. False representations.—If A., upon the representations of B. as to the solidity of a firm, made in ignorance of the fact that the firm was in fact unsafe, indorse a draft for the firm and is afterwards obliged to pay it, he cannot, in consequence thereof, maintain an action against B. Russell v. Clarke, 7 Cr., 69.

§ 1308. Indorsement without recourse.—There can be no recovery upon an indorsement without recourse. Welch v. Lindo,* 7 Cr., 159.

§ 1309. Indorser.—A prior indorser is liable to one who has received a bill after its dishonor from a subsequent indorsee who has paid it. McCarty v. Roots,* 21 How., 432.

§ 1310. Suspension of action by accepting draft; attachment.—A., a citizen of Louisiana, sold a cargo of sugar on account of B., a citizen of another state. B. then drew for the proceeds of the sale upon A., and A. accepted the draft, which was then negotiated to third parties. Held, that the right of action in B. was suspended until the draft became due and should be dishonored, and B. could not maintain attachment against A. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How., 483.

§ 1311. Discontinuance.—Where the drawers and indorser were sued on a bill and severed in their pleas, the suit may be discontinued as against the drawers. Their liability was distinct from that of the indorser. In no respect could the indorser be prejudiced by the discontinuance. As a matter of course, it could be permitted at the cost of plaintiffs. McAfee v. Doremus,* 5 How., 53.

THIRD NATIONAL BANK v. HARRISON.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 3 McCrary, 816-831. 1882.)

Opinion by TREAT, D. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS. — These causes of action were based on promissory notes executed by Harrison, to the order of Alexander, payable at the Third National Bank. Alexander indorsed and delivered said notes to said bank as collateral to secure a demand note by him to the bank. The indorsement and delivery of said Harrison notes were contemporaneous with the execution, delivery and discount of the Alexander note under the following agreement:

"$5,000.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, October 4, 1878.

"On demand, after date, I promise to pay to the order of Third National Bank of St. Louis $5,000, for value received; negotiable and payable, without defalcation or discount, at the Third National Bank of St. Louis, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum after maturity; having deposited in said bank as collateral security for this and other loans—

One note, J. W. Harrison, one year, August 28, 1878.....	$1,188 29
" " two years, August 28, 1878.....	1,188 29
" " three years, August 28, 1878.....	1,188 29
" N. F. Coffey, sixty days, September 10, 1878.....	1,072 35
" N. F. & J. H. C., sixty days, September 11, 1878.....	1,050 71

Which — — hereby authorized said bank, or its president or cashier, to sell without notice at the Merchants' Exchange, in the city of St. Louis, or at public or private sale, at the option of said bank, or of its president or cashier, in case of the non-performance of this promise, applying the proceeds to the payment of notes, or evidence of debt held by said bank, including interest, and accounting to — — for the surplus, if any. In case of deficiency — — promises to pay to said bank the amount thereof forthwith, after such sale, with interest as above specified. The present cash market value of the above collateral security is — dollars; and it is understood and agreed, should there be any depreciation in the value of said security prior to the maturity of any note or claim held by said bank, such an amount of additional security shall be furnished by — — as will be satisfactory to said Third National Bank; and should such additional security not be furnished within twenty-four hours after demand on — — so to do, then and in that event said bank may proceed at once to sell, as above specified, the security herein named.

[Signed]

"CRAIG ALEXANDER."

This agreement represented the transaction between the plaintiff and Alexander in regard to this loan then made. The debt of Craig Alexander to the plaintiff (secured by this agreement) is yet due; only $500 has been paid on it. Alexander has paid the interest on this loan semi-annually. The Coffey notes mentioned in this agreement have been renewed from time to time, and renewal notes for that part of the collateral (except $500 which was paid thereon, and which was the credit mentioned as given Alexander in the main $5,000 note) are yet current, in possession of the bank, not matured. These renewals of Coffey notes were all made through Alexander; the bank did not see Coffey in the transaction. Alexander would bring in the renewal note and the bank would take it and give up the old note to Alexander. Demand has never been made of Alexander for the payment of the $5,000 loan. Craig Alexander has been director in plaintiff's bank during the period covered by the dealings mentioned in this case, and is yet such. In the bank it is customary, if a director wants a discount, to have him retire while his paper is being passed on. A memorandum is kept among the bank's papers, for the use of the bank, as receipt of the cashier to the discount clerk. This is numbered 3,470:

"No. 3,470.

THIRD NATIONAL BANK OF ST. LOUIS,

"ST. LOUIS, 10 — 5 — 1878.

"Craig Alexander has deposited in this bank package containing collat. D. L. $5,000, subject to —— order or instruction.

[Signed]

"T. A. STODDARD, Cashier."

The bank had no notice of the transaction out of which the notes grew. Alexander had a large running account at the bank during this time, and was at various times indebted to the bank on general account. Plaintiff offered in evidence the notes sued on in these cases. Defendant Harrison objected because same are incompetent and irrelevant, and because the pleadings do not deny execution of the notes, and because the notes are void under the Missouri statutes touching gaming and gambling devices. Objections were overruled by the court, to which ruling said defendant excepted at the time. Said notes were then read in evidence as follows:

“I hereby waive protest, demand and notice of protest.

“August 31, 1881.

CRAIG ALEXANDER.”

For the purpose of this case it was then announced by counsel that the following facts were to be considered as agreed upon by the parties thereto, and received by court and jury as proved herein, viz.: That the plaintiff has had on deposit on general account, to credit of Craig Alexander, at various times since October 4, 1878, more than the sum of $6,000; and that plaintiff has had on deposit on general account, to credit of Craig Alexander, at various times since the institution of this suit, more than the sum of $6,000. The plaintiff then rested. The defendant Harrison then requested the court to charge the jury as follows: “The court instructs the jury that on the pleadings and evidence herein the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.” But the court refused so to charge, to which ruling said defendant then and there excepted. Defendant Harrison then offered to prove the following distinct facts, to wit: (1) That each and all of the notes sued on in these cases were originally executed between the maker and the payee, Alexander, for the sole consideration of money won by said Alexander and lost by said defendant Harrison at a game and gambling device known popularly as “option deals.” (2) Said defendant also offered to prove all and singular the facts set up as defenses, and recited in the answer of defendant Harrison on file in these causes.

But the court refused to admit such evidence, and rejected both said offers of proof as separately made, and to such ruling as to each of said offers the said defendant then and there duly excepted. The defendant then rested. The court then directed a verdict for the plaintiff in manner and form as found by the jury, to which direction and charge said defendant Harrison excepted at the time. The foregoing was all the evidence given and offered and proceedings had at said trial.

On the foregoing statement it is contended that there was error because the bank, even if a bona fide holder for value, could not exclude from the consideration of the jury the original transactions between the maker and payee of the notes as void under the “gaming laws of Missouri.” It may be admitted that, as all the parties to these notes are, for legal purposes, resident in Missouri, the contracts are Missouri contracts, and subject to the laws of this state. Said gaming statute is in the following words: “Sec. 5722. All judgments by confession, conveyances, bonds, bills, notes and securities, when the consideration is money or property won at any game or gambling device, shall be void, and may be set aside and vacated by any court of competent jurisdiction upon suit brought for that purpose by the person so confessing, giving, entering into or executing the same, or by his executors or administrators, or by any creditor, heir, devisee, purchaser or other person interested therein. Sec. 5723. The assignment of any bond, bill, note, judgment, conveyance or other security shall not affect the defense of the person executing or confessing the same.”

This act came under review at an early day by the supreme court of the state of Missouri, when the distinction was sharply drawn between gaming and gambling devices and mere betting on uncertain events. Under the statute 9 Anne, c. 14, § 1, it was held (Bowyer v. Bampton, 2 Strange, 1155) that notes given for money lost at gambling were void, even in the hands of innocent indorsees for value. To the same effect are Lowe v. Waller, 2 Doug., 716; Lloyd v. Scott, 4 Pet., 222; Thompson v. Bowie, 4 Wall., 463. We have been referred to the following authorities as shedding light on the question: Chitty, Bills, 95; Daniel, Neg. Inst., § 197; Ackland v. Pearce, 2 Camp., 599; Shillits v. Snee, 7 Bing., 405; Henderson v. Benson, 8 Price, 281; Chapin v. Dake, 57 Ill., 296; Manning v. Manning, 8 Ala., 138; Hatch v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 439; Unger v. Boas, 13 Pa., 601; Mordecai v. Dawkins, 9 Rich. (S. C.), 262; Vallett v. Parker, 6 Wend., 615; Weith v. Wilmington, 68 N. C., 24; Jordan v. Locke, Minor (Ala.), 254; Stone v. Mitchell, 7 Ark., 91; Eagle v. Kohn, 84 Ill., 292; Thompson v. Bowie, 4 Wall., 463. The principle may be considered well established that when a statute pronounces a gaming or usurious contract absolutely void no recovery can be had thereon. The gaming statute of Missouri destroys the negotiable character of a note or other obligation given for a gaming consideration within the terms of that statute. The doctrine that void transactions cannot acquire validity by transfer of paper obligations based thereon finds full sanction, not only in authorities (supra), but in the many bond cases before the United States supreme court. 4 Wall., 463; 102 U. S., 625, 278; 103 U. S., 580; 94 U. S., 429. The broad distinction remains between contracts void ab origine, by force of statutes whereby assignees and indorsees are unprotected, and contracts contra bonos mores, which cannot be enforced between the original parties thereto, but are held enforceable when, being negotiable in form, they have passed to innocent holders for value.

§ 1315. A note for a balance on an option deal cannot be enforced by a bona fide holder.

The notes in question were, it must be held for the purposes of this motion, given for balances on an "option deal," an illegal contract, being, as alleged, a mere betting transaction on future prices, with no purpose of delivering or receiving the articles concerning which the bet was made. If the allegations of the answer are true Alexander could not recover on the notes in suit; and the court was in doubt whether the position the bank occupies should not be considered as exceptional, and thus open the equities between the original parties. It is evident that the bank could, at divers times, have collected Alexander's demand note and turned over to him the collaterals, and it seemed that defendants' position had great force, viz., that the transfer of Harrison's notes as collateral to the bank, under the circumstances, was merely for the purpose of excluding the equities between the original parties. Still the stubborn fact remained that the bank is a bona fide holder for value within the rules laid down by the United States supreme court in Swift v. Tyson (§§ 382-386, supra) and Goodman v. Simonds (§§ 420-425, supra), no evidence being given that the bank had notice of the infirmity of the paper. The court holds that the transaction in question is not within the terms of the gaming laws of Missouri, but if it was an option deal, as charged, would be unenforceable between the original parties, and even in the hands of an innocent indorsee for value.

§ 1316. Law and authorities as to "options."

The distinction is so clearly drawn and the doctrine so exhaustively considered by Judge Thayer, of the St. Louis circuit court (with whose manuscript opinion in the Tinsley case I have been favored), that it would be a mere repetition of what has been thus so ably done, to attempt to travel over the same ground, and hence I quote largely from his opinion as follows: "The law is now well settled, in all of the states where the question has arisen, that there can be no recovery had upon a contract or sale of personalty where the parties to such contract do not intend an actual delivery of the articles bargained for, but merely intend to settle differences at some future day between the price agreed to be paid for the commodity and the then market price. Such contracts are universally held to be invalid, as against public policy, and in some instances they have been held to be in violation of statutes relative to gaming and wagers. Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill., 33; Sampson v. Shaw, 101 Mass., 145; Kirkpatrick v. Bonsall, 72 Pa., 155; Gregory v. Wendell, 39 Mich., 337; Rumsey v. Berry, 65 Me., 570; Williams v. Tiedemann, 6 Mo. App., 269. But there is an apparent conflict of opinion touching the question whether a broker, factor or commission merchant, who has been employed by his principal to make contracts of this character with some third party, and has done so in his own name, but for his principal's benefit, may maintain an action against his principal to recover money expended for his principal at his principal's request in the settlement of losses accruing under such contracts. This precise question was considered in the Case of Green, 15 N. B. R., 201 (U. S. Dist. Court, W. D. Wis.), and it was there held that the broker could not recover from his principal for moneys thus expended in the settlement of losses on such illegal ventures. But it is to be observed that the court, in the case last cited, based its decision mainly on a statute of Wisconsin, which declared all 'notes and agreements void that had been given for repaying any money knowingly advanced for any betting and gaming at the time of such betting or gaming.' And the evidence in the case cited showed that the broker not only made the illegal contracts in question, but that he advanced the money for the venture. The court accordingly held that the case fell within the statute, and that the broker could not recover money thus knowingly advanced in furtherance of a gambling transaction. There are other cases, arising between factors and brokers and their principals, which the courts have apparently treated as though the action was between the principals to the illegal transaction. But the different relation existing between the agent and his principal, in actions by the former to recover moneys expended for his principal in the settlement of losses on wager contracts, was apparently not called to the attention of the court. Vide Gregory v. Wendell, supra; Williams v. Tiedemann, supra. On the other hand, the law is well settled in England that if a broker be employed to make wager contracts, such as are voidable under 8 & 9 Vict., c. 109, § 18, and at the request of his principal the broker pays the amount due under such contract, he can recover the amount so paid from his principal, and the illegal nature of the contract with reference to which the money is paid is no defense to an action founded on such claim. Warren v. Billings, 33 Law Jour. (1864), 55, N. S. Common Law, Michaelmas term, 1863; Pidgeon v. Burslem, 3 Exch., 465; Jessopp v. Surtoryche, 10 Exch., 614.

"In this country the same doctrine has been held substantially in the following cases: Lehman v. Strassberger, 2 Woods, 554; Warren v. Hewitt, 45 Ga., 501; Clark v. Foss, 10 Ch. Leg. N., 213. In the case of Marshall v. Thurston the court says: 'We understand the charge of the lower court to be, in substance, that if the broker knowingly assisted the defendant by an advance of money and active agency, though not as principal, to gamble in the rise and fall of bonds, no recovery can be had; but if the broker merely acted as his agent in effecting contracts between him and third parties for the purchase or sale of bonds on time, the defendant and third parties intending to speculate in the rise and fall of prices, and defendant suffered losses which were paid by the broker at defendant's request, or were paid and the payments subsequently ratified by the defendant by executing notes therefor, a recovery can be had. In this view the charge is supported by the authorities.' The rule which has the support of the great weight of authority (whatever may be thought of the policy and morality of the rule) seems to be as follows: If a factor, broker or commission merchant be employed by his principal to buy or sell commodities for the purpose of speculating on the rise and fall of prices merely, and the agent buys or sells in his own name, but on his principal's account, and subsequently, after losses have occurred in such transactions, the agent advances money at his principal's request to pay such losses; or if the agent pay such losses and the principal afterwards executes notes in the agent's favor to cover the amounts so advanced, the agent may recover against his principal the advances so made at his request, or upon the notes so executed, notwithstanding the illegal character of the original venture. The promise implied in the one instance and expressed in the other is neither void for want of consideration nor tainted with illegality. It was even held in the case of the Planters' Bank v. Union Bank that where the defendant, in violation of law, had sold bonds for the plaintiff and received the proceeds, the plaintiff might recover the amount from the defendant, and that the illegal character of the transaction out of which the fund arose was no defense. But, on the other hand, if a broker or factor supply his principal with funds for the express purpose of enabling him to engage in illegal transactions, and if he (the agent) conducts the illegal venture in his own name, it seems clear that he becomes a particeps criminis, and the law will not aid him to recover moneys advanced for such purpose, nor will it enforce securities taken therefor.

"The facts proven in the case at bar seem to bring the case within the principles last stated. The original notes involved in this controversy, of which those in suit were mere renewals, were not given after the various contracts had been settled, to cover losses which the agent had paid for his principal. The notes seem to have been drawn by the principal in favor of his agent at the inception of the alleged illegal ventures, or within a few days thereafter, while the transactions were still pending and the result undetermined. They were either given to secure moneys advanced by the broker to his principal, to enable the latter to prosecute the ventures, or they were given as an indemnity to the broker, to shield him from losses that he might sustain while carrying out the alleged illegal ventures in his own name, but on his principal's account. In either event, it would follow that the agent could not recover on these notes as against his principal, the maker of the notes, if the contracts or 'deals,' as they are termed, were mere wagers on the fluctuations in the market price of grain, and for that reason unlawful. Obligations thus intimately connected with an illegal transaction, and furnishing an inducement to the same, could not be supported as between the original parties, nor could they be enforced by the present plaintiff if it took the same with knowledge of this infirmity. I have no difficulty whatever in finding from the evidence that the parties, both principal and agent, had in view mere wager contracts upon the price of grain, and that the losses which the agent or broker eventually paid were paid on contracts which, as between the broker and the parties with whom he dealt, were mere bets upon the future market price of wheat, no delivery having been made or contemplated. To find otherwise on the evidence before me would involve a degree of credulity which the court does not possess. The case is thus narrowed to the single inquiry whether the plaintiff bought this paper with knowledge that it was not enforceable as between the maker and payee.

"The defendant would charge the plaintiff with knowledge because the payee of the note was one of plaintiff's directors, and ex officio a member of the board of discount. The evidence shows, however, that the bank (the plaintiff in this action) had no regular discount committee. The president was authorized to pass upon paper without the advice of the directory. If the directors were present, they gave advice on paper offered for discount. But in the present instance it appears that the originals of the notes now in suit were accepted in the absence of the director. The director states that when he had paper of his own to offer for discount he stayed away from the board, and that he did so in this instance. Upon this state of facts I am clearly of the opinion that the bank cannot be charged with knowledge of facts possessed by the particular director who was not present and did not act as member of the board when the paper was accepted. The director was himself the payee, and was offering this paper for discount. Whatever contract the bank made in accepting the paper and passing it to the director's credit was made with the director. He not only did not assume to act as agent of the bank in this particular transaction, but he could not lawfully act in that capacity had he so attempted. Washington Bank v. Lewis, 22 Pick., 31. The present case is widely different from the case of Bank v. Thomas, 2 Mo. App., 367, cited for the defendants; for in that case the paper was tendered by a third party, and the director, whose knowledge was held to affect the bank, was present at the meeting of the committee on discount, and voted upon the paper in the discharge of his regular duties as a bank officer. In the present case the bank cannot be charged with notice of any infirmity in the paper by any sound rule of law with which I am acquainted. Neither does the court concur in the view that the notes in suit are void in the plaintiff's hands, regardless of the question of notice, by virtue of the provisions of the act respecting gaming. Rev. Stat. 1879, c. 109. In the case of Hickerson v. Benson, 8 Mo., 8, it was held in this state that a wager on the result of an election was not within the terms of the statute respecting gaming, although such wagers were against public policy and sound morality, and void on that ground. And such seems to be the correct view with respect to immoral and fictitious sales of grain and other commodities, where no delivery is intended by the parties. Such contracts are simply contra bonos mores, and the courts will not enforce them, and would not enforce them in the absence of any statute on the subject of gaming. The result is that judgment must be entered on the notes against both of the defendants for the principal and accrued interest."

The petitions aver that the notes were assigned to the plaintiff; and defendant Harrison contends that therefore the equities were open. The difference between indorsement and mere assignment is one well known, and the point is well taken, if not cured by what occurred at the trial and the verdict. See Daniel, Neg. Inst., §§ 745, 729, 741; Hedger v. Lesby, 9 Barb., 214; Calder v. Billington, 15 Me., 398; Hadden v. Rodkey, 17 Kan., 429. The usual form of pleading is, when such is the fact, that the notes were indorsed to plaintiff; for the rights springing therefrom are quite different from those arising from an ordinary assignment. Hence the defendants' position in that respect is technically correct; but as the notes produced and the evidence showed an indorsement to plaintiff, an amendment would have been allowed if attention had been called to the defect. Consequently, the verdict, under the rulings and proofs, must be held to cure that technical error; or, if need be, permission given to make the pleadings correspond to the evidence and verdict.

§ 1317. Director's knowledge of illegality of note held not imputable to bank.

As Alexander was a director in the bank, it is contended that the bank is, in law, charged with knowledge of what was known to him, and the following cases are referred to in support thereof: Lemoine v. Bank, 3 Dill., 49 (§§ 428-431, supra); Bank v. Davis, 2 Hill (N. Y.), 451; Bank v. Thomas, 2 Mo. App. 367; Bank v. Campbell, 4 Humph., 394; Toll Bridge Co. v. Betsworth, 30 Conn., 380. While the general doctrine is recognized that what an agent knows his principal is charged with notice of, in transactions where said agent is acting for the principal, yet a bank director, in asking for a discount of his own paper, is not an agent of the bank, but acting as the adverse contracting party. Were this held otherwise, no bank could discount paper to which a director is a party without losing the position of an innocent indorsee for value under the law merchant. Hence no bank could have dealings in commercial paper with any of its directors on ordinary business principles. The opinion of Judge Thayer states the legal aspect of this question very clearly.

§ 1318. Maker not released by failure of bank holding his note to pay it with his funds on deposit with it.

It is further contended that inasmuch as Alexander had frequently on deposit, both before and after this suit brought, a sufficient sum of money to pay his demand note, it was the legal duty of the bank to demand payment thereof, and apply his deposits accordingly, thus leaving the collateral discharged of all interest therein by the bank. On this point the court has no difficulty, so far as the legal right of the bank to pursue the collaterals is concerned; yet it would seem that a failure by the bank to take pay for the demand note, and then sue Alexander as indorser of the collaterals, and Harrison, the maker, indicated other than a purpose to collect its demand against Alexander, who was its principal debtor. It had a prompt recourse against him; indeed, had funds in its own hands sufficient to discharge the indebtedness. Why, then, sue him and Harrison, unless its object was, under the formal position of an innocent indorsee for value, to enable Alexander thus to cause a contract to be enforced in his favor which the law would not permit him to enforce in his own name? It would be easy for the Missouri legislature to destroy, by statute, the negotiability of such paper, but until it has done so the courts must apply the law merchant to its transfer. To what extent inquiry is permissible into the position of parties, as in the case at bar, may be doubtful. The bank can elect its own course by proceeding against Alexander alone on his demand notes, or by enforcing its rights against the collaterals, or possibly by appropriating his deposits to the payment of his indebtedness. While courts should lend no encouragement to betting contracts, yet, so far as the law requires the protection of innocent indorsees of commercial paper, the rules pertaining thereto must be observed. It is obvious that the law may be evaded by giving negotiable notes and having them indorsed to innocent parties; but the remedy is with the legislature. It is said the contract indorsing the collaterals to the bank gave it only the power to sell the same, and not to collect them by ordinary process of law. As indorsee, the right to sue was complete, and the power to sell was an additional advantage which it might or might not exercise. But the question still remains, viz., should not the court have permitted the exact relationship of the parties to these notes to have been developed, to the end that no merely technical screen should be interposed to prevent the defeat of illegal transactions?

The testimony produced, and uncontradicted, proved that the ordinary course had been pursued as to the transfer of the collaterals, without notice of any defect therein, or of any outstanding equities between maker and payee. Any testimony contradictory thereof, whereby the legal relationship of the parties could be varied, would have been proper; but the contention was that, despite the direct testimony of the cashier, the facts and circumstances indicated that the bank was aiding Alexander to shut out the equities by holding the collaterals, notwithstanding it could have collected the principal or demand note at any time, and thus have released the collaterals. But it was for the bank to continue the demand loan or call it in, as it might determine. It was satisfied with the interest-bearing arrangement, and to take the course which it has done, and which it had the legal right to do. However suspicious the relations of the bank with Alexander may appear as to this point, they cannot overcome the direct and express testimony of the cashier as to the bona fides of the indorsements and the consideration therefor. The motions are overruled.

DAVIDSON v. LANIER.

ERROR to U. S. District Court, Northern District of Mississippi.

Opinion by CHASE, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A statute of Tennessee, enacted in 1827, and entitled "An act to suppress private banking," made it penal to erect, establish, institute, or put in operation, or to issue any bills or notes for the purpose of erecting, establishing or putting in operation any banking institution, association or concern. In January, 1856, this act being in force, several persons, of whom one Richard M. Kirby seems to have been the principal, undertook to establish a banking association or company in Memphis, Tennessee, under cover of a charter granted by the state of Arkansas for a corporation styled "The Cincinnati and Little Rock Slate Company." Their object was to issue bills for circulation as money, and use them in the cotton trade. About the time of the organization of the company, Kirby visited McMahon, of whose estate the defendant in error is curator, at New Orleans, and exhibited the charter and explained the views of the company, whereupon McMahon agreed to act as its treasurer and financial agent. In pursuance of this arrangement, circulating notes of the company, to the amount of $12,000, were sent to McMahon, who used them, as far as he could, for currency. He also made advances to the company by accepting and paying bills drawn on him; and, in the result, became its creditor in a sum somewhat exceeding $11,000. At the time of the arrangement with McMahon, Davidson, the plaintiff in error, and one J. B. Ellis, were members of the company, but afterwards withdrew. Subsequently, however, upon the request of Kirby, Davidson, with two others, consented to sign, and Ellis consented to indorse, several bills of exchange in blank, and among them that on which the suit below was brought. All the bills seem to have been addressed to McMahon as drawee. Shortly before, or very soon after, this transaction, H. M. True, the secretary and treasurer of the company at Memphis, absconded, taking with him all the cash in his possession.

There was some obscurity, and, perhaps, some contradiction of evidence, in the record as to the time and purpose of signing and indorsing the blank bills of exchange. Kirby stated that they were signed and indorsed before the absconding of True, to enable himself to protect the circulation of the company. Another witness said that they were signed and indorsed after that event, at the suggestion of Kirby, to relieve McMahon from the consequences of True's theft; but this witness said, also, that he only knew the object of the bills from a statement by Kirby, made when the other parties were not present, and was not confident as to the time of signing and indorsement. However these things may have been, it was certain that the bills were sent by Kirby to McMahon in July, 1856, and were filled up some months later, after vain attempts to obtain payment of the balance due him. All the bills, when they went into McMahon's hands, seem to have had engraved on their face the formal parts of a bill of exchange, with the name of the place of date, "Memphis, Tenn.," and the direction to the drawer, "John J. McMahon, New Orleans;" and all but one seemed to have borne the words, "Exchange for $1,000," in the upper left hand corner. In other respects, as to the time of date, amount to be paid and time of payment, they were left blank. The one now in controversy was filled up with the date, "July 15, 1856;" with the time of payment, "eight months after date;" with the sum to be paid, "eight thousand nine hundred and ninety-two dollars and forty-four cents;" and with a stipulation for "eight per cent. interest, from maturity until paid." Thus filled up, the bill sued on read as follows:

"Exchange for $8,992.44.

MEMPHIS, TENN., July 15, 1856.

"Eight months after date of this, our first of exchange (second unpaid), pay to the order of J. B. Ellis eight thousand nine hundred and ninety-two dollars and forty-four cents, value received, and charge the same to account of your obedient servants, with eight per cent. interest from maturity until paid.

"JAS. R. FERGUSON,

"J. LOCKE,

"THOMAS J. DAVIDSON.

"To John J. McMahon, New Orleans."

Indorsed: "J. B. Ellis, Ripley, Miss.; Richard M. Kirby."

Upon the trial, the court charged the jury that, if McMahon's object in advancing his money was to enable the company to put into operation a banking company in violation of the laws of Tennessee, the jury must find for the defendant; and, also, that if McMahon agreed with Kirby to redeem the circulation, intending thereby to enable the company to go into operation, and the company did go into operation, issuing bank notes in pursuance of that agreement, then the transaction was illegal, and the plaintiff could not recover. But the following instructions, numbered in the record 5th, 6th and 7th, were also given by the court: 5. "If, at the time the bills were given, the holder, McMahon, knew that the money would be used for the purpose of carrying on a banking company contrary to the laws of Tennessee, and if the banking company was then in operation, then the consideration of the bills is not affected by the use made of the proceeds of the bill, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless the defense is sustained on some other ground." 6. "The signing of a bill of exchange in blank is the giving of the holder an unlimited authority to fill it up at pleasure, and the party so drawing or indorsing is bound by the act of the party filling up the same." 7. "If the bills sued on were signed in blank, and delivered to Kirby to be sent in blank to McMahon, that would authorize him, McMahon, to fill up the bills and insert any rate of interest that was lawful, and the jury should find for the plaintiff, unless the defense is made out and sustained on some other ground."

It was upon these instructions, considered in connection with the evidence, that the questions to be decided in this case arose. Before arguing the merits, a motion to dismiss the writ of error was made. The judgment of the district court for $11,312.42 was rendered on the 6th of June, 1860. On the 7th a writ of error was sued out, and a copy was lodged with the clerk of the court on the same day, and bond for supersedeas given in double the amount of the judgment. A citation was also issued, dated 16th April, which was served on the 14th September, 1860, and the record, with the writ of error and the citation, was returned to the next term of this court. Another citation and apparently another writ of error, were issued on the 7th of June. Of the last-mentioned writ and citation there seemed to have been no service.

§ 1319. Writ of error not dismissed because not allowed by any judge.

Before proceeding to consider the questions arising on the instructions regarded in connection with the evidence, a motion to dismiss the writ of error must be disposed of. It is objected to the writ of error that it was not allowed by any judge; but this is not required. It is enough that it was issued and served by copy lodged with the clerk of the court to which it was directed.

§ 1320. A clerical error in date of the citation is no ground of dismissal.

It is objected to the citation that it was dated 16th April, which was before the date of the judgment; but it is clear, from the number which it bears, taken in connection with the judgment it describes, that it was issued after the rendition on the 6th of June. The date must have been a mere clerical error, and the service on the 14th of September was regular and sufficient. The fact that another writ of error and another citation, not served, were issued, cannot prejudice the writ and citation which were duly issued and served.

§ 1321. Approval of appeal bond.

It is also urged that the appeal bond was not approved by the judge. But it is a fair inference, from the acts of the judge, in signing the citation, and in witnessing the appeal bond, that he approved of the security. The judiciary act does not, in terms, require that the judge shall put his approval of the bond in writing, nor can a writ of error be treated as a nullity because sufficient security is not given. This court will take care, on application, that the rights of the defendant in error be not prejudiced by the omission, but will not dismiss the writ except on failure to comply with such terms as it may impose. Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 361 (APPEALS, §§ 682-729); Catlett v. Brodie, 9 id., 553 (APPEALS, § 1536). The motion to dismiss in this case must be denied.

§ 1322. Act to suppress private banking construed.

The first question upon the merits arises upon the fourth and fifth instructions. The court had already charged in substance that a contract in consideration of aid to be given in putting in operation an illegal banking company in Tennessee was void. From the fifth instruction, taken in connection with those which preceded, and with the evidence, the jury must have understood that in the judgment of the court a contract in consideration of aid in promoting the objects and effecting the purposes of an illegal banking company, when once in operation, was valid. We think this construction of the statute of Tennessee too narrow. The intention of the act was declared by its title. It was an act to suppress private banking. Its object was the protection of the people against the evils of an unauthorized currency — than which hardly any object of legislation is more important. The currency measures all values, and is the medium, directly or indirectly, of all exchanges. To keep it sound, and to guard it as far as possible from fluctuation, are among the most imperative duties and among the most difficult problems of government. In the construction of this act it was the duty of the court below, as it is ours here, to give effect to its obvious intention, if that can be done without disregarding settled rules of interpretation. What, then, is the true sense of the prohibition to erect, establish, institute, or put in operation any banking company, or to issue any bills or notes with intent or purpose to do so? What is meant by putting in operation or establishing a banking company? We think that this language has a much wider import than mere commencement of business. To establish a company for any business means complete and permanent provision for carrying on that business, and putting a company in operation may well include its continued as well as its first or original operation. This construction is supported by the prohibition to issue bills or notes. Taking the act of establishment and putting in operation, in the restricted sense of the instructions, the issue of circulation could not precede but must follow those acts. The prohibition of such issues, therefore, must be taken as proof that the legislature did not use the words in that sense. The emission and circulation of unauthorized notes and bills as money was the main object and business of the company, and it was precisely this object and business which the legislature intended to defeat and prohibit. We must construe the act, therefore, as covering with its penal prohibition the whole range of devices by which illegitimate currency is imposed on the community. It prohibits the use of such currency during the whole period of the establishment of an illegal company, and applied as completely to the last as to the first step of its operations. Any other construction would frustrate the legislative intent and leave the great mischief, which the statute was made to prevent, wholly without restraint or check.

It was quite clear, upon the evidence, that McMahon entered into the transaction, which resulted in the bill sued on, in the expectation of profit from aiding the operation of the prohibited banking company. He was engaged with its officers and stockholders in the scheme of imposing upon the community a prohibited and fraudulent currency. His name was upon its circulating bills, and his credit promoted their circulation. His curator cannot look to the law for remedies against his associates in this illegal undertaking. With this view of the statute and of the evidence we cannot distinguish this case from that of Brown v. Tarkington, 3 Wall., 377, decided at the last term. In that case we held that notes given for a balance found due on a settlement of accounts with an illegal banking company, and for advances to redeem its circulation, could not be enforced in favor of a payee who had been participant in the illegal business. The bill in this case, in our judgment, is of the same character. It was urged in argument that the contract we have been considering was made in Louisiana, and not invalid by the laws of that state. But this is not so. The bill of exchange was made in Tennessee. It bears date at Memphis, and was signed there; and the contract of the defendant below was to be performed there. We by no means say that it would be valid if made in Louisiana. It is not necessary to consider that question; the laws of Tennessee determine the question of its validity, and we think that according to those laws it was invalid. In our judgment, therefore, the fifth instruction was erroneous.

§ 1324. Authority to fill blank bill or indorsement must be pursued.

The sixth and seventh instructions remain to be considered. The sixth announced, without qualification, the proposition that the holder of a bill of exchange, signed and indorsed in blank, has unlimited authority to fill it up at pleasure and bind the signer and indorser by his act. This instruction cannot be sustained. The delivery of a bill of exchange signed and indorsed in blank only authorizes the receiver, as between himself and the drawer and indorser, to fill it up in conformity with the authority given him. If there has been no agreement, the authority is general; if there has, it must be pursued. The burden of proof that there was an agreement, and that its terms have been violated, is, in such a case, upon the defendant; but if he can make the proof it will avail him. No person, unless authorized, either directly or by just inference from the nature of the transaction, can fill up a blank bill for his own benefit, nor can such a bill be enforced against the drawer and indorser in favor of any one who takes it in bad faith; that is, with knowledge that it has been filled up without authority or in fraud. 3 Kent's Com., 119; 10 Smedes & M., 590. It is highly probable that the court below intended that its instruction should be taken with this limitation; but it was too general in its terms, and was, we think, calculated to mislead the jury.

The seventh instruction directed the jury in substance to find for the plaintiff if satisfied that the bill was signed in blank and delivered to Kirby to be sent to McMahon. It asserted that McMahon had the right in the case supposed to fill up the bill with any amount due him, and make the drawers and indorsers liable on the bill to himself. It is doubtless true that, subject to the limitations just stated, the delivery of a signature in blank is in general an authority to the holder to fill it up as he thinks proper. This rule, in its application to negotiable instruments, was very clearly stated by Mr. Justice Clifford in The Bank of Pittsburgh v. Neal, 22 How., 107 (§§ 405-407, supra), as follows: "Where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to the custody of another, with blanks not filled up, whether it be for the purpose to accommodate the person to whom it was intrusted, or to be used for his own benefit, such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks and perfect the instrument; and as between such party and innocent third parties, the person to whom it was so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed such instrument to his custody; or, in other words, it is the act of the principal, and he is bound by it." But the instruction before us went much further. It asserted the right of a drawee to fill up a blank bill and hold the drawers and indorsers, and this without any other authority than such as is implied in the fact that the bill was sent to him by the last indorser with the consent of the other indorser and of the drawers. Now it is quite clear that this fact implies no such authority. The only inference to be drawn from the circumstances that the bill was sent to McMahon in blank is that it was sent to him for acceptance. The structure of the paper excludes any other hypothesis. If, having received the bill in blank, he had accepted it and negotiated it to a third person, without notice of facts impeaching its validity between the antecedent parties, those parties would have been bound to the holder. But he, as drawee, could not transfer the bill to anybody without previous acceptance, and still less could he treat it as an obligation to himself. We think there was error in these instructions as well as in the fifth.

The judgment of the district court must, therefore, be reversed and the cause remanded for new trial in conformity with this opinion.

§ 1331. Options.—A note given a factor for money advanced by him to pay the maker's losses on a contract for the purchase or sale of cotton for future delivery is valid, although the contract was not to be performed by the actual delivery of cotton, but was to be settled merely by payment of difference in prices. *Lehman v. § 1332. Contracts of sale that do not contemplate the actual bona fide delivery of the property by the seller, nor payment by the buyer, but are intended to be settled by paying the difference in price at some future time, are gambling contracts, and a broker stands in no better condition than the seller to recover differences; and a note given therefor is void for want of consideration. In re Green, 7 Biss., 338.

§ 1350. Note sent across army lines.—A bill drawn by a person within the Confederate lines upon a person within the Union lines during the rebellion is void, although the payee did not know the drawee was within the Union lines; but the sum paid for the draft may be recovered under a count for money had and received. Williams v. Mobile Savings Bank, 2 Woods, 501.

§ 1351. A promissory note was indorsed in Alabama, during the war, and transmitted across the lines by messenger to the indorsee. Held, that the indorsement was void, and the indorsee could not sue upon it in his own name. Russell v. Russell,* 1 MacArth., 263.

Any draft, bill or note drawn in the Confederate States, or in any state under the proclamation of the president declared in insurrection, or in any part of them (except such as was permanently and absolutely under the control of the forces of the United States), upon any person or persons in the federal lines, is void as to maker and all other parties thereto, and is not to be received in payment of any debt when due to a citizen of any state adhering to the government. The question as to whether the place where the draft was drawn was within the Confederate lines is for the jury. The jury must be satisfied that the plaintiff accepted such draft in satisfaction of the debt due him, in order to give verdict for defendant. Moore v. Foster, Chase's Dec., 222.

§ 1356. For emancipation, valid.—A promissory note given by an emancipated slave to his master after, and in consideration of, emancipation is valid. Smith v. Parker, 3 Cr. C. C., 654.

§ 1357. Negro imported contrary to statute.—The fact that the negroes for whom a note was given were taken to a state contrary to the laws of that state does not make the note void for failure of consideration, if the vendor did not take them there. Randon v. Tobey, 11 How., 393.

§ 1358. A brought slaves into Mississippi contrary to the statute of that state regulating their importation. He sold them to B., taking B.'s note for the purchase price. In an action by an indorsee against B., held, that the contract was not void, and that the indorsee might recover. Harris v. Runnells, 12 How., 79.

2. *Payment.*SUMMARY — Accommodation acceptor; bona fide holder, § 1359.

§ 1359. The drawer and indorsee of a draft executed a contract for the satisfaction of it. Held, a good defense in favor of an accommodation acceptor against the indorsee. But such contract would not affect the rights of one not privy to it, with whom the draft was deposited as collateral security until such holder surrender the draft to the indorsee, upon which the satisfaction agreed upon between the drawer and indorsee attaches and extinguishes the draft. Where one form of security is surrendered for another, the creditor cannot hold both. He loses his right to the security surrendered. Farmers' Bank v. Groves, §§ 1360-1362.

FARMERS' BANK OF VIRGINIA v. GROVES.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE NELSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes up on an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana. The case is somewhat complicated and confused, and it will be necessary to state the material facts to be found in it in order to present clearly the legal questions involved, and upon which the decision must depend.

On the 13th March, 1837, Thompson L. King drew two drafts, amounting, in the aggregate, to $15,497, in favor of John E. Hunter, upon Moses Groves, who duly accepted the same. The liability of Groves upon these drafts to the bank constitutes the main point in the controversy. The drafts were subsequently, but before maturity, indorsed by Hunter to Lewis A. Collier, and by him passed to the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, the appellants, as collateral security for an indebtedness to the bank. Groves was an accommodation acceptor for the benefit of King, the drawer. The bank recovered judgment against Groves for the amount of the drafts in the Madison district court of Louisiana, December 1, 1840, and which was recorded in the office of the parish judge on the same day, in the parish of Madison, where the defendant resided, so as to operate as a judicial mortgage on his real estate and slaves. The bank recovered judgment also against King, the drawer, on one of the drafts; and, at the same time, held other judgments and demands against him, in which Collier was interested to the amount of some $15,000. These judgments and demands had been pledged to the bank by Collier as collateral security for his indebtedness. On the 26th February, 1841, a written agreement was entered into between Collier and King, in which, after reciting the several judgments and demands above stated, and held by the bank against King, and in which Collier was interested; and also reciting and describing certain plantations and lands, belonging to the said King, containing in all about twenty-two hundred acres, and a large number of slaves on the same, it was agreed, among other things, that if the said Collier should be permitted to purchase the said property at sheriff's sale on any of the aforementioned judgments for his own account, or for the account of the bank, at a sum not exceeding the whole amount of the several judgments and demands, or for a less sum, that then, and in that case, the said property should be received by him in satisfaction and discharge of the same; and the evidences of the several debts and demands thus held by him and the bank should be delivered up to the persons entitled to the same; and full discharges given; and especially to Moses Groves for and on account of the judgment obtained by the Farmers' Bank of Virginia against him. There are several other provisions and stipulations in said agreement; but, as they have no necessary bearing upon the material questions in the case, it is unimportant to notice them. Groves was a witness to this agreement. In pursuance of this arrangement, Collier became the purchaser of the property on the 13th of March, 1841, for the sum of $32,515, and received a deed of the same from the sheriff on the 16th of the month thereafter.

On the 1st of December, 1841, the Farmers' Bank of Virginia proposed to Collier, through their authorized agent, an arrangement of his indebtedness to them, as follows: 1. The bank to give him a credit on the same of one, two and three years. 2. And surrender all the collateral securities which they had received from him. And Collier, on his part, 1. To pay all the expenses of prosecuting the collateral securities to the attorneys in whose hands they are. 2. To give a mortgage, which was to operate as a judicial mortgage in favor of the bank, on all the property which he held in Concordia parish. 3. To assign to the bank certain notes, as collateral security, which he held against Dix and Glascock, amounting to $9,000. 4. To have all the mortgages that appear as incumbrances upon the property reduced by a discharge of record to an amount not exceeding thirty-five thousand dollars, besides those in favor of the Bank of Virginia, and Lancaster, Denby and Company. And, 5. To give three notes to the bank, one for $11,764.68, payable in twelve months after date, one for $12,470.57, payable two years after date, and one for $13,218.80, payable three years after date, amounting, in the aggregate, to $37,454.05. This is the substance of the proposition made by the agent, and which was intended as instructions to F. H. Farrar, his attorney, under whose direction the mortgage was to be prepared and executed.

On the 3d of December, 1841, the mortgage was duly executed by Collier, and delivered to Farrar, and accepted by him on behalf of the bank. It was recorded in the proper office, and a copy with the three notes transmitted by mail to the bank, agreeably to the instructions. On the 20th of April, 1843, the Farmers' Bank of Virginia applied to the judge of the circuit court of the United States, in the district of Louisiana, for an executor's process against the estate of Groves, he having died in December, 1841, praying that so much of his estate might be seized and sold as should be necessary to satisfy the judgment which had been obtained by the bank against him December 1, 1840, and which we have already referred to; and an order was granted accordingly; whereupon, Horace H. Groves, the son of the deceased, and administrator of the estate, filed the bill in this case in the circuit court of the United States, setting out, substantially, the facts already recited, and praying that the bank may be enjoined from proceeding to seize and sell any part of the estate, that the executory process may be set aside, and the bank decreed to enter satisfaction of the judgment of record.

The answer of the bank denies the authority of Collier to act for them in any settlement or discharge of the judgment, or for any purpose in connection therewith. They also deny that they ever gave their assent to the alleged discharge of the debt for which the judgment was rendered, or ever ratified or confirmed the acts and doings of Collier in relation thereto. They further alleged that Collier was indebted to them in the year 1837, in a large amount, and that he transferred to them the acceptances of Grove, mentioned in the bill, as far back as 1837 and before they reached maturity, as collateral security for his indebtedness. That they never intended to place the bills under the control of Collier, but held them as their own, and prosecuted them to judgment. Nor did they ever allow him to take the charge and management of the judgment as their agent after it was recovered. They further allege that, being delayed in the collection of the collateral securities, and receiving no payments from Collier, they employed James W. Pegram, in November, 1841, as their agent, to call upon Collier, at his home, with instructions to obtain a more satisfactory arrangement of the debt against him. That it resulted in the extension of the time of payment on his giving the mortgage and notes referred to in the bill. They admit it was understood between their agent and Collier, that the negotiable paper which had been transferred as collateral security was to be surrendered up to him, the security furnished by the mortgage being, as represented by him, sufficient to secure his indebtedness, and relying on his punctuality in the payment of the notes as they became due. That two of the notes provided for by the mortgage are already past due, and nothing paid by the said Collier; that the property covered by the mortgage is discovered to be liable under previous incumbrances to a large amount, which may render it insufficient for the payment of their debt. That said Collier has long since waived the assignment of the said judgment, and consented that the bank might retain it as additional security.

The court below granted a preliminary injunction, and afterwards at the hearing on the pleadings and proofs, confirmed the same, and decreed that satisfaction of the judgment against Groves should be entered of record.

Upon consideration we are of opinion this decree is right, and should be affirmed. King, the drawer of the bills, was the principal debtor, as the acceptance by Groves was for his accommodation. He was, therefore, bound to provide for them, and keep Groves harmless; and this he did, so far as the interest of Collier was concerned, by the agreement of 26th February, 1841, and subsequent purchase by Collier of the plantation and slaves in pursuance of its stipulations. The purchase and title of the property under the sheriff's sale, it was agreed, should be made, and taken in satisfaction of this among other demands against King; and in order to complete the satisfaction, Collier bound himself to procure a discharge of the judgment which the bank had recovered upon the drafts, and then held. Groves was privy and consenting to this arrangement between King and Collier, and, as between the latter and him, when consummated, it constituted a valid defense to the drafts or judgment either in law or equity.

It is true, as the bank was not privy and consenting to the arrangement, their interest in the drafts was unaffected by it, and they were still at liberty to enforce their judgment against Groves, if necessary to the payment of the debt for which the drafts had been pledged as security.

§ 1362. — unless the collateral holder surrender the draft to the indorsee.

But, on the 3d of December following, they entered into an arrangement with Collier by which it was agreed that, on the execution and delivery to them of three notes, payable in one, two and three years, covering the whole amount of his indebtedness to the bank, together with a mortgage upon a large plantation and slaves, besides other real estate, as security for the payment, all the collateral securities previously held for the indebtedness should be given up to him. The notes and mortgage were executed and delivered accordingly, and the collateral securities surrendered, and the interest in them again exclusively vested in Collier; and in this way becoming the owner of the drafts and judgment against Groves, for which he had already received satisfaction, and bound himself to procure a discharge from the bank, the agreement with King, the principal debtor, operated instantly as an extinguishment of the demand, and placed it beyond the power of either Collier or the bank, or both of them together, to revive it by any subsequent arrangement. The defense of Groves, arising out of the agreement of King with Collier, attached immediately on the bank reinvesting Collier with their interest in the drafts, and would adhere to them, into whosoever hands they might pass. They were not only bills overdue, but had become merged in judgment against Groves.

It has been argued, on behalf of the bank, that Collier failed to comply with all the conditions upon which they stipulated to accept the mortgage and surrender the previous collateral securities; and especially in one important particular, namely, the discharge of record of existing incumbrances upon the property, so as to reduce them to an amount not exceeding $35,000. But there are several answers to this objection. In the first place, the weight of the proof is, that the agent, after an investigation and examination of these incumbrances, waived the discharge of record, being satisfied that they had been paid, from the representation of Collier. And in the second, no such ground of defense is set up in the answer, nor is there any allegation of imposition or fraud by Collier in the transaction. And, in the third, assuming that there was, the bank could not avail themselves of it for the purpose of avoiding their part of the arrangement, and at the same time hold on to the mortgage as a security for Collier's indebtedness. There has been no surrender of the mortgage, on the part of the bank, or offer to surrender and vacate the agreement. On the contrary, it is claimed by them as an available security, held and relied on against Collier. It may be that if a fraud had been committed upon the bank, in the negotiation to substitute this mortgage for other collateral securities, upon a surrender of the mortgage and notes accompanying it to Collier, on a discovery of the fraud, claiming to vacate the arrangement on this ground, their right to and interest in the securities surrendered, in the absence of any prejudice to the rights of third persons acquired, in the mean time, might revive, and in this way the defense of Groves be overreached, the bank being thus remitted to their original rights. But, be this as it may, as no such step has been taken, nor even claim of fraud set up in the pleadings, we are bound to regard the arrangement as valid and binding upon both parties; and if any fraud or imposition has been committed to the prejudice of the bank, they must look to him personally for compensation and redress. The rights acquired by each party to the securities exchanged must be taken to be such as were intended by the terms of agreement; and, regarding the transaction in this light, it is clear, even conceding, as is alleged, that Collier has since waived the surrender of the collateral securities for which he had stipulated, or has since reassigned them to the bank, the defense of Groves is still complete. These drafts, and judgment upon them, became extinguished the moment the agreement between the bank and Collier was carried into execution. They then became the exclusive property of the latter, in which event his agreement with King, the principal debtor, worked an immediate satisfaction.

It has also been argued that King has failed to fulfil all the stipulations in his agreement with Collier, and hence that it is not available to Groves. But this is a question exclusively between him and Collier, who, for aught that appears, is content with the agreement in the way it has been carried into execution. He purchased the property and took the sheriff's deed as is alleged, and not denied, went into the possession and enjoyment of the estate, and still holds it. And, if he has not acquired all the property stipulated for in his agreement, he must look to King, personally, for compensation and redress. He has chosen to accept the execution of the agreement, and must be deemed bound by its stipulations. In every view we have been able to take of the case, we are of opinion the decree of the court below is right, and should be affirmed.

§ 1363. When a payment; agreement; conditional payment.—A bill of exchange is not, in general, to be considered as a satisfaction of a precedent debt, unless it be paid, and accepted as such, or in case it be conditionally paid; unless it appear that an injury has resulted to the debtor, who pays the bill in consequence of the laches of the creditor, who receives it. Gallagher v. Roberts, * 2 Wash., 193; Allen v. King, 4 McL., 128; Peter v. Beverly, 10 Pet., 569; Cooper v. Gibbs, * 4 McL., 396; Lyman v. Bank of United States, 12 How., 225; Weed v. Snow, 3 McL., 265. See § 1375.

§ 1365. Bank notes credited as cash.—Where the notes of a bank were received by it for a balance due, and credited as cash, held, that the parties having treated the transaction as a cash deposit, must be deemed to have considered it as paid in money. United States Bank v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat., 333.

§ 1366. Where one note is discounted in renewal of another, the bank may charge the old note to the indorser, and credit him with the new one. Fullerton v. Bank of United States, 1 Pet., 604 (§§ 1200-1204).

§ 1367. Crediting notes on account; presumption.—Notes credited on an account current are presumed to have been received in payment, and the fact that subsequently, after being protested, they were charged on the account, does not rebut this presumption. Riley v. Anderson, * 2 McL., 589.

§ 1368. Promissory notes do not extinguish an open account, unless given expressly in payment. But the object in giving a note may be implied from circumstances as well as from an express agreement. And the facts that the account was overdue, that a further credit was given on the execution of the notes, which were credited on the account, show a payment to have been intended. Ibid.

§ 1369. Debt discharged by note or bill.—A bill taken in payment as a discharge of a pre-existing debt, or in such a manner as imports an intention in the indorsee to take the risk of the bill upon himself, is a discharge of such debt. Brown v. Jackson, * 2 Wash., 24.

§ 1370. A promissory note given and received in payment of an open account is a bar to an action upon such account even though the note be not paid. Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cr., 253 (§§ 1406, 1407).

§ 1371. Where a protested bill of exchange is taken up partly with cash and partly with the proceeds of a note discounted by the bank holding the bill, the latter is paid; and any action to recover back any part of it may then be brought. The statute of limitations as to such action runs from the date of payment of the bill. Bank of United States v. Daniel, 12 Pet., 32 (§§ 1633-38).

§ 1372. The note of a third person given and received in payment of the debt of another is a valid contract, and operates to extinguish or discharge the original debt; and a note given by a partner for a debt of the firm is, as to such debt, the note of a third person. In re Parker, 6 Saw., 250. Citing Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cr., 264; In re Ouimette, 1 Saw., 53; Cumber v. Wayne, 1 Smith's Lead. Cas., 453.

§ 1373. Payment by note; onus.—To constitute an absolute payment of a pre-existing debt by a promissory note there must be an agreement to receive it as such, and the burden of proof is upon the party urging it as such. Ibid.

§ 1374. Payment by maker or surety; when a discharge.—Payment by a maker extinguishes a note; but payment by a surety does not necessarily have this effect; it may be a payment in favor of the surety and not a payment against him; the holder may still sue the maker of the note as trustee for the surety; or the surety may often sue the maker himself. Ex parte Balch, * 2 Low., 440.

§ 1375. Conditional payment.—An agreement to take notes as payment if they are or prove collectible implies an agreement to collect them so far as the same can be done by the use of ordinary diligence. In re Ouimet, 1 Saw., 47. See § 1333.

§ 1376. Where promissory notes are taken as conditional payment, held, that as between the holder and third parties the actual receipt of the contents of the notes relates back to the time of conditional payment and converts it into an absolute payment. Ibid.

§ 1377. Surety's note a payment.—The individual note of a surety was accepted in payment of the note on which he was contingently liable. Held, a satisfaction of the original contract within the requirements of section 19 of the bankrupt act. In re Morrill, 2 Saw., 836.

§ 1378. Adjustment of mutual debts.—B., a banker, held A.'s note for $1,000, indorsed in blank by a third person. A. had a general deposit of $772 in B.'s bank. B. being aware of A.'s bankruptcy, a short time before he was adjudged bankrupt, and upon the day when the note became due, requested A. to pay the amount of his deposit on the note, whereupon A. gave B. his check of $772, which was credited on the note, and the balance, $228, was paid a few days before A. was adjudicated bankrupt. Held, that the transaction with the $772 was an adjustment of mutual debts. That the note was mature on the first day of grace; but that as to the $228 the transaction was a payment, and as such a fraudulent preference. Hough v. First Nat Bank, 4 Biss., 349.

§ 1379. Payment by unaccepted draft; evidence.—In assumpsit for the balance of an account the defendant pleaded payment by a draft drawn upon him and offered the draft in evidence. The draft had never been accepted by the defendant. Held, that the onus was upon the defendant to prove payment; that the rule that a promissory note paid and taken up was evidence of payment did not apply, because, unlike a promissory note, the draft, not being accepted, was not a completed instrument, and its possession no evidence of payment. It did not bear upon its face any stamp or mark by the bank officers showing that it was paid, and the bank had no record on its books of having received the money upon it. Hankin v. Squires, * 5 Biss., 186.

§ 1380. Payments; value of.—When a payment is indorsed on a note in the same monetary terms that are used in the note itself, the presumption is that the payment was intended to be credited in the same scale of values. A contrary intention of the parties must be proved. Stewart v. Salamon, 4 Otto, 434.

§ 1381. Possession evidence of payment.—Possession of bills is evidence of having paid for them, although no receipt for the money has been indorsed upon them, and the bills were not indorsed in blank by the holders to whom the money was paid for them. Palmer v. Blight, * 2 Wash., 96.

§ 1382. Release of maker after assignment of note.—The assignment of a promissory note to a debtor of the maker, and a subsequent giving of a release to the maker, upon his surrendering his effects to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, precludes the assignee from recovering upon the note, the maker not having had notice of the assignment until after the execution of the trust deed and release. Gilston v. Adams, 2 Cr. C. C., 440.

§ 1383. Payment by third person; right to security.—Promissory notes given for the payment of the purchase price, and secured by a trust deed of the property sold, were deposited in a bank for collection. The maker being unable to pay them when due, obtained a check from a third party for the amount of the notes, giving therefor his own note, and agreeing that the drawer of the check should hold the original notes and their security to secure him. The check was paid and the proceeds applied in payment of the notes. They were then taken out of the bank by the maker, and together with writings stipulating that they were secured by the deed of trust in the same manner as if the payees held them, were given to the drawer of the checks. All this was without the knowledge of the original payees. Held, that the notes not having been indorsed or assigned to a third party, but having been paid at maturity, ceased to be obligatory according to their tenor, and were no longer secured by the trust deed; and that the obligation of the maker of the notes to the drawer of the check arose upon the written stipulations as to the notes being secured by the deed of trust. Dooley v. Fire & M. Ins. Co., 3 Hughes, 221. See, also, Turnbull v. Thomas, 1 Hughes, 172.

§ 1384. Payment by partner for copartner.—An agreement of one partner to pay a note against his copartner, by entering a credit on a note which he holds against the payee, and a charge is made on the books of the firm against the partner for whom payment is made, and he delivers to his partner other papers as payment, is a payment to the payee of the note, although a credit was not indorsed on the note to be credited, until after the lapse of some months. Should the payee be sued, after the agreement, on the note on which the credit was to be entered, he could set up the agreement in defense, and the agreement could also be set up in defense by the partner who owed the first note, although the note was assigned after due. Gwathney v. M'Lane, * 3 McL., 371.

§ 1385. Of individual by firm note.—Individual notes are extinguished by being taken up with notes of a firm, and a guaranty of the former will not continue as to the latter. Russell v. Perkins, 1 Mason, 368 (§§ 559, 560).

§ 1386. Application of drawer's funds.—Where at the maturity of a bill, indorsed by accommodation indorsers, the drawee has in his hands sufficient of the drawer's funds to enable him to pay it, he is bound to apply such funds for such purpose. He has no right to hold such funds to meet an unmatured bill of the drawer. Brander v. Phillips, 16 Pet., 121.

§ 1387. The fact that a man has on deposit in a bank that holds his demand note money enough to pay it, and that the bank does not apply this money to pay the note, although it might have done so, does not exonerate him from liability to pay it. Third National Bank v. Harrison, 3 McC., 316 (§§ 1814-18).

§ 1388. Payment by directors of corporation to receiver thereof.—In an action to subject directors of a bank to liability on its notes, a plea that it is in the hands of a receiver, before whom the notes have been proved as part of the indebtedness of the bank, but which does not aver payment by him of all or any part of the notes, is no defense. White v. How, 3 McL., 291.

§ 1389. Voluntary payment of note.—Where a note is lying in bank under protest, a person who pays the balance due on it cannot recover against an indorser, if the transaction was intended as a payment; otherwise if it was a sale or an assignment. Patriotic Bank v. Wilson, *4 Cr. C. C., 258.

§ 1390. Bill returned by creditor.—Where a bill of exchange was remitted to a creditor, who delayed presentment to the drawee, and notice of non-acceptance, and subsequently returned the bill before the insolvency of the drawer, and sued for his original debt, held, that he could not be defeated by a plea of payment. Gallagher v. Roberts, *2 Wash., 191.

§ 1391. The rule would be otherwise if the amount of the bill should be lost through the negligence of the creditor. Ibid.

§ 1392. Payment of check is prima facie evidence that the bank has funds of the drawer. Bank of Alexandria v. McCrea, 3 Cr. C. C., 649; Bank of United States v. Washington, 3 Cr. C. C., 295.

§ 1394. Payment by holder of note as collateral.—A promissory note given as collateral security for a note borrowed is not discharged by the borrower's paying the borrowed note with funds belonging to the lender. Smith v. Johnson, *2 Cr. C. C., 645.

§ 1395. Certificate of deposit not a payment.—A bank about to become insolvent procured a certificate of deposit of another bank for the amount due A., one of its depositors. It then informed A. that it had stopped payment, and asked where his funds should be deposited, and upon A.'s request placed the certificate of deposit in a certain bank. Held, that procuring the certificate was not a payment to A., and that his subsequent ratification did not relate back to the date of the certificate. Strain v. Gourdin, *11 N. B. R., 156. See §§ 37, 274, 337.

§ 1396. Notes for charter money.—The charterers of a vessel gave notes for a portion of the charter money. Held, there being no agreement to receive the notes as a payment, that they did not discharge the debt, but only extended the time for paying it until their maturity. The Kimball, 3 Wall., 37.

§ 1398. Settlement.—The holder of a bill before dishonor is not affected by a settlement between drawer and payee. Cox v. Simms, *1 Cr. C. C., 238.

§ 1399. Payment in notes of bank.—Certain promissory notes secured by mortgage were assigned to a bank, which subsequently assigned both notes and security to a trustee for the benefit of its creditors. Held, that the trustee was not bound to receive the notes of the bank in payment of the paper held. Dundas v. Bowler, 3 McL., 397.

§ 1400. Discharge under foreign insolvent law.—A bill drawn in Pennsylvania by a citizen of that state upon a citizen of Massachusetts, and by him accepted there, cannot be discharged by a Massachusetts insolvent statute. State insolvent laws cannot affect rights of citizens of different states and contracts made between them. Springer v. Foster, 2 Story, 383; Kimball v. Badger, 1 McAl., 523.

§ 1401. Presumption of payment from lapse of time.—While payment of a bill of exchange will be presumed after the lapse of a long time, the presumption is not conclusive; it may be rebutted by facts, as where during a portion of the time war existed between the countries in which the holder and the maker respectively resided, and the maker was embarrassed and the accounts of his representatives did not show that payment ever was made. Hopkirk v. Page, 2 Marsh., 20 (§§ 1018-26).

§ 1402. Payment by drawee supra protest.—Drawees of a bill who refuse to honor it, although obligated to accept and pay it as drawees, cannot change their relation of drawees by paying the bill through an agent, supra protest. Schimmelpennich v. Bayard, 1 Pet., 264 (§§ 135-138).

3. Former Recovery.

SUMMARY—Several suit no bar to joint suit, § 1403.—Judgment in favor of an indorsee with notice, § 1404.—Judgment an estoppel, when, § 1405.

§ 1403. A several suit and judgment against one of two joint makers of a note is no bar to a joint action on the same note against both makers. Sheehy v. Mandeville, §§ 1406, 1407.

§ 1404. Plaintiffs filed a creditor's bill against the maker and payees of a note and thereby obtained a lien upon the note or the money secured by it. Subsequently the note was negotiated to Maynard, who took it with notice, brought suit upon it against the maker, and recovered a judgment against him, which he satisfied. This was in a state court. Held, that such judgment and satisfaction was no bar to an action on the note by the plaintiffs against the maker, he having, through the creditor's bill, notice of their rights when he paid the judgment recovered by Maynard. Pratt v. Burr, §§ 1408, 1409.

§ 1405. A indorsed a series of notes, agreeing at the same time in writing with B., the indorsee, that he should not be held liable as indorser, notwithstanding the indorsement. In a suit by B. against A. upon two of the notes, A. did not set up this agreement in defense, although he might have done so, but relied upon a defense that his liability as an indorser had not been fixed by due prosecution of the makers of the notes, as required by the laws of Illinois. Judgment was rendered against A. on these two notes. In a subsequent action by B. against A. upon other notes of the same series, held, that A. was not estopped by the judgment in the first action from pleading in the second action the agreement to release from liability as indorser, the notes being different in the two actions. When a judgment is offered in evidence in a subsequent action between the same parties upon a different demand, it operates as an estoppel only upon the matter actually at issue and determined in the original action; and such matter, when not disclosed by the pleadings, must be shown by extrinsic evidence. Davis v. Brown, §§ 1410-1415.

SHEEHY v. MANDEVILLE.

(6 Cranch, 253-267. 1810.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff sold certain goods to Robert B. Jamesson, a merchant of Alexandria, and took his note for the amount, which he put in suit and prosecuted to a judgment. Afterwards, supposing the other defendant, Mandeville, to be a secret partner, he instituted a suit against Mandeville and Jamesson. The declaration contains three counts. The first is on the note, and charges it to have been made by the defendants under the name, firm and style of Robert B. Jamesson. The second and third counts are for goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendants, trading under the firm of Robert B. Jamesson.

The defendant Mandeville pleads two pleas in bar. The first goes to the whole declaration and the second applies only to the first count. The first commences with the protestation that the goods, etc., in the declaration mentioned were not sold to the defendants jointly, and then pleads in bar the promissory note which is averred to have been given and received for and in discharge of an account for sundry goods, wares and merchandise sold and delivered to the said Jamesson, and that the goods in the declaration mentioned are the same which were sold and delivered to the said Jamesson, and for which the said note was given. The plea also avers that a suit was instituted and judgment obtained on the note, and concludes in bar. The second plea pleads the judgment in bar of the action.

To the first plea the plaintiff demurs specially, and assigns for cause of demurrer: 1. That the defendant does not traverse the assumpsit laid in the declaration. 2. That he does not expressly confess or deny that the goods, etc., were sold and delivered to the defendants, trading under the firm of R. B. Jamesson, or that the note was given by the said firm. 3. Because an unsatisfied judgment against Jamesson is no bar to an action against Mandeville. 4. It is not averred that the judgment has been satisfied. 5. The defendant does not deny or admit that he assumed to pay for the goods, etc., in the declaration mentioned. 6. Because the plea is no answer to the declaration, or any count thereof, and is informal.

The defendant joins in demurrer. To the second plea the plaintiff also demurs specially, and assigns for cause of demurrer the same, in substance, which had been assigned to the first plea, and the defendant joins in the demurrer to this plea likewise. The other defendant, Jamesson, has put in no plea, nor are there any proceedings against him subsequent to the declaration. Although the first plea is not expressly limited to the second and third counts, yet it would seem from its terms to be intended to apply to them alone. It sets up a bar to an action on an assumpsit for goods, wares, and merchandise, sold and delivered, and no such assumpsit is laid in the first count. If, however, it be considered as pleaded to the first count, it is clearly ill on demurrer. For it does not deny or avoid the joint assumpsit laid in that count. It remains to inquire whether this plea contains a sufficient bar to the second and third counts.

The plea is, that the note was given and received for, and in discharge of, an account or bill for goods, wares, and merchandise, sold and delivered by the plaintiff to Robert B. Jamesson, which are the same goods, etc., that are mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration. That a note, without a special contract, would not of itself discharge the original cause of action, is not denied. But it is insisted that if, by express agreement, the note is received as payment, it satisfies the original contract, and the party receiving it must take his remedy on it. This principle appears to be well settled. The note of one of the parties, or of a third person, may, by agreement, be received in payment. The doctrine of nudum pactum does not apply to such a case, for a man may, if such be his will, discharge his debtor without any consideration. But, if it did apply, there may be inducements to take a note from one partner liquidating and evidencing a claim on a firm which might be a sufficient consideration for discharging the firm. Since then the plaintiff has not taken issue on the averment that the note was given and received in discharge of the account, but has demurred to the plea, that fact is admitted; and, being admitted, it bars the action for the goods. The special causes of demurrer which are assigned do not in any manner affect the case. Whether the promise was made by Mandeville, or not, ceases to be material if a note has been received in discharge of that promise, and the payment of the note need not be averred, since its non-payment cannot revive the extinguished assumpsit.

The next subject of consideration is the second plea, which applies singly to the first count. That count is on a note charged to have been made by Mandeville and Jamesson, trading under the firm of Robert B. Jamesson. This, not being denied, must be taken as true. The plea is, that a judgment was rendered on this note against Robert B. Jamesson. Were it admitted that this judgment bars an action against Robert B. Jamesson, the inquiry still remains, if Mandeville was originally bound, if a suit could be originally maintained against him, is the note, as to him, also merged in the judgment? Had the action, in which judgment was obtained against Jamesson, been brought against the firm, the whole note would most probably have merged in that judgment. But that action was not brought against the firm. It was brought against Robert Brown Jamesson singly, and whatever other objections may be made to any subsequent proceedings on the same note, it cannot be correctly said that it is carried into judgment as respects Mandeville. If it were, the judgment ought in some manner to bind him, which most certainly it does not. The doctrine of merger (even admitting that a judgment against one of several joint obligors would terminate the whole obligation, so that a distinct action could not afterwards be maintained against the others, which is not admitted) can be applied only to a case in which the original declaration was on a joint covenant, not to a case in which the declaration in the first suit was on a sole contract. In point of real justice there can be no reason why an unsatisfied judgment against Jamesson should bar a claim upon Mandeville; and it appears to the court that this claim is not barred by any technical rule of law, since the proceedings in the first action were instituted upon the assumpsit of Jamesson individually. It is not necessary to decide whether this action could have been maintained against Mandeville singly with an averment that the note was made by Mandeville and Jamesson. The declaration being against both partners, that question does not arise. The declaration is clearly good in itself, and the plaintiff may recover under it, unless he be barred by a sufficient plea. Admitting, for the present, that a previous judgment against Jamesson would be a sufficient bar, as to him, had Jamesson and Mandeville joined in the same plea, it would have presented an inquiry of some intricacy, how far the benefit of that bar could be extended to Mandeville. But they have not joined in the same plea. They have severed; and as the whole note is not merged in a judgment obtained against Jamesson, on his individual assumpsit, the court is not of opinion that Mandeville has so pleaded this matter as to bar the action. In this plea it was necessary to negative the averment of the declaration, that the note was made by Mandeville as well as Jamesson, or to show that the judgment was satisfied. The defendant has not done so. He has only stated affirmatively new matter in bar of the action, which new matter, as stated, does not furnish a sufficient bar. It is not certain that this plea would have been good on a general demurrer, but on a special demurrer it is clearly ill. The judgment, therefore, is to be reversed, and as no other plea is pleaded, judgment must be rendered on the first count, in favor of the plaintiff.

PRATT v. BURR.

(Circuit Court for Wisconsin: 5 Bissell, 50-55. 1857.)

Opinion by MILLER, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The bill in this case was filed on the 7th of August, 1856. A subpoena was issued and an injunction was allowed. William D. Mead acknowledged in his answer that he gave promissory notes to Burr & Craig, in part for the consideration of their store goods sold him. Two of these notes passed from Burr & Craig to R. H. Maynard, and to which he, Maynard, under the circumstances, did not acquire title in the usual course of commercial business, and he was not a bona fide holder as settled in this court. These complainants had an equitable lien on the notes or the money secured by them in the hands of Mead by virtue of this creditor's bill. The only question submitted is, "Is Mead relieved of liability to these complainants by reason of the judgment against him in Rock county circuit court in favor of Maynard on the note, and by his subsequent payment of that judgment?"

§ 1408. Payee who with notice pays a note, or a judgment thereon, to one not a bona fide holder, may be compelled to pay it a second time to the real owner.

By inspection of the record it appears that Maynard commenced suit on the note against Mead by serving a declaration on the 14th of January, 1857, with a rule to plead. Afterwards Mead filed a plea of the general issue with notice of the issuing and service of the injunction in this case; and that it was known to Maynard when he purchased or received the note of Burr & Craig. On the 2d of July, 1857, the parties appeared in court by their counsel, and the cause came on to be tried before the court, the jury being waived, and the finding of the court and judgment were for the plaintiff for the amount of the note and interest. And on the 15th day of October, 1857, at Erie county, in the state of New York, the plaintiff executed a satisfaction piece of the judgment. It was stated at the argument that Mead's counsel several times spoke to complainants' counsel on the subject of that suit, and what was best to be done, and complainants' counsel concluded not to interfere in the suit. These complainants were not placed under any obligation to defend that suit either by a notice from Mead or by a bill of interpleader. They had no notice of the trial; nor are we informed by testimony what evidence was offered, admitted or rejected at the trial. If notice had been served on the complainants of the pendency of the suit, requiring them to appear and make defense, possibly they would be bound by that finding and judgment. In August last, that court decided that the two notes (of which the note in this suit is one) were transferred by Burr & Craig in fraud of these complainants and in contempt of this court, and that Maynard was not entitled to the money as a bona fide holder without notice. The first note was sued in this court, on which judgment was rendered against Mead, who paid the amount into court for distribution; the day after Maynard brought suit on the second note in the circuit court of Rock county. These plaintiffs were not parties to that suit in Rock county, and it is not in any way binding on them. So far as they have a lien on the money, and have a right to demand it in equity, they are not concluded. Judgments are only conclusive between parties and privies. At the trial of that case, these complainants had no notice nor opportunity to put in proof to show that Maynard was not a bona fide holder of the note. The trial was exclusively between Maynard and Mead. Maynard had a legal right to bring his suit against Mead in the state court, and to have it tried there; but Mead owed a duty to himself before that trial and plea filed, to notify these complainants of the suit and to require them to make defense in his name and to furnish the evidence to defeat Maynard's recovery. Mead should have served the notice on these complainants or their attorneys and placed it on the files of that case before filing plea. Nothing short of this can conclude these complainants. They were not bound to appear, nor could they appear or interfere with the suit without Mead's consent or requirement.

This suit in equity was pending against Mead a considerable time before the suit in Rock county. This suit prevented Mead from paying the amount of the note until it was ascertained whether it was negotiated and in the hands of a bona fide holder. The answer of Mead that he gave the notes, but does not know whether they were negotiated or not, raised the question. If Mead had paid into this court the amount of the notes, Maynard might have appeared here and claimed this money, when his claim would have been disposed of by the court on evidence submitted, or upon an issue tried by a jury. Instead of doing that, Maynard took his suit out of this jurisdiction, where the question was pending, into another jurisdiction, where he and Mead had the matter tried in their own way without legal notice to these complainants. This creditors' bill is an attachment in equity of the money in the hands of Mead owing by him on a negotiable promissory note. An attachment is unavailable against a bona fide holder for value, of negotiable paper, who obtains it after attachment, before maturity, and without notice. Keeffer v. Ebler, 6 Harris (Penn.), 388, and cases cited. The only question, as I remarked before, to be tried here was, whether Maynard was a bona fide holder of the note.

In Kennedy v. Brent, 6 Cranch, 187, the service of a subpoena in chancery, in a case of chancery attachment, will make the garnishee liable if he pays the money after the notice of the subpoena. Such is the case in every attachment. An attachment in a state court, commenced after the institution of an action to recover a debt in a court of the United States, cannot be pleaded as a defense to the latter, either in whole or in part. Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet., 136, 151 (§§ 1539-43, infra). This decision is upon the reverse order to the state of the case here. The attachment here was the first. In the opinion in that case it is remarked: "The jurisdiction of the district court, . . . and the right of the plaintiff to prosecute his suit in that court, having attached, that right could not be arrested or taken away by any proceedings in another court. This would produce a collision in the jurisdiction of courts that would extremely embarrass the administration of justice. If the attachment had been conducted to a conclusion, and the money recovered of the defendant before the commencement of the present suit, there can be no doubt that it might have been set up as a payment upon the note in question;" and if such could be pleaded in bar, "the same principle would support a plea in abatement of an attachment pending prior to the commencement of the present suit. The attachment of the debt in such case in the hands of the defendant would fix it there in favor of the attaching creditor, and the defendant could not afterward pay it over to the plaintiff. The attaching creditor would, in such case, acquire a lien upon the debt binding upon the defendant, which the courts of all other governments, if they recognize such proceedings at all, could not fail to regard. If this doctrine be well founded, the priority of suit will determine the right. The rule must be reciprocal; . . . the maxim qui prior est tempore, potior est jure must govern the case. This is the doctrine of this court in the case of Renner v. Marshall, 1 Wheat., 216, and also in the case of Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Maryland, 12 Pet., 102." In Hacker v. Stevens, 4 McL., 535, the money owing on a note was attached in the hands of the debtor. The note was indorsed or assigned, and the assignee brought suit against the maker, who pleaded in abatement the attachment, which plea was sustained, although the two suits were not in the name of the same parties. In that case the note was transferred to one of the firm to whom the note was payable. In this case the note was transferred to a brother-in-law of one of the payees, under very suspicious circumstances. There is no doubt but Raymond knew of the pendency of this suit in this court before he commenced his suit in the state court. He should have come here, and through Mead, as a defendant, have had his right to the money tried. From the situation of that case in the state court, as placed by Raymond and Mead by their pleadings, the court might have continued the trial, if asked by Mead, until a reasonable time for the trial of this case. This court would, in the exercise of its discretion, have done so, under like circumstances, but there is nothing in the record showing that such application was made, or that a plea in abatement was filed.

The satisfaction piece attached to the record of the judgment in Rock county is no evidence of payment, except as between the parties to the judgment. It satisfies the judgment, but it is not evidence affecting these complainants of the absolute bona fide payment of money. It is nothing more than a mere declaration of a party not under oath, as to the rights of these complainants. But from the view taken of this case, it makes no difference whether the judgment has been satisfied or not. Mead should have taken some of the means here pointed out to prevent the judgment being rendered against him in the circuit court of Rock county. The proof clearly showing that Maynard was not a bona fide holder of the note, and that the title still remains in Burr & Craig, reference will be made to a master to ascertain the amount due.

DAVIS v. BROWN.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE FIELD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action against the defendants as second indorsers upon ten promissory notes of one McOmber, made at Saratoga Springs, in the state of New York, in June, 1870, each for $500, and payable to his order in from thirty-two to forty-one months after date. The defense set up to defeat the action was that the notes in suit were transferred in June, 1871, with other notes of the same party of like amount and date, to the Ocean National Bank by the defendants, in part satisfaction of a note of their own then past due, the balance being paid in cash, and were indorsed by the defendants as a mere matter of form, upon an agreement in writing of the bank that they should not be held liable on their indorsements, or be sued thereon. On the trial, Harvey Brown, one of the defendants, was called as a witness to prove the matters thus set up as a defense, and was permitted, against the objection of the plaintiff, to testify to the settlement of the note of the defendants, the transfer for that purpose to the Ocean National Bank of the McOmber notes, and their indorsement by the defendants under the agreement of the bank not to hold them liable as indorsers; and that this agreement was in writing, and was destroyed in the great fire at Chicago, in October, 1871. To meet and repel the defense founded upon this agreement, the plaintiff produced and gave in evidence a record of a judgment, recovered by him against the same defendants upon two other notes of the same party, of like amount and date as those in suit, except that they became due at an earlier day, which were part of the series of notes transferred by the defendants to the bank, and indorsed by them, in settlement of their own note, as already mentioned, and were included in the agreement as part of the same transaction.

The questions presented for our determination relate to the competency of the witness Brown, and the admissibility of the evidence of the alleged agreement of the bank, and to the operation of the judgment mentioned as an estoppel against the defendants setting up any defense founded upon the agreement.

§ 1410. Indorsee bound by agreement that indorser shall not be held liable as such; and indorser competent to prove it.

The objection to the witness arose from his being a party to the notes, and as such it is contended that he was incompetent to impeach or discredit the same, or to show that his liability was not such as his indorsement imported. The case of The Bank of United States v. Dunn, reported in the 6th of Peters, is cited in support of this position. There the indorser of a note had been permitted by the court below to testify, against the objection of the plaintiff in the action, to a verbal understanding with the cashier and president of the bank which took the note that he was not to incur any responsibility, or at least would not be held liable on the note until the security pledged for its payment had been exhausted. The admission of the witness this court considered erroneous, holding that no one who was a party to a negotiable note could be permitted by his own testimony to invalidate it, which, in that case, meant that no one could be permitted to show that a note indorsed by him was void in its inception, or that his indorsement did not impose the liability which the law attached to it. The opinion which announces the decision proceeds upon two grounds: 1st. That the evidence would contradict the terms of the instrument or change their legal import; and 2d, that it would be against public policy, as tending to destroy the credit of commercial paper, to allow one who had given it the sanction of his name, and thus added value and currency to the instrument, to testify that it was executed or indorsed by him under such circumstances as to impair his obligation upon it. This last position was supported by reference to the celebrated case of Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term R., 296, decided in 1786, where the indorser of a promissory note was held by the king's bench to be inadmissible as a witness, on grounds of public policy, to prove the note void for usury in its inception; Lord Mansfield observing that it was "of consequence to mankind that no person should hang out false colors to deceive them, by first affixing his signature to a paper and then afterwards giving testimony to invalidate it." Aside from the assumed estoppel of the parties from their position on the paper, the maxim of the Roman law, that no one alleging his own turpitude shall be heard (nemo allegans suam turpitudinem est audiendus), was cited to justify the decision. That maxim was plainly misapplied here by the great chief justice; for it is not a rule of evidence, but a rule applicable to parties seeking to enforce rights founded upon illegal or criminal considerations. The meaning of the maxim is, that no one shall be heard in a court of justice to allege his own turpitude as a foundation of a claim or right; it does not import that a man shall not be heard who testifies to his own turpitude or criminality, however much his testimony may be discredited by his character.

The doctrine of Walton v. Shelley maintained its position in the courts of England only for a few years. In 1798 it was by the same court overruled in the case of Jordaine v. Lashbrook, 7 id., 601, Lord Kenyon having succeeded Mansfield as chief justice. Since then the rule has prevailed in the courts of that country, that a party to any instrument, whether negotiable or not, if otherwise qualified, is competent to prove any fact affecting its validity; the objection to the witness, from his connection with the making or circulation of the instrument, only going to his credibility, and not to his competency. In this country there has been much diversity of opinion upon the point, some of the state courts following the rule of Walton v. Shelley, while others have adopted the later English rule. The general tendency of decisions here is to disregard all objections to the competency of witnesses, and to allow their position and character to affect only their credibility. This diversity of opinion could not have existed unless there were grave reasons for doubting the soundness of the original decision. Be that as it may, it has led those courts which, on considerations of commercial policy, adopted the rule of Walton v. Shelley to qualify the rule, so as to limit its application strictly to cases arising on negotiable bills and notes, and to cases where the transaction affecting the validity of the paper was not between the parties in suit. The holders of commercial paper who enter into agreements or transactions with the makers or indorsers, affecting its validity or negotiability, cannot invoke protection against the infirmity which they have aided to create. There are no considerations of commercial policy which can exclude the parties in such cases from testifying to the facts. Thus, in Fox v. Whitney, 16 Mass., 118, the supreme court of Massachusetts, which had previously recognized the rule in Walton v. Shelley, held that the rule applied only to a case where a man, by putting his name to a negotiable security, had given currency and credit to it, and did not apply to a case between original parties, where the paper had not been put into circulation, and each of the parties was cognizant of all the facts. This decision meets our concurrence, and, if it qualifies the decision in the case of Bank v. Dunn, we think the qualification a just and proper one.

§ 1411. A receiver of a bank has no greater rights to enforce its contracts than the bank has.

These considerations dispose of the objection to the competency of the witness Brown. The notes of McOmber were never put into circulation by the Ocean National Bank. No one, therefore, has been misled by the indorsement of the defendants; no false colors have been held out by them. No credit or currency has been given by their name. The receiver has, with reference to the notes, no greater right than the bank has: he stands in its shoes. If the bank could not have enforced a liability upon the defendants against its agreement that they should not be held liable, the receiver cannot enforce it. The agreement itself is not immoral nor illegal. The defendants by their act ran the risk of being charged upon the notes; they would have been liable had the notes been put into circulation. But beyond this risk they were protected by the agreement; upon that they could rely, so long as the bank held the notes.

§ 1412. Effect of written agreement to release indorser.

The objection that the agreement was inadmissible because it tended to vary and destroy the legal effect of the indorsement is not tenable. The agreement being in writing, is to be taken and considered in connection with the indorsement, and the two are to be construed together. So far as the bank was concerned, the agreement made the indorsement equivalent to one without recourse to the indorsers.

§ 1413. Agreement to release from liability on several notes not pleaded in one action, estoppel to plead it subsequently.

The next question for determination relates to the operation of the judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the defendants, as an estoppel against their setting up the defense founded upon the agreement. The action in which that judgment was recovered was brought in the same court as the present action, against the defendants as second indorsers upon two notes, which were part of the series of McOmber notes, transferred to the bank of the defendants in settlement of their own note; and their indorsement was embraced in its agreement. The defendants pleaded the general issue; but the court finds that, by the advice of counsel learned in the law, they defended the action in good faith solely upon the ground that their liability had not been fixed as indorsers by due prosecution of the makers of the notes, as required by the laws of Illinois; and that this defense was not sustained, for the reason that it appeared that the makers of the notes resided in the state of New York, and that the indorsement was made there. The agreement of the bank not to hold them liable as indorsers was not pleaded nor relied upon; yet it is contended by counsel, that, inasmuch as it might have been thus pleaded and relied upon, therefore the judgment is an estoppel against the setting up of that agreement as a defense in a subsequent action between the same parties upon other notes, equally as if its validity and efficacy had been litigated and determined. In taking this position, counsel have confounded the operation of a judgment upon the demand involved in the action, in which the judgment was rendered, with its operation as an estoppel in another action between the parties upon a different demand. So far as the demand involved in the action is concerned, the judgment has closed all controversy; its validity is no longer open to contestation, whatever might have been said or proved at the trial for or against it. The judgment is not only conclusive as to what was actually determined respecting such demand, but as to every matter which might have been brought forward and determined respecting it; and that is all that the language means which is quoted by counsel from opinions in adjudged cases, in seeming consonance with his position.

§ 1414. Judgment operates as an estoppel, when.

When a judgment is offered in evidence in a subsequent action between the same parties upon a different demand, it operates as an estoppel only upon the matter actually at issue and determined in the original action; and such matter, when not disclosed by the pleadings, must be shown by extrinsic evidence. We have recently had occasion, in the case of Cromwell v. County of Sac, 4 Otto, 351, to go over this ground and point out the distinction mentioned; and it is unnecessary to repeat what we there said. See Bigelow on Estoppel, note to the case of the Duchess of Kingston, in Smith's Lead. Cas., and Robinson's Practice, vol. VII. The position of counsel is clearly untenable.

§ 1415. Findings of fact not reviewable.

As to the objection of want of authority in the president of the bank to make the agreement with the defendants, the finding of the court is conclusive. His authority was a fact to be determined by the court under the stipulation waiving a jury, and we do not sit in review of questions of fact.

Judgment affirmed.

WITHERS v. GREENE.

(9 Howard, 213-235. 1849.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DANIEL.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This cause, from the district court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama, is brought here under the act of congress of 8th August, 1846, c. 104 (9 Stats. at Large, 78).

The plaintiff in error was sued in the court below upon a single bill for the sum of $3,000, executed by him on the 16th of February, 1839, payable on the 1st of January ensuing, to A. B. Newsom or order, and which was assigned by Newsom to May, the testator of the defendant. What were the grounds of defense first assumed by the defendant does not appear, and it is immaterial now to inquire. The pleas first filed were by consent of parties withdrawn, and by leave of court the defendant filed a special plea, averring that the note sued on was given by him for a part of the price of two fillies purchased by him of Newsom for $4,000; that Newsom falsely and fraudulently represented to the defendant that these fillies were reared by himself; that they were sound and of a high pedigree (as is set forth in the plea); that the defendant desiring to possess these fillies for their blood and for the turf, and induced and deceived by the false representations of Newsom, paid him the sum of $1,000 in cash, and executed the note in question for the residue of the purchase money; that the representations of Newsom as to the fillies having been reared by him, of their soundness, and of their pedigree, were all untrue, and all known to be untrue by Newsom at the time of the sale; that the defendant did not ascertain either the extent of the unsoundness of these fillies, or the falsehood of the pretended pedigree, until during the autumn and winter of the year 1839; that the said Newsom, at the time of the sale, resided, and has continued to reside, in a different state, and more than three hundred miles from the defendant; that from the time of discovery by the defendant of the unsoundness of the fillies and of the falsehood of their pedigree, up to the time of their death, which happened without any fault of the defendant or his servants, in the spring of 1840, he, the defendant, was willing and ready, and desirous of returning the fillies to the said Newsom, but never had an opportunity of so doing. The plea concludes with stating that the note or writing obligatory was obtained from him by Newsom by his false and fraudulent representations, and is therefore void; and with a prayer whether defendant should be charged with the debt. To this plea there was a demurrer by the plaintiff below, and the judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer, brought hither by writ of error, this court is called on to examine. Although the legal principles and inquiries involved in this cause are to a great extent local in their character and operation, it will be found to embrace rules, both with respect to pleading and to the interpretation of contracts, extending in some respects beyond the influence of merely local jurisprudence. The contract in question having been made within the state of Alabama, and designed to be performed within that state, the lex loci contractus must justly be understood as entering into and controlling the effect of its stipulations, and having been sued upon within the same state, the lex fori must, in a great degree, regulate the mode of its enforcement.

§ 1430. By statute in Alabama an instrument under seal may be impeached at law for failure of consideration, either partial or total, either in the hands of an obligee or an assignee.

By a statute of Alabama (Aikin's Dig., p. 283, § 138), it is enacted "that, whensoever any suit is depending in any of the courts, founded on any writing under the seal of the person to be charged therewith, it shall be lawful for the defendant or defendants therein, by a special plea, to impeach or go into the consideration of such bond, in the same manner as if the said writing had not been sealed." By another statutory provision of the same state, it is declared (see Aikin's Dig., p. 328, § 6) "that all bonds, obligations, bills single, promissory notes, and other writings, for the payment of money or any other thing, may be assigned by indorsement, whether the same be made payable to the order or assigns of the obligee or payee or not; and the assignee may sue in his own name, and maintain any action which the obligee or payee might have maintained thereon previous to assignment, and in all actions to be commenced and sued upon any such assigned bond, obligation, bill single, promissory note, or other writing aforesaid, the defendant shall be allowed the benefit of all payments, discounts and set-offs, made, had, or possessed against the same, previous to notice of the assignment, in the same manner as if the same had been sued and prosecuted by the obligee or payee therein." By the enactment herein first cited, it is obvious that specialties are divested of any force or solemnity at any time ascribed to them by reason of their having a seal annexed, and are placed, with respect to all inquiries which may be instituted into the validity of their consideration, precisely upon the footing of parol agreements. With respect to the construction of the second provision, section 6, of the statute above cited, the question has been suggested, whether the right conferred by the first enactment, to inquire into the consideration of contracts in contests between the original parties, is extended, by the correct meaning of the statute, to the defense allowed to obligors at the suit of assignees, or whether obligors in assigned bonds, notes, etc., are not restricted in their defense to transactions posterior in date to the writing itself, and forming no necessary part of the original consideration, the language of the statute, as already quoted, being this: "Shall be allowed the benefit of all payments, discounts and set-offs, made, had, or possessed against the same," i. e., against the bonds, "previous to notice of assignment, in the same manner as if the same had been sued and prosecuted by the obligee therein."

§ 1431. In Alabama the obligor in a promissory note may show a failure of consideration, partial or total, in bar of a suit on the note by an assignee.

In construing these provisions of the Alabama statute as being in pari materia, we cannot regard them as changing the rights of the parties arising out of the contract itself, nor as conferring new rights on others not inherent in such original obligations, but we regard them rather as securing those rights, except so far as they may have been legally and justly transferred. There could be no doubt of the right to impeach the consideration, or the right to claim the benefit of payments, set-offs, or discounts, on the part of the obligor as against his obligee. The statute was not designed to take from the obligor any of these rights, but merely to deny to him the claim to discharge his obligation by payments, etc., to the original obligee, after he knew the obligation to have been transferred to another. Neither did the statute create in the assignee any new right varying the character of the contract itself. It conferred on him merely the rights to take by assignment, and to sue in his own name,—in effect, the power to acquire, in the mode prescribed, an equitable title, and to prosecute that title in a court of law. Contracts at common law, to which this simple power of assignment is extended by statute, differ essentially from those which arise out of and are governed by the law merchant, or from such as are placed on the footing of the law merchant by express legislative enactment. We conclude, then, that, in a case like the present, the obligor would have the right to impeach the consideration for which the writing was given, or to show its discharge by payments or set-offs made or existing at any time before notice of assignment, or by discounts to prove either a total or partial failure of the consideration for which the writing was executed, accordingly as the truth of the case would warrant either defense. This interpretation of the law we consider as accordant, not only with the language and the rational meaning of the statute, but as sustained by the decisions of the courts in the state whose peculiar policy we are discussing, and by decisions in other states upon statutes containing provisions similar to those in the statute of Alabama. Recurring to the latter statute itself, its terms declare that whensoever, that is, in every case, in which suits shall be instituted founded on any writing under seal, the person to be charged therewith, comprehending any and every person, whether he sustains a relation to an assignee or to any other person, may impeach the consideration of the bond or other writing (Aikin's Dig., p. 233, § 138), and then proceed with respect to the rights and powers of the assignee to provide that he may sue in his own name, and may maintain any action which the obligee or payee might have maintained thereon, previous to assignment (Aikin's Dig., p. 328, § 6); he has the same rights and remedies which pertained to the obligee or payee, and none other.

And first, with respect to the defense as against the assignee, founded on the total failure of consideration, it has been ruled under the statute of Alabama, in the case of Clements v. Loggins, 2 Ala., 514, that, when the payee of a note is inquired of by one wishing to purchase it, whether he has any defense against it, and answers that he has none, he does not thereby preclude himself from making any defense against the note growing out of the original transaction, of which he had no knowledge at the time. And it will be found that the example put by the court in this case (see p. 519) is one of total failure of consideration. Yet this defense could never be permitted if it is to be sought for within a narrow interpretation of the words payments, set-offs and discounts,—such a one as would not embrace the true character of the transaction. Again, in the case of Wilson v. Jordan, in 3 Stew. & P., it is said by the court on p. 98: "The decisions of this court have gone far to abolish the distinction with us between the effect of a partial and total failure of consideration;" and again, the court uses this language: "Nor do we feel the least dissatisfaction with our former decisions, so far as they tend to place partial and total failure of consideration on the same footing, instead of driving the parties to circuitry of action." The doctrines ruled by the supreme court of Alabama are closely coincident with those of the courts of other states, in the construction of statutes similar to that of the former state. Thus, in the case of Clements v. Loggins, 2 Ala., 514, as late as 1841, the court, by way of illustration, refer to the cases of Buckner v. Stubblefield, 1 Wash., 296, and of Hoomes v. Smock, id., 390, decided by the court of appeals upon the Virginia statute, a law more restrictive in its terms than is the Alabama statute, as the former speaks only of just discounts against the obligee, being silent as to payment and set-off (see 3 Stats. at Large, 379; 4 id., 275; 6 id., 87; 12 id., 358, and acts of 1795, and of January, 1820), and both the cases thus referred to are instances of entire want of consideration, the writings assigned having been void ab initio.

It seems proper in this place to advert to an opinion of the supreme court of Virginia, in one of the earlier cases before them under the statute, with respect to any change which that statute might have been supposed to produce in the relative situations of parties to contracts made assignable thereby. In the case of Norton v. Rose, in 1796, reported in 2 Wash., the law, on page 248, is thus expounded by Roane, justice, with the concurrence of the whole court: "It was not intended to abridge the rights of the obligor, or to enlarge those of the assignee beyond that of suing in his own name; and since it is clear that, prior to this law, an original equity attached to the bond followed it into the hands of the assignee, this law does not expressly nor by implication destroy that principle." The same doctrine was ruled in Pennsylvania, as early as the year 1776, in the case of Wheeler v. Hughes, reported in 1 Dal., 27. In Pennsylvania, bonds, bills and promissory notes were by act of assembly made assignable, as promissory notes in England under the 3d and 4th of Anne, but as the statute of Pennsylvania omitted to declare that those writings "should be placed upon the footing of bills of exchange," it was therefore decided that the assignee of such writing stood in the same place as his obligee or payee, so as to let in every defalcation which the obligor had against him before notice of the assignment, and that the only intent of the act of assembly was to enable the assignee to sue in his own name, and to prevent the obligee from releasing after notice of assignment. This doctrine has been frequently reaffirmed in the same state, as will be seen in 2 Dal., 45; 6 Serg. & R., 175, and 16 id., 20.

Turning next to a class of cases founded on what has been denominated the partial failure of consideration, although involving bad faith, breach of warranty, false and deceitful warranties, false representations in the procuring of contracts, such as might in particular aspects extend to the entire rescission of contracts, it will be seen that the supreme court of Alabama have, in the construction of their statute, ruled that a defense founded on either or on all of the facts here enumerated shall be admissible in diminution of damages. And in allowing this mode of defense, which seems to fall more strictly within the import of the terms set-offs and discounts than objections aimed at the total abrogation of contracts can do, the courts of Alabama have acted in accordance with those of other states in construing statutes similar to their own, consistently, too, with the principles of reason and justice adopted by modern tribunals when acting apart from statutory provisions. The case of Morehead v. Gayle, reported in 2 Stew. & P., 224, was an action by the assignee against the maker of a promissory note, given for the price of a slave warranted sound. The defense set up was the unsoundness of the slave at the time of the contract, as evinced by his early death and by other circumstances. The court in this case say that if it had been necessary to offer to return the slave to permit this defense, yet by the early and sudden death of the slave the vendee would, under the circumstances, have been excused from making the offer; and in considering the right of the vendee to avail himself of the defense, either of a total or partial failure of consideration, the court are led to compare the principle enunciated in the case of Thornton v. Wynn, in 12 Wheat., 183 (§§ 1034-37, supra), with the doctrine as laid down in the state of Alabama under her laws, and with respect to the rule of Thornton v. Wynn remark as follows: "It was the most rigid that has anywhere prevailed against relief by way of defense to the action at law. It was doubtless adopted as a part of the system which has been exploded in this state and in many states of the Union, as well as in several of the English courts, that a partial failure of consideration is not a defense to an action at law, brought to recover the price of the article sold, but that in such cases the vendee must resort to his cross-action, which remedy, on account of its dilatory nature and circuitous form, is by this court, and many others of high authority, deemed inconsistent with justice and the more correct rules of modern practice."

§ 1432. In Alabama in every case in which a defendant can maintain a cross action for damages, on warranty or otherwise, he may plead the defect of personal property bought in bar of the action against him.

The earlier case of Peden v. Moore, reported in 1 Stew. & P., 71, furnishes a still more full exposition, by the supreme court of Alabama, of the rules of decision deducible from the law of that state. The action in Peden v. Moore was brought to recover the amount of a promissory note. The defense pleaded was failure of consideration, payment and set-off; whether total or partial failure of consideration does not appear in the form of the pleading, and it would seem that, so far as the form of pleading was involved, the fact of the failure being total or partial was deemed immaterial by the courts, and was a question of proof, inasmuch as the court below regarded as allowable, and even as indispensable, proof of total failure, whilst the supreme court decided that proof of partial failure was admissible, and that the exclusion of such proof in that case was error in the inferior court. The defendant below moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the consideration had failed, except to the amount which had been paid, they should find a verdict for the defendant. This the court refused, but instructed the jury, that, unless a total failure of consideration was proved, they should find a verdict for the plaintiff. In reviewing the opinion of the court below, the supreme court of Alabama say: "It is our policy to avoid circuitry of action, that litigation may be stopped in the germ, before it is permitted to put forth its branches. This idea is most strikingly illustrated by our statutes providing for arbitration and set-off, as well as by the decisions of our courts. Now, to permit a defendant to allege in diminution of a sum sought to be recovered by breach of his contract, that the consideration which induced the contract on his part has partially failed, would have the effect of making one action subserve the purpose of two, and upon the score of convenience it must be unimportant to the plaintiff whether his recovery is diminished, or whether, after having recovered the entire sum, he is compelled to refund a portion of it; or, if important, the importance would consist in ending litigation, and avoiding the costs of the defendant's action. And surely it would be more compatible with justice, to permit a party to retain that which ex equo et bono cannot be demanded of him, and which by law he may recover back; and more especially, when none of the great principles of right or the landmarks of property would be disturbed. Perhaps it may be said that the inquiry is too complex for the determination of an ordinary jury. Not so. There would be no more difficulty in ascertaining the sum to be deducted from the defendant's indebtedness than in admeasuring the quantum of the damages sustained in an action for a false warranty, or for a deceit. In either case, the jury will naturally inquire the sum which was agreed to be paid, and to what extent the consideration is deficient; so that the obstacles to the achievement of justice will not be greater in the one instance than in the other. We are entirely aware of the decisions which inhibit the defense even of a total failure where there is a warranty on which the defendant may have his remedy. These decisions doubtless proceed upon the principle that the warranty is a subsisting contract, and the damages sustained by its breach unliquidated. We consider them, however, so far shaken, if not overruled, as to leave the question open for examination. Upon authority, both in point of respectability and numbers, it is clearly provable that, where fraud enters into the transaction, it is competent for the defendant, upon proof of it, to show a defect in the consideration in diminution of damages.

This qualified admission of the defense originated from the rule that fraud avoids the contract ab initio. In point of justice, we can discover no sufficient reason for permitting the defense to be set up where there is a fraud in the transaction, and in denying it when there is a false warranty unaccompanied by fraud. In either case, it is the duty of the jury to graduate the plaintiff's recovery by the injury which the defendant has sustained; for the old common law notion that fraud so vitiated every contract which partook of it as not to allow of a recovery, though it but partially impaired the benefit which the defendant expected to derive, has been exploded; more recent authority only allowing it to go in reduction of damages. The cases of Poulton v. Lattimore, 9 Barn. & Cress., 259; of Germaine v. Burton, 3 Starkie, 32, and Miller v. Smith, 1 Mason, 437, are cases in which the defendant had the plaintiff's warranty, yet this circumstance is not considered by the courts which decided them as interposing an obstacle to the defense!" The court, in conclusion, with respect to this defense, remark: "Believing, therefore, that the greater benefit would result from its toleration, we are of opinion that wherever a defendant can maintain a cross action for damages on account of a defect in personal property purchased by him, or of a non-compliance by the plaintiff with his part of the contract, he may, in defense to an action upon his note made in consequence of such purchase or contract, claim a deduction corresponding with the injury he has sustained."

These copious extracts from the opinions of the supreme court of Alabama are thought to be warranted, not only on account of the intrinsic force of the reasoning they contain, but still more so, perhaps, from the fact that they present the best and most authoritative interpretation of the statutes they are meant to expound, as well as of the policy in which those statutes have had their origin. But beyond the influence and effect of these decisions as expositions of local law, they may be regarded as coincident with the doctrines promulgated by the highest tribunals of a portion at least of the states of the Union, and as not conflicting, in principle at least, with some of the later opinions of the English bench. By the earlier English decisions the following principles appear to have been inflexibly ruled, namely: That, whenever a contract was tainted by fraud, it never could, if this were shown, be made the foundation of a recovery to any extent, but must be set aside in toto. That in all instances wherein a party was injured, either by a partial failure of consideration for the contract, or by the non-fulfilment of the contract, or of a warranty, the person so injured could not defend himself, in an action on the contract, by proving these facts, but could find redress only in a cross action against the plaintiff. These rules of the common law courts appear to have yielded materially to the influence of common sense and common convenience. An example of this may be perceived in the permission given in cases where a recovery is sought upon the principle of quantum meruit to set up as a defense that the plaintiff has unfairly, or injuriously, or imperfectly fulfilled his obligations towards the defendant, and that he should in such cases recover so far only as he could prove a meritorious performance; admitting, in these instances at least, the defense founded on discount, or on a partial failure of consideration, or a dishonest performance. See the cases of Basten v. Butter, 7 East, 479; of Farnsworth v. Garrard, 1 Camp., 38; of Denew v. Daverell, 3 Camp., 451; of Poulton v. Lattimore, 9 Barn. & Cress., 259. In the case of King v. Boston, 7 East, 481, on a note, the plaintiff had sold a horse to the defendant, warranted sound, for twelve guineas, of which the defendant had paid three. In fact the horse was not sound, and the defendant refusing to pay more, this action was brought for the value of the horse to recover the difference. It was proved that the horse, at the time of the sale, was not worth more than £1 11s. 6d., and that the defendant had sold him for £1 10s. Lord Kenyon held that the plaintiff could only recover the value, and more having been paid him by the defendant, he non-suited the plaintiff. Caswell v. Coare, 1 Taunt., 566, was an action upon a warranty of a horse. It was ruled in this case that, if the horse is not returned, the measure of damage is the difference between his true value and the price given, which may be shown. Indeed, the ground on which the English judges have restricted this species of defense to cases of quantum meruit implies the admission that there is nothing in the character of the defense itself, with respect to express undertakings, that is inconsistent with justice or with the true obligations and duties of the contracting parties. The objection is this: that if in suits on contracts for specific undertakings, and for stipulated compensation, the defendant could, under the general issue, be let in to show either failure of consideration or non-performance, the plea not disclosing either ground, would effect a surprise upon the plaintiff; but that where, as on a quantum meruit, the plaintiff was to show a meritorious cause of recovery, he must come prepared to encounter any and all objections in conflict with the position he assumes and must maintain. With all the respect due to the learned men by whom this distinction is made, it may be permitted to doubt whether it is not perhaps more apparent and technical than real; for it may be asked whether, in cases of contracts for specific performances and for stipulated equivalents, the plaintiff is not equally bound to prove an honest performance — such a one as comes up to the equivalent promised by the defendant? Indeed, it would seem, so far as danger of surprise is to be apprehended, that where the rights and duties of parties were set forth in the contract, and in the pleadings founded upon the contract, there would be less danger of surprise than there possibly could be in instances where the forms of proceeding indicated neither, but where everything was left open to contest at the trial.

The remarks of some of the English judges appear to be peculiarly applicable to this view of the subject. Lawrence, J., in Basten v. Butter, 7 East, 484, speaking of the distinction attempted between a quantum meruit and other forms of action, says: "The rule laid down by Mr. Justice Buller may be a good one, if the plaintiff has had no notice of the kind of defense intended to be set up against his demand. But even there, if the plaintiff have previous notice that the defendant means to dispute the goodness or value of the work done, I think the defendant ought to be let in to his defense. For, after all, considering the matter fairly, if the work stipulated for at a certain price were not properly executed, the plaintiff would not have done that which he would have engaged to do, the doing of which would be the consideration for the defendant's promise to pay, and the foundation on which his claim to the price stipulated for would rest; and therefore, especially if he should have notice that the defendant resists payment on that ground, he ought to come prepared with proof that the work was properly done." And Le Blanc, J., remarked: "I think that in either case the plaintiff must be prepared to show that his work was properly done, if that be disputed, in order to prove that he is entitled to his reward; otherwise he has not performed that which he undertook to do, and the consideration fails. And I think it is competent to the defendant to enter into such a defense, as well where the agreement is to do the work for such a sum, as where it is general to do such work. If a man contracted with another to build him a house for a certain sum, it surely would not be sufficient for the plaintiff to show that he had put together such a quantity of brick and timber in the shape of a house, if it could be shown that it fell down the next day, but that he had done the stipulated work according to his contract. And it is open to the defendant to prove that it was executed in such a manner as to be of no value at all to him, or not to be of the value claimed."

It would seem, then, to be fairly deducible from the reasoning of the English judges, from the case of Basten v. Butter, in 7 East, decided in 1806, to that of Poulton v. Lattimore, 9 Barn. & Cress., ruled in 1829, that this defense would by those judges themselves be deemed permissible, whenever it could be alleged without danger of surprise, and consistently with safety to the real rights of the parties; and it appears to be a deduction equally regular, that, where notice of the defense was given, either by pleading or by any other effectual proceeding, neither surprise nor any other invasion of the rights of the parties could occur, or be reasonably apprehended. But however the rule laid down by the courts in England should be understood, it has repeatedly been decided by learned and able judges in our own country, when acting, too, not in virtue of a statutory license or provision, but upon the principles of justice and convenience, and with the view of preventing litigation and expense, that where fraud has occurred in obtaining or in the performance of contracts, or where there has been a failure of consideration, total or partial, or a breach of warranty, fraudulent or otherwise, all or any of these facts may be relied on in defense by a party, when sued upon such contracts, and that he shall not be driven to assert them either for protection or as a ground for compensation in a cross action. Thus, in the case of Runyan v. Nichols, 11 Johns., 547, the supreme court of New York decide that in an action upon an attorney's bill, the defendant might give evidence of neglect of duty on the part of the plaintiff, if this defense was set up by plea, or after a notice to the same effect given to the plaintiff before the trial. In Beecker v. Vrooman, 13 Johns., 302, it was decided by the same court that in an action for the price of a chattel, the defendant may prove a deceit in the sale, and that the chattel was of no value, and thus defeat the plaintiff's action; or, if the defect produce merely a partial diminution of the value, he may show that in mitigation of damages. In the case of Sill v. Rood, 15 Johns., 230, which was an action on a promissory note given for the price of a chattel, the defendant was allowed, under the general issue, to show deceit in the sale. And it was holden further, that a promissory note given for the price of a chattel represented to be valuable, when in truth it was of no value, is without consideration and void. In the case of Grant v. Button, 14 Johns., 377, the suit was for the price of work and labor, and it was ruled that the defendant, in order to reduce the amount of the plaintiff's claim, might show that the work was not done faithfully and in a workmanlike manner. This, too, was the case of a contract for an agreed price. In Spalding v. Vandercook, 2 Wend., 433, Chief Justice Savage, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "In Beecker v. Vrooman, 13 Johns., 302, it is settled that deceit in a sale of a chattel may be shown in bar or in mitigation." The doctrine of the cases just cited, deduced from principles of justice and from the beneficial purpose of preventing circuity of action, would seem to apply with decisive influence to subjects falling within the range of a polity by which those doctrines were peculiarly and authoritatively commended. We cannot doubt, therefore, after a full examination of the questions on this record, that, under the provisions of the statute of Alabama pleaded in this case, the plaintiff in error had the right to rely in his defense either upon a fraud practiced on him in the formation of his contract, or on a false or fraudulent warranty, or on a total or partial failure of the consideration on which the contract was entered into by him, or on any payments, discounts or set-offs, in the language of the statute, "made, had or possessed by him," provided that the last three grounds of defense shall have come into existence, and been justly belonging to the plaintiff in error, before he had notice of the assignment of his obligation.

A doubt has been suggested as to the power of the plaintiff in error to defend himself, by reason either of fraud or of failure of consideration,—a doubt arising, not from any want of verity of the facts in either of those averments, but from the form of the pleadings in the cause. Thus, it is said that, if he designed to avoid the contract for fraud, he should have averred his disclaimer immediately on a discovery of the fraud, and his proffer to restore the property to the defendant in error, which it is thought the plea has not done. Secondly, it has been supposed that, if a diminution of the price alone was intended, the plea should not have concluded with averring that the writing was procured by false and fraudulent representations, and was therefore void; or with a general prayer for judgment whether the defendant below should be charged, etc. With respect to pleas in bar, it may be premised that they are never construed with the severity which is applied in testing pleas that are merely dilatory. If by rational intendment they meet the cause of action, or, in the quaint phrase of the old writers, they are certain to a general intent, they are deemed sufficient. If their structure merely, and not their substance, is to be assailed, this must be done by a special demurrer, a proceeding by no means favored, as it has rarely any real relation to the merits of the controversy. The averments in this plea, with respect to the readiness to return the property, are these: First, that the defendant below resided at a greater distance than three hundred miles from the plaintiff, and in a different state. Secondly, that, from the time at which the defendant below discovered the unsoundness of the fillies, and the falsehood of their pedigree, he was ready and willing and desirous to return them, and would have returned them to the plaintiff if he had had an opportunity of so doing, which he had not. The law requires of no man that which is unreasonable or impracticable. Lex neminem cogit ad vana seu impossibilia. In this case the defendant below avers his want of power to rid himself of that which he also avers had been fraudulently imposed upon him, and the plaintiff by his demurrer admits the fact and the character of the fact, as set out in the plea. But it has been said that the defendant below might have tendered a return of the property by notice through the postoffice, and was therefore bound to do so. It may be inquired whether this position does not involve a petitio principii. Does not the averment of absolute destitution of the power to return the property imply the absence of all the means leading to that measure, and carry with it the necessary inference of ignorance of the locality of the plaintiff, or of his postoffice? A letter directed to the state of Tennessee, generally, or to some place more than three hundred miles from the defendant below, and in a different state, might, and probably would, have been as unavailable for any practical purpose as a letter addressed to the state of New Hampshire. The plaintiff in error has averred his inability to return the property, and the defendant in error admits the truth of the averment. But the objection to this issue in law is properly applicable only to that aspect of the case which places the rights of the plaintiff below exclusively on the ground of a total rescission of the contract. If the purchaser chose to retain the property, and either to sue upon the warranty of pedigree and soundness, or to defend himself upon the ground of difference between the true and the pretended value of the property, he was bound neither to give immediate notice nor to tender a return of the property; he would be permitted to discount the difference between the real and the simulated value. But here the difficulty already mentioned is suggested, namely, that this defense is inconsistent with the conclusion of the plea, which says, "and said defendant saith that the said sealed note or writing obligatory was obtained from him by the said Newsom, by false and fraudulent representations as aforesaid, and is therefore fraudulent and void in law, wherefore said defendant prays judgment whether he ought to be charged with said debt," etc. This conclusion is said to call for an entire rescission of the contract, as founded in fraud, and cannot be reconciled with the facts previously stated as constituting a cause for partial relief.

§ 1434. An error in the prayer of a plea in bar will not be held to defeat the rendition of a judgment appropriate to its merits.

We have already said that pleas in bar are to receive, if not a liberal, certainly not a narrow and merely technical construction; and we will further observe that, if the difficulty suggested be sound, there never could be a defense in mitigation of damages where there should be alleged fraud in the inception of the contract, or where there should be a false or deceitful warranty, however willing the defendant might be to accept the difference between the real and the pretended value, and however circumstances might place it beyond his power to return the property. The injured party would in all cases be driven to repudiate the whole contract, or to go without compensation. This course, however, we have seen, is in contravention of the current of decisions which admit of the defense in mitigation of damages. But pleas in bar are always construed according to their entire subject matter, and will be sustained accordingly, as taken altogether, and will not be determined by a disjoining of their members, or by laying stress on what may be immaterial. It seems, moreover, that the prayer for judgment, or conclusion of such pleas, is not considered as essential to their validity. Thus it is stated by Chitty, vol. i, p. 558, speaking of pleas in bar, "that this prayer, before the recent rule" (alluding to the rules of pleading adopted in England in the 4th of William IV.), "ought properly to have corresponded with and been founded upon the commencement of the plea, and the effect of the matter contained in the body of it;" but, continues this author, "as the court would ex officio give judgment in favor of the defendant according to the substance of the plea, without reference to the conclusion, an error with regard to the prayer of judgment in the concluding part of the plea was not material, except in the case of a plea in abatement." In the case of The King v. Shakespeare, 10 East, 87, upon a demurrer to a plea in abatement, Lord Ellenborough said: "Praying judgment of the indictment means no more than praying judgment on the indictment; and if this were the case of a plea in bar, the court would give that judgment which, upon the whole record, appeared to be the proper judgment, though not prayed for by the party. But, in abatement, the court will give no other than the proper judgment prayed for by the party; and, without the defendant prays a particular and proper judgment in abatement, the court are not bound to give the proper judgment upon the whole record, as they would be in the case of pleas in bar." In Attwood v. Davis, 1 Barn. & Ald., 173, it is said by Bayley, J., that "there is a distinction between a plea in bar and a plea in abatement; in the former, the party may have a right judgment upon a wrong prayer, but not in the latter." In the case of Rowles v. Lusty, 4 Bing., 428, upon a writ of entry, it was ruled that the prayer for judgment for the messuages and land in the count did not vitiate the plea, notwithstanding the commencement of the plea applied only to the messuages and parcel of the land. And in this last case, The King v. Shakespeare and Attwood v. Davis are cited as authority.

But again (and this appears to give a conclusive answer to any objection to the admission here of proofs in diminution of damages), if we must treat this case according to the strictest rules of pleading, it might be said that the plea averring the note to have been obtained by fraud, which is admitted by the demurrer, would be sufficient to entitle the defendant below to a judgment on a declaration counting merely on the note, without regard to the question of total or partial rescission of the original contract. And then, if the plaintiff could be entitled to recover at all, it must be on a count on the original contract, or on a quantum valebat for the thing sold. And this would open the entire range of inquiry as to the character of the contract, and as to what in truth constituted the quantum valebat on which, if on anything, the plaintiff could found himself. Upon this branch of the case, we think the matter averred in the special plea of the defendant below was legitimately pleaded under the statute, and with sufficient certainty and pertinence to authorize a defense on the grounds of a false and deceitful warranty, or of a partial failure of consideration, and that he should have been let in to sustain, if he could, such a defense before the jury. We, therefore, consider the judgment of the district court to be erroneous, and do adjudge that the same be reversed, and that this cause be remanded to that court, with instructions to cause an issue to be made up on the special plea filed by the defendant below, under the statute of Alabama, and a venire facias to be awarded to try that issue.

Mr. Justice NELSON dissented, holding that the plea for a rescission of the contract was defective in not alleging an offer to return the property, and that, on failing on this line of defense for want of a sufficient plea, it was not admissible to set up a failure of consideration. 1 Stewart and Porter, 71, 226, 242; 3 id., 98; 3 Stewart, 169, 170, cited.

ELMINGER v. DREW.

(Circuit Court for Michigan: 4 McLean, 388-396. 1848.)

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This is an action of assumpsit by the indorsee against the indorser of a note. The declaration contains eleven counts. The first count states that E. Morse & Co. made their promissory note on the 10th of March, 1838, for $1,500, payable sixty days after date, to the order of defendant, at the office of the American Fur Company, in the city of New York, which note was assigned by the defendant to the plaintiff, was duly presented for payment and protested. The second count was substantially the same. The third count the same, and in addition that the makers of the note, who were commission merchants, transferred to the defendants a large amount of merchandise to indemnify the defendant for his indorsements, etc., and therefore that he was not entitled to notice, etc. The fourth count was substantially the same as the third. The fifth count, that the said Morse & Co. made their certain other note in writing on the same day, payable to the defendant, at the same place, four months after date, for $1,101, which was indorsed by the defendant to the plaintiff; that at maturity the note was presented at the place of payment, and due diligence used, etc. The sixth count states the making of the said note, payable to the order of the defendant, which was indorsed by him; and due diligence was used, etc., and that at the time the note was executed a large amount of merchandise was transferred to defendant for his indemnity, etc. The seventh count was substantially the same. The four following were the general counts:

The defendant pleaded, 1. The general issue. 2. That the American Fur Company are the owners of the notes sued on, which company is incorporated, and that some of the corporators reside in the district of Michigan. The third plea is to the same effect. The 4th plea. That previous to the execution of the notes E. Morse & Co. contracted with the American Fur Company to purchase a large quantity of white fish at $8 per barrel; and that the company warranted the fish to be well cured, good, sound and wholesome, on which six hundred barrels were purchased, and that the notes were executed in part payment of the same, and avers that the fish were not well cured, but were bad, unsound, unwholesome and of no value whatever. That the said notes were assigned to the plaintiff after their maturity, to wit, on the 1st of February, 1842, and at the place last aforesaid. 5th plea. That E. Morse & Co. purchased six hundred barrels of white fish, at $8 per barrel, from the company, who fraudulently and deceitfully and knowingly stated and represented to said E. Morse & Co. that the fish were well cured, good, sound and wholesome; that the same were unsound, etc., and of no value. 6th plea. That the defendant was a mere accommodation indorser on the notes; that the plaintiff, by an instrument of writing, gave to Morse & Co. six months' time, for a valuable consideration paid, for the payment of the notes, by which the defendant was discharged. 7th plea. That defendant was an accommodation indorser, and received no consideration therefor; that six weeks' time to the maker was given after the notes became due, etc. 8th plea. That defendant was an accommodation indorser, and that six months' time was given, etc. 9th plea. That time was given, etc., for a valuable consideration, etc. 10th plea. That the promises in the second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth counts were the same as set forth in the first and fifth counts, and that he received no consideration therefor, and that, without the assent or knowledge of defendant, for a valuable consideration, time was given.

The plaintiff replies to the second plea that the notes were not the property of the Fur Company at the time stated in the plea, and tenders an issue. To the third plea issue was joined. To the fourth and fifth pleas the plaintiff demurs, and assigns causes of demurrer. On these pleas the principal points arise on the pleadings. The defendants joined in demurrer. The first cause of demurrer alleged "that the property was not returned or offered to be returned;" it is insisted by the defendant that it was not necessary to aver any such thing. Chief Justice Spencer says: "We know of no case in which there is an omission to return the article agreed to be sold which precludes the defendant from contesting the price on the ground that it was not returned to the vendor." See 18 John., 141; 17 Com. L., 373, 121, 291; 3 N. H., 455. And the counsel remark, it was held in the above case, "that though the defendant had not returned or offered to return the hats, she might, in an action brought against her, nevertheless, insist on a deduction of the price originally agreed to be paid, in proportion to the diminished value." This, it is contended, is the settled doctrine in this country and in England. The rule is, as contended, "that if there is no beneficial consideration there shall be no pay." 1 Camp., 38, 190; Peake's Cas., 59, 216; 2 New Rep., 136.

§ 1435. Partial failure of consideration cannot be set up as a defense to a note.

A promissory note given on the sale of a chattel, fraudulently represented by the seller to be of great value, when in fact it was of no value, is without consideration and void. So where there is a warranty, and the return of the property is unnecessary; and it is insisted that it is immaterial whether the suit is brought on the original contract or on the security for the purchase money. Even a partial failure, if fraud intervene, is a good defense. 5 Mass., 46; 2 Taunt., 2; 1 Esp., 201; 1 Camp., 41 n.; Bayley on Bills, 533, notes 7 and 8; 1 Mason, 439; 10 Mass., 415.

There is great conflict in the authorities, whether a partial failure of the consideration may be set up in defense, in an action on the note given for the purchase money. The authorities all agree that where there is a total failure of the consideration, it is a good defense; or where the parties have agreed upon the amount, the failure being partial, defense may be made. But where the question as to the extent of the failure is open, the weight of authority is against the argument of defendant's counsel. The article purchased, six hundred barrels of fish, is alleged to have been badly cured, and of no value, and the warranty of the vendor was, that they were well cured, etc. But there is no averment in any of the pleas that the barrels are worthless, and it is difficult to say that there is a total failure of the consideration. The barrels, at twenty-five cents each, would be worth $150, which, it is true, is an inconsiderable amount when compared to the sum of $1,800, agreed to be paid for the fish; yet there is no rule by which the court or jury can limit a defense in such a case. The failure, if matter of defense, cannot depend upon the extent of it. If it be less than total, it must avail the defendant, to the amount of it, on principle, however inconsiderable it may be, when compared to the purchase money.

§ 1436. Rule of United States supreme court on partial failure of consideration of a note.

In the case of Greenleaf v. Cook, 2 Wheat., 13, the court say, "where a promissory note has been given for the purchase of real property, with full knowledge of the extent of an incumbrance, defect of title, arising from that incumbrance, is no legal bar to an action on the note." And they say, "that any partial defect in the title is not inquirable into in an action on the note in a court of law, but the party must seek relief, if anywhere, in chancery."

There may be cases in which, to set up a partial failure of consideration, would be attended with but little difficulty, and, in the language of Chancellor Kent, would avoid a circuity of action. But the question is, not what might be practicable in some cases, but what is the best and safest rule on the subject. I say this, because there are decisions both ways. Now, where there had been a partial failure or defect of title, as in the above case cited from Wheaton, two issues would be presented; first, as to the execution of the instrument on which the action is brought; and second, the extent of damage by the partial failure of title. Can both of these be submitted to the same jury, or would the defendant be required to admit the execution of the instrument, on pleading the partial failure? If this were adopted as a general principle, it would lead to embarrassment, if not uncertainty in pleading. A jury would not be the most competent tribunal to investigate an intricate controversy as to land titles; and if the partial failure had not been settled judicially, must the court and jury inquire into the title, and determine it? This would require another party to be brought before the court, who had no interest in the original suit. Such a course would be impracticable.

Where goods are sold and delivered with warranty, and a negotiable note is given in consideration of such sale and delivery, if the contract be absolute, such breach of it cannot be set up as a defense to an action on the security; unless the contract be rescinded by the consent of both parties, it remains open. Chitt. on Con., 742, 743, note 495; 28 Wend., 114; 2 Hill, 293; Thornton v. Wynn, 12 Wheat., 183 (§§ 1034-37, supra); 6 Conn., 508, 515; Power v. Wells, Cowp., 818; Weston v. Downes, 1 Doug., 23; 1 Term R., 135-6. If the contract be yet open, the plaintiff's demand is for unliquidated damages, on a special contract of warranty; and the issue as to whether there has been a breach of warranty cannot be tried, except on a special action on the warranty. Lewis v. Cosgrave, 2 Taunt., 2; Chitt. on Con., 465. The case of Oberl v. Bethune, 22 Com. L., 363, enforces the distinction between an action for the price of goods and one brought on a security given, on the authority of Morgan v. Richardson, 1 Camp., 40, and Tye v. Gwynne, 2 Camp., 346, cases which the court say have always been acted on, and the court expressly applies the doctrine to cases where there has been a warranty. 19 Com. L., 121; 1 Term R., 133; Solomon v. Turner, 2 Com. L., 291. The case of Moggridge v. Jones, 14 East, 486, is a strong case to show that in an action on a note the rule is strict with regard to letting in defenses founded on want of consideration. 25 Wend., 107. In New York, the English rule that partial failure of consideration cannot be shown in evidence in an action on a note has not been observed. 8 Wend., 109; 25 Wend., 114; 12 id., 566; Story on Bills, 204; 17 Com. L., 121. A partial failure cannot be set up as a defense to the note given for the purchase money. 12 Wheat., 183; 12 Wend., 566; 5 Mass., 319; 18 Pick., 95; 1 Metc., 547; 2 Kent Comm., 480; 5 East, 449; 2 Barn. & Ad., 456.

§ 1437. Fraud a defense to a note; but consideration must be returned.

The fifth plea sets up fraud and deceit, but does not aver an offer to rescind the contract by returning the property which, as appears from the plea, the defendant received, and still retains.

Fraud undoubtedly avoids a contract. But whenever the purchaser retains the property, it is evidence in law that he abides by the contract; and it is consequently considered as binding between the parties. And the only difference between such a case and one of warranty is, that the party defrauded may, at his own option, rescind the contract in a reasonable time. To this there may be an exception where, from the circumstances, it is impracticable to return the property, as the death of a horse, etc., and in such a case a notice should be given to the vendor. 2 Taunt., 2; 12 Wheat., 153; 2 Hill, 292; 14 East, 486; 2 Kent's Comm., 480; 1 Metc., 547; Chitt. on Con., 679, 680, 743; 15 Mass., 319; 12 Wheat., 193; Bleecker v. Vrooman, 13 Johns., 302; 3 Pet., 215; Scudder v. Andrews, 2 McL., 464. In the case above cited from 12 Wheat., the court say, "If the sale be absolute, and there is no subsequent consent to take back the article, the contract remains open, and the vendee must resort to his action on the warranty." But in such a case, where there had been a total failure of the consideration, it might be set up in defense. From the authorities cited on both sides, it will be seen that courts differ as to the right of a defendant to set up a partial failure in defense to an action on the note given; but the weight of authority, especially in England, is against the right. And such I considered to be the established doctrine of the supreme court, as declared in 2 McLean, above cited. A very recent decision, not yet reported, in the supreme court, has overruled the cases in that court. But, as the light of that opinion was not given until long after the decision of the case now before us, the decision must be reported as it was pronounced. In its entombment, this opinion will not be dishonored; for it will repose, at least as regards the decision of the above point, by the side of the opinions of illustrious judges.

The sixth plea avers that the defendant indorsed the note for the accommodation of E. Morse & Co., the makers, and without consideration; and that the plaintiffs, for a valuable consideration, agreed with E. Morse & Co., without the assent of the defendant, to extend the time of payment, etc. The replication traverses the averment that the defendant indorsed for the accommodation of E. Morse & Co., and avers that he received a valuable consideration therefor, and denies the agreement to extend the time of payment, etc. To this replication the defendant demurs, for duplicity in traversing both the averments; that the defendant was an accommodation indorser, and the averment that time was given. It is admitted to be a rule of pleading, where, on one side it consists of several distinct and material facts, all of which are necessary to its legal sufficiency, the adverse party is allowed to traverse only one of them. A denial of either of them in law is an answer to the whole. A denial of more than one of such distinct and material points is duplicity. United States v. Cumpton, 3 McL., 163; Gould's Pl., 406, sec. 49.

The averment in the plea that the defendant was an accommodation indorser, as regards the extension of the time of payment, could be of no importance. If the time were extended for a valuable consideration, as alleged, the indorser is discharged, whether he was an accommodation indorser or indorsed for a valuable consideration. That allegation in the plea may be considered as surplusage, for in no point of view, as regards the extension of time, raised in the plea, could such allegation be of any importance. Story on Bills, sec. 191; Brown v. Mott, 7 Johns., 361. To avail himself of the fact of his being an accommodation indorser, the defendant must aver and prove that the plaintiff gave no value for the notes, or took them over due. He will be presumed to be a holder for value, unless the contrary be made to appear. 3 Phil. Ev., 447; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 16; Bramah v. Roberts, 27 Com. L., 464. The demurrer to the above replication is overruled. The demurrers to the fourth and fifth pleas are sustained. Leave given to amend the pleadings of either party, etc.

BANK OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA v. ELLIS.

(Circuit Court for Oregon: 6 Sawyer, 96-106. 1879.)

Opinion by DEADY, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought to recover the sum of $2,025, alleged to be due the plaintiff on forty-three promissory notes, with interest, costs of protest and an attorney's fee. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a corporation organized in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and that the defendants are citizens of Oregon; that all of said notes were:

made on May 1, 1878, and eight of them are payable on October 1, 1878, and the remaining thirty-five on January 1, 1879; that each of said notes was indorsed by said defendants, and thereafter, and prior to their maturity, the plaintiff acquired the same in the regular course of business, and is now the owner and holder thereof, and that, "said notes falling due and remaining unpaid," the plaintiff procured the same to be protested.

The answer of the defendants contains sundry denials and three special pleas or defenses. The first one alleges that the makers of said notes received no consideration for the same, and "these defendants, indorsers of said notes, . . . received no consideration for such indorsement," and that the plaintiff, at the time it acquired said notes, had knowledge of these facts. The second one alleges that said notes were made in pursuance of an agreement between the makers thereof and the Dayton, Sheridan & Grand Ronde Railway Company that the latter would construct and put in operation, by October 1, 1878, a branch of its railway from a place called Broadmeads to the town of Dallas, and were placed in the hands of the defendants, R. S. Crystal, J. D. Lee and H. C. Brown, as agents and trustees, to deliver the same to said railway company upon the completion by it of said contract; that afterwards said trustees, with the consent of said makers, delivered said notes to said railway company upon its promise to perform said contract, but that said company has hitherto wholly failed to perform said contract, and the consideration for said notes has failed, and that the plaintiff had notice of these facts when it acquired said notes. The third defense alleges that the defendants did not indorse such notes "until long after they were made;" that the same were made payable to the order of said railway company; that said defendants never had "any interest in said notes," or consideration for indorsing the same, and that the plaintiff, at the time of acquiring the notes, had knowledge of these facts.

The plaintiff demurs to each of these defenses because the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. Each of these defenses must stand or fall by itself, and without any aid from either of the others. Hall v. Austin, 1 Deady, 107; Bachman v. Everding, 1 Saw., 72. The first defense merely alleges that the notes were made by the makers and indorsed by the defendants without consideration — not that the consideration has failed, but that there never was any. This is not a shadow of a defense to the action. The mere possession of a negotiable note imports, prima facie, that the holder acquired it bona fide, for value, in the usual course of business, without notice of any circumstance impeaching its validity, and that he is the owner thereof, entitled to recover the contents of the same from all prior parties thereto. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., sec. 812; 1 Par. N. and B., 184; Collins v. Gilbert, 4 Otto, 754 (§§ 432-436, supra). Here the plaintiff not only alleges that it is the owner and holder of these notes, but that it acquired them before maturity in due course of business. An allegation, then, that these notes were made or indorsed by the defendants without consideration is no defense to its claim to recover. Inquiry into the consideration of negotiable paper can only be made between privies or immediate parties thereto,—as the maker and payee, an indorser and his indorsee. All other parties to negotiable paper are called remote, and as between them, a consideration for making or indorsing the same is conclusively presumed. But the defendant may make the defense of a want of consideration against a remote party, if he could have done so against a nearer party, and such remote party took the paper with a knowledge that it was open to this defense. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., sec. 174; Par. N. and B., 175, 183. And to this qualification of the rule there is an important exception in the case of accommodation paper. A party who makes or indorses a note without consideration, and for the purpose of thereby lending his credit to another, is an accommodation maker or indorser, and cannot make the defense of a want of consideration against any one except the accommodated party. The note is supposed to be taken by third persons upon the credit given to him, and he is expected to pay it. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., sec. 189; 1 Par. N. and B., 183. A party to negotiable paper who seeks to make the want of consideration a defense to an action thereon must not only allege such want of consideration, but must go further, and show how and why he is entitled to make such defense as against the plaintiff, in any aspect of the case made in the complaint. In this case it does not appear from the plea that the defendants are entitled to avail themselves, as against this plaintiff, of the want of consideration for either making or indorsing these notes. The makers are not sued, and the question of their liability in this respect is not in the case. An indorser's contract and liability is separate and distinct from that of the maker's. An indorsement is not merely a transfer of the note, but it is also a fresh and substantive contract, by which the indorser agrees, among other things, that the note will be paid at maturity by himself, if not by the maker, and as his own debt, and not that of another. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., sec. 669; 2 Par. N. and B., 23.

For aught that appears here, there is no privity between the plaintiff and the defendants, and therefore it is immaterial in this action whether the latter received any consideration for their indorsement or not, unless it further appears that the plaintiff gave no consideration for the notes, and that no holder, intermediate between the plaintiff and the defendant, did so. Hoffman v. Bank of Milwaukee, 12 Wall., 191 (§§ 1497, 1498, infra). Again, it would not be inconsistent with this defense, if the defendants indorsed these notes without consideration for the accommodation of the makers or payee or its indorsee, and therefore they may be liable thereon, notwithstanding such want of consideration. The plea to be a good defense must meet this phase of the case by denying directly that the defendants were accommodation indorsers, or by stating facts inconsistent therewith.

The second plea is still less material than the first. It only alleges in effect that the consideration for the making of the notes, to wit, the promise of the railway company to construct and operate a branch road to Dallas by October 1, 1878, has failed. This may be so; but in an action by a holder of these notes against an indorser, such fact alone is wholly immaterial. Notwithstanding this, even the defendants may have indorsed these notes to the plaintiff, and received from it therefor their full value.

§ 1441. Time when accommodation indorsement was made is immaterial in action by bona fide holder.

The third defense is also bad. The only fact which it contains in addition to the others is, that the defendants did not indorse these notes "until long after they were made, and never had any interest in them." In the absence of anything to the contrary, an indorsement upon negotiable paper is presumed to have been made after the making of the same and before maturity; and if such indorsement be made by any one other than the original payee, then after his indorsement. And, as between an indorser after maturity, and a subsequent holder of a negotiable note, the former is held liable as upon a note payable on demand, and even as an original promisor. 2 Par. N. and B., 9, 13; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., sec. 928; New Orleans, etc., Co. v. Montgomery, 5 Otto, 18. This allegation as to the time when the indorsement of the defendant was made only amounts to this: that such indorsement was made after the note was, which fact is consistent with the allegation of the complaint, and the defendants' liability to the plaintiff. But upon this fact and the allegation that the defendants never had any interest in the notes, it is argued by counsel that they are not in law indorsers, but guarantors, which is a collateral agreement and void unless made upon a distinct consideration. What is the nature of the liability which a third person incurs who indorses a note before the payee thereof, has been a vexed question in the law and has been settled differently in different states. In the supreme court of the United States, the rule is established that such person is either an original promisor, a guarantor or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the intent and purpose with which the indorsement is made; which may be shown by parol, upon the theory that such an indorsement is irregular and ambiguous. Rey v. Simpson, 22 How., 350; Good v. Martin, 5 Otto, 94 (§§ 541-549, supra). But the allegation that the defendants did not indorse these notes until long after they were made does not even imply that they indorsed them before the payee did — before they were put in circulation — but rather the contrary. Nor is it a sufficient allegation that they were indorsed after maturity. The presumption is that the defendants indorsed the notes regularly — after the payee — and although they then had no interest in them, they are still liable to the plaintiff as indorsers, unless there was an agreement or understanding at the time that they were to be liable only as guarantors, and that this was known to the plaintiff at the time of acquiring the notes. But in favor of the plaintiff the defendants are presumed to have indorsed as payees; and for the purpose of maintaining this action against them, as such, the plaintiff may write over the indorsement of the original payee, "Pay to the order of the defendants," naming them, or any other contract or direction not inconsistent with what it knew to be the purpose of such indorsement. 2 Par. N. and B., 2.

Besides, the defendants may have indorsed these notes for the accommodation of the maker, or the original payee, or its indorsee; and in such case the fact that they had no interest in the notes, and received no consideration for their indorsements thereon, is wholly immaterial, and would be just what every one, at all conversant with the subject, would ordinarily infer from the premises. In the course of the argument for the defendants, it was suggested that if their defenses must be considered separately, application would be made to amend the answer so as to state the three in one; and counsel for the plaintiff, as a matter of convenience, has considered this as already done. But such an amendment will make no difference in the result. The plaintiff, being presumed to be the bona fide holder of these notes for value, before maturity, and such assumption not being negatived or contradicted by these pleas, prima facie, it is entitled to recover their contents from any and all of the prior parties thereto; and no plea is or can be a defense to this action unless it states facts sufficient to negative this conclusion, so far as the defendants are concerned, in any and every phase of the case made in the complaint. Negotiable paper is the life-blood of commerce and business, and its circulation and usefulness would be seriously impaired if every maker or remote indorser thereof could set up a failure to keep the private understandings or agreements between himself and third persons, upon which he claims to have signed or indorsed the same, to avoid the payment thereof according to his obligation, as shown by the instrument, in the hands of a bona fide holder for value. Parties who put their names to or upon negotiable paper upon the faith of other people's expectations and promises, must not expect, if they are thereby deceived or disappointed, to throw the loss upon those who in good faith have taken their paper for what they or those whom they trusted gave it out to be. The demurrer is sustained.

DEMURRER TO AMENDED ANSWER.

Opinion by DEADY, J.

The complaint alleges that each of said notes contained a stipulation, that, in case suit should be instituted for the collection of the same, there should be paid such sum as the court might deem reasonable as an attorney's fee in said suit, and that $220 is such fee. The amended answer denies that the plaintiff is entitled to recover any attorney's fee in this action; and for a further defense alleges that after said notes had been indorsed in blank by said Gaston and the defendants, the said Gaston negotiated the same to the plaintiff, and he became the owner thereof; that afterwards, and before the commencement of this action, the plaintiff wrote over said Gaston's name thereon a special indorsement to itself: "Pay to the — of the Bank of British North America, or order;" and "thereby released the defendants, and each of them, from any and all liability on said indorsements." The answer also shows the order in which the indorsements were made on said notes, from which it appears that Gaston's name was written first, and those of the five defendants immediately thereunder; so that it was convenient, if not necessary, for the plaintiff, in writing the special directions thereon, making the notes payable to itself or order, to write the same as it did, immediately above the name of Gaston.

§ 1442. Filling up prior blank indorsement not a discharge of subsequent indorsers.

This defense assumes that the holder of a negotiable instrument, who makes an early blank indorsement payable to himself, thereby discharges all subsequent indorsers thereon from liability as such, the same as if he had stricken their names therefrom. The only case cited which is directly in point is that of Cole v. Cushing, 8 Pick., 48, in which it was held that such an act did not discharge the subsequent indorsers, but they still remained liable to the holder. To the contrary of this, there is a dictum or suggestion in 2 Par. on N. and B., 19, to the effect that "it might be said, in such a case, that when the holder made the note payable to himself by the first indorser, he made himself indorsee of that indorser, and thereby discharged all subsequent indorsers." The suggestion, "it might be said," however distinguished the source, scarcely amounts to a quere, and certainly cannot overcome or cast doubt upon the well-considered decision in Cole v. Cushing, with which my own judgment fully concurs. It is not to be presumed that the holder of a note with a number of indorsers thereon will intentionally discharge any of them without some reason or consideration commensurate with the loss of security for his debt thereby sustained. The indorsers having no right to be discharged, the act of the plaintiff ought not to be construed to have that effect, unless it plainly appears that such was the intention with which it was done, than which nothing is more improbable. The direction written by the plaintiff over the indorsements upon the notes is not written over the signature of Gaston exclusively, and under the circumstances may be regarded as having been made with reference to those of the defendants as well as that of the former. The defendants were without interest in the notes. They were mere accommodation indorsers, and their signatures could not and did not have the effect to transfer them to any one, but only to give them currency so as to enable Gaston to dispose of them as he did. Under these circumstances, there is no room for the inference that the plaintiff intended by this act, even if it had no reference to the indorsements of the defendants, to discharge them from all liability thereon.

§ 1443. Stipulation in note to pay attorney's fee does not render it non-negotiable; authorities.

As to the attorney's fee, the defendants claim that the promise to pay one was only made by the makers of the notes, and that the subsequent parties thereto are under no such obligation to any one. In The Wilson Sewing Machine Co. v. Moreno, 6 Saw., 35, this court held that a stipulation to pay a reasonable attorney's fee to the holder of a promissory note, in case suit is brought to enforce the payment of the same, is just and valid, and that the negotiability of such note is not thereby affected or impaired. But the defendants herein claim that such a stipulation or contract is only the promise of the maker, and therefore not that of the defendants; and also that such stipulation, not being an integral part of the note, but a contract collateral thereto, is not negotiable, and therefore can only be enforced as between the immediate parties to it, the maker and payee. In Smith v. Muncie National Bank, 29 Ind., 153, it was held that the acceptor of a bill of exchange which contained a stipulation for the payment of an attorney's fee was bound to pay the same. But this conclusion rests upon the fact that the acceptor of a bill of exchange sustains the same relation thereto as does the maker of a note. In Hubbard v. Harrison, 38 Ind., a stipulation in a promissory note to pay an attorney's fee was enforced in an action by the indorser against the payee, who was in fact an accommodation indorser. It was implied rather than said by the court that the note being negotiable, notwithstanding the stipulation, the latter passed with the former, and might be enforced by the holder thereof against any party to the instrument. In 1 Dan. Neg. Inst., sec. 62, it is said that the attorney's fee need not be sued for by the attorney, but may be recovered by the holder; and that the liability therefor "as for every engagement, imported by the bill or note, enters into the acceptor's and indorser's contract."

While there is a conflict in the authorities upon the question of whether an instrument, otherwise negotiable, that contains a stipulation for the payment of an attorney's fee, is thus negotiable or not, no case has been cited which holds that such stipulation does not pass with the instrument, in case the same is deemed negotiable. A stipulation in a negotiable instrument for an attorney's fee, which in effect provides for the payment of certain expenses of collection in case the same is not paid without suit, so far gives security and currency to such instrument, and is therefore to be regarded with favor as being a just and convenient means of promoting the general object and utility of the same. At common law the compensation of an attorney consisted of the various items allowed for his services, called collectively his "costs;" and in case his client prevailed in the action, these were collected off the adverse party as a part of the judgment. Substantially this stipulation for an attorney's fee is a substitute for the allowance of costs at common law, and enables a party taking a negotiable instrument to provide by agreement with the maker or indorser thereof that if the same is not paid without suit the holder shall recover his attorney's fee as well as the principal and interest. The maker of these notes having agreed to pay an attorney's fee to the holder thereof if the same were not paid without action, in my judgment each subsequent party thereto assumed a like responsibility to such holder, and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to recover such fee from the defendants in this case. But I think the defendants are liable to the plaintiff in this action for an attorney's fee, even if the stipulation therefor can only be enforced between the immediate parties thereto. The defendants are accommodation indorsers, in effect makers of these notes. By their indorsement of them they authorized Gaston, the then holder, to transfer them to the plaintiff, which was done. Every stipulation in them, and every obligation incident thereto, thereby became the stipulation and obligation of the defendants, made directly to the plaintiff. The demurrer is sustained.

§ 1444. Bona fide holders.— A. gave his note to B., and it was indorsed to C. The consideration for it failed, whereupon A. and B. made a new contract, by which B. provided for reimbursing A. This agreement B. failed to perform. Held, that A. could not set up such failure as a defense to a suit by C. upon the note. Young v. Grundy, *7 Cr., 548. See § 1429.

§ 1445. A. built a sugar mill for B., who complained of its being defectively constructed, and A. agreed to send workmen to put the mill in proper order, whereupon B. agreed unconditionally to accept a bill for the purchase price of it, and did accept it. A. failed to put the sugar mill in order. Held, that A.'s failure in this respect was no defense to a suit against B. on the acceptance by a bona fide purchaser of the bill, although such purchaser knew of the defective construction of the mill, and also of B.'s unconditional promise to accept the bill. Arthurs v. Hart, 17 How., 6. See §§ 1, 7, 40, 117, 212, 230, 306, 328, 1429.

§ 1446. Total—Total failure of consideration a good defense to a note. Slacom v. Wishart, *8 McL., 517; Greenleaf v. Cook, 2 Wheat., 13; Parkwood v. Clark, *2 Saw., 548.

§ 1447. A total failure of consideration is a good defense to an action on a promissory note, whether the consideration was land or personal property, and if it was land, whether it was conveyed by deed or by agreement to convey. Scudder v. Andrews, *2 McL., 464.

§ 1448. Heir's note for ancestor's debt.— A note given by an heir or personal representative to renew a note of the ancestor, barred by limitation, is void for want of consideration, heirs at law and distributees not being liable to pay the debts of the ancestor. Didlake v. Robb, 1 Woods, 682. See, also, Alston v. Mumford, 1 Marsh., 266.

§ 1449. Several tracts of land.— Where the purchase of three tracts of land was one transaction, held, that the failure of consideration in the sale of one tract may be set up as a defense to a suit to foreclose a mortgage on another tract of land executed to secure a note given for the purchase price of that other tract. Hicks v. Jennings, 4 Fed. R., 855.

§ 1450. Illegal consideration.— When a bill is drawn for a consideration which is illegal, or which happens to fail, neither the payee nor any subsequent indorsee with notice can recover. Perry v. Crammond, *1 Wash., 100.

§ 1451. Inquiry into consideration.— In a suit by the payee against the drawer of a bill, the consideration may be inquired into. Ryberg v. Snell, *2 Wash., 294.

§ 1452. Though a bill drawn for value received may be presumed to have been drawn for a consideration, yet where a strong ground is laid to show a want of consideration, it behooves the party to clear the matter of suspicion. United States v. Price, *2 Wash., 460.

§ 1453. Deposit with trustee as collateral.— The A. bank held the bills of the B. bank to the amount of $100,000. The B. bank agreed to and did give drafts on New York to pay the $100,000, which were deposited with a trustee to be delivered to the B. bank when the drafts were paid. The B. bank also deposited with the same trustee $10,000, which, in case of non-payment of the drafts, was to be given as damages to the A. bank, to which in such case the $100,000 was also to be returned. The drafts were not paid and the $100,000 and $10,000 were given to the A. bank by the trustee. The holder for the benefit of the A. bank sues the B. bank upon the drafts. Held, that the deposit of the $100,000 and the $10,000 as collateral with the trustee, and his payment thereof to the A. bank, could not be pleaded by the B. bank as a failure of consideration for the drafts. Stickney v. Bank of Illinois, *3 McL., 182.

§ 1454. Consideration for note given to secure accommodation notes— Payment of latter. A. was in habit of indorsing accommodation notes for C. C. gave A. his note to secure such indorsements. Before it became due A. indorsed and delivered it to B. for less than one-fifth of its face. After it became due, B. delivered it to D., without indorsing it, for some lots valued at one-sixth of the face of the note, but which were never conveyed to B. Held, that until A. was obliged to pay the notes he had indorsed to accommodate C., C.'s note was without consideration, and A. could only recover nominal damages upon it. Nor could third parties with knowledge of the facts recover, and that D. was chargeable with such notice. In re Hook,* 11 N. B. R., 282.

§ 1455. Accommodation notes.—Accommodation notes in the hands of third parties as collateral security for an existing debt, delivered before maturity, and without notice of any infirmity, are not open to the defense of want of consideration. Fogg v. Stickney,* 11 N. B. R., 167. See §§ 5, 278, 364, 498, 6.6, 701, 1216, 1428.

§ 1456. Accommodation indorser cannot set up want of consideration. Bank of Columbia v. French,* 1 Cr. C. C., 221.

§ 1458. Failure to perform promises.—One who subscribes for stock in a railroad, giving his note secured by mortgage in payment thereof, in an action by a bona fide holder of the note cannot plead want of consideration in that the representations made to him when he subscribed for the stock were never carried into effect. Sawyer v. Prickett, 19 Wall., 160.

§ 1459. Partial failure.—Partial failure of consideration no defense to an action at law upon a note. Slacom v. Wishart,* 3 McL., 517.

§ 1460. Prior mortgage; foreclosure.—Where a promissory note was given for the purchase price of land, and at the time there existed a prior mortgage on the land as to which a decree of foreclosure had been rendered, held, that the note was not void for failure of consideration, such failure not being total. Greenleaf v. Cook, 2 Wheat., 13.

§ 1461. Failure to complete work on time.—A railway company having become embarrassed and unable to pay for work of construction as it progressed, the president of the company agreed to give the contractor his individual notes for the work done, in consideration of the contractor agreeing to complete the work by a certain time. Held, that the contractor could not recover from the maker of the note without showing completion of the work at the time agreed upon. Slater v. Emerson, 19 How., 224.

§ 1462. Bond for title; failure to give, as required.—The maker of a note delivered it to B. with instructions to go with the plaintiff (the payee) to C., who would draw a bond of conveyance from the plaintiff to the maker in accordance with a contract of sale between them, and to deliver the note to the payee upon his executing the bond. Held, that, although the bond did not agree with the contract of sale in every respect, and was for a smaller amount, there was not such a failure of consideration as would prevent the payee from recovering on the note. But if the bond be drawn for a less amount than provided for in the contract of sale, by reason of the fraudulent representations of the payee of the note, he cannot recover on the note. Boone v. Queen, 2 Cr. C. C., 371.

§ 1463. Failure to convey.—Debt on a note, by indorsee against maker, the plaintiff having received the note after dishonor. Defense, that the note was given for the purchase of land which the payee had not conveyed according to covenant. Held, no defense. Holy v. Rhodes,* 2 Cr. C. C., 245.

§ 1464. Partial failure; recoupment.—When some portion of the consideration remains, the defense can only come in by way of recoupment of damages for the partial failure; but the counterclaim must be pleaded and proved the same as if an action had been brought upon it. Packwood v. Clark,* 2 Saw., 549.

ALEXANDER v. HORNER.

(Circuit Court for Arkansas: 1 McCrary, 634-647. 1879.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The material facts in this case are, that the Columbia Life Insurance Company, of which plaintiff is trustee, held notes of defendant, secured by mortgage, for over $5,000; that by a negotiation between the directors of the company and Davis, the latter became the holder of defendant's notes and mortgage; that defendants sold to Davis certain stock which they held in the Columbia Life Insurance Company, and received in payment their notes and mortgage; that no proof shows any knowledge on the part of defendants of fraud charged by plaintiff against Davis. The bill seeks to require the defendants to pay their notes to plaintiff, as receiver of the (insolvent) Columbia Life Insurance Company. Neither Davis nor the Life Association, that is charged with co-operating with him in the alleged frauds, is made a party to the bill.

§ 1467. Insurance company may hold or negotiate commercial paper.

Opinion by CALDWELL, D. J.

The board of directors of the insurance company had an undoubted right to sell the defendants' notes and other securities to Davis, and authorize its secretary to indorse them as was done. Banks, insurance companies, and other like corporations, have the power to take and hold negotiable notes and other securities in the general conduct of their business, and this includes the power to negotiate them. Hardy v. Merriwether, 14 Ind., 203; McIntire v. Preston, 5 Gilm., 48; Nichols v. Oliver, 36 N. H., 218; Spear v. Ladd, 11 Mass., 94; Northampton Bank v. Pepoon, id., 288; Lester v. Webb, 1 Allen, 34. The notes were negotiable, and their assignment and delivery invested Davis with the legal and equitable title to them and the right to receive payment and cancel them. He did receive payment from the makers—the defendants—in shares of stock in the company, then worth par in the market, and canceled and surrendered up the notes to them.

§ 1468. One who pays a note to a fraudulent indorsee is discharged, unless he has notice of the fraud.

The amended answer and the deposition of J. J. Horner make it certain that the defendants in this case had no knowledge or suspicion personally, or through their agents, that Davis had obtained their notes by fraud, or that there was any infirmity in his title; and having paid the notes in good faith to Davis, the indorsee and holder, the plaintiff cannot compel the defendants to pay the notes a second time, even if Davis was a fraudulent holder. Payment to the thief or finder himself of a negotiable note transferable by delivery will discharge the maker, provided such payment was not made with knowledge or suspicion of the infirmity of the holder's title, or under circumstances which might reasonably awaken the suspicions of a prudent man. Byles on Bills, 213. Nothing short of fraud, not even gross negligence, if unattended with mala fides, will invalidate the payment so as to take away the rights founded thereon. Story on Bills, § 416; Edwards on Bills, § 537. The bill counts upon the notes exclusively; it does not seek a recovery upon a stock subscription, nor does it even allege that the notes were stock notes. The answer discloses that the notes were given for a subscription to the capital stock of the company, but that fact did not render the notes any the less negotiable, or prevent the company from negotiating them, or excuse the defendants from paying them to the indorsee and holder; and when paid in good faith to the holder, the company can have no claim against the makers, either upon the notes or for the original consideration. It is not true the defendants paid nothing of value for the notes. The shares of stock owned by the defendants were issued as full paid shares; the stock was then worth par in the market; the defendants refused to sell it for less, and Davis agreed to give par for it. The test is its then market value, and not what it was really worth in the light of subsequent events. The company having indorsed and transferred the notes to Davis, it is not open to it to object that he discharged the debt for an inadequate consideration, if the defendants had no notice of the alleged fraud and acted in good faith. If Davis had been a bona fide holder of the notes, he could not successfully maintain that they had not been fully paid, and no more can the company.

§ 1469. Fraudulent indorsee a necessary party to a suit by owner to compel payee to pay a second time.

The bill is fatally defective for want of proper parties. The gravamen of the plaintiff's bill is that Davis and the life association, acting in concert, fraudulently procured the assignment and transfer of the defendants' notes from the company to Davis. It is not alleged in the bill, nor was it claimed in argument, that defendants were parties to that fraud; it is claimed that their agent only had notice of it before paying the notes. Obviously the plaintiff has no case unless he can impeach and set aside the sale and transfer of these securities to Davis. Davis ought to be a party to any bill seeking to do this. He is entitled to an opportunity to repel the imputation of fraud, and protect himself from liability if he can do so; the defendants are entitled to his aid in defending the action; and as he would be liable over to the defendants in the event of the plaintiff's recovering, he must be made a party for the protection of the defendants, and to avoid multiplicity of suits. Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall., 94. The defendants have a right to insist that Davis shall be brought in; and on the averments in the bill the life association also, because, if they are compelled to pay their notes a second time, they are entitled to an action over against these parties, to be reimbursed the amount paid them or Davis in satisfaction of their notes, which would be the par value of their stock, that being the market value as well as the agreed value between Davis and the defendants. But as Davis and the life association are not made parties, it would be open to them in any suit that the defendants might bring against them to be reimbursed the amount of plaintiff's recovery, to contest the question of fraud in the transfer of these securities to Davis, and it might result that the court or jury trying that issue would find the transfer was not fraudulent, and thus the defendants would be wronged in a mode that would leave them no redress. Equity will not permit a plaintiff to put a defendant in this predicament. The rule is well settled that where, in the event of the plaintiffs' succeeding, the defendants will be subjected to undue inconvenience, or to danger of loss or to future litigation, or to a liability under the decree more extensive and direct than if the absent parties were before the court; or will thereby acquire a right to call upon the absent parties either to reimburse him the whole or a part of the plaintiffs' demand, then such absent parties must be brought before the court in order that the rights and liberties of all may be settled by one proceeding and a multiplicity of suits avoided, with a possible different determination of the same issue, to the irreparable injury of the defendant sued. Story's Eq. Pl., secs. 136, 138; 1 Daniell's Ch. Pl. & Pr., 281, 282; Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall., 94; Milroy v. Stockwell, 1 Carter (Ind.), 35.

§ 1470. Rules as to necessary parties in equity.

Anticipating this objection, and with a view to avoid it, the plaintiff alleges in his bill that Davis and the life association are beyond the jurisdiction of the court and citizens of the same state as the plaintiffs, and cannot therefore be made parties without ousting the jurisdiction of the court. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs argued earnestly that these averments under the act of congress of February 28, 1839 (sec. 737, R. S.), and the forty-seventh equity rule, dispensed with the necessity of making these parties defendants. This argument has often been made before, and always unavailing in a case like this. The supreme court of the United States have divided parties to suits in equity into three classes: (1) formal; (2) necessary or proper; and (3) indispensable. The first two classes may be dispensed with; the third, never. The absent parties in this case are indispensable parties, as that term is defined and applied by the supreme court. The act of congress and the forty-seventh rule effected no change of the law on this subject of parties to suits in equity. In the leading case upon this subject the supreme court say: "The act of congress does not affect any case where persons are not joined because their citizenship would defeat the jurisdiction; and so far as it touches suits in equity it is no more than a legislative affirmation of the rule previously established by the decisions" of that court. "And the forty-seventh rule is only a declaration for the government of practitioners and courts, of the effect of this act of congress and of the previous decisions of the court on the subject of that rule. It remains true, notwithstanding the act of congress and the forty-seventh rule, that a circuit court can make no decree affecting the rights of an absent person, and can make no decrees between the parties before it, which so far involves or depends upon the rights of an absent person that complete and final justice cannot be done between the parties to the suit without affecting these rights, or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final termination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience." Shields v. Barrow, 17 How., 130. And in a late case the court say: "The act of congress of 1839, and the rule of this court upon the subject, give no warrant for the idea that parties whose presence was before indispensable could thereafter be dispensed with." Ribon v. Railroad Co., 16 Wall., 450. And the rule established in these cases has been affirmed, illustrated and applied in many other cases. Kendig v. Dean, 97 U. S., 423; Florida v. Georgia, 17 How., 508; Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How., 115; Barney v. Baltimore City, 6 Wall., 284; Florence Sewing Machine Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co., 8 Blatch., 127; Tobin v. Walkinshaw, 1 McAl., 26; Litchfield v. The Register and Receiver, 1 Woolw., 299. The ruling in Robinson v. Carson, 19 Wall., 94, is directly in point in this case, and concludes the question.

Counsel for plaintiff urge that the rules as to parties in equity are somewhat flexible; that the forty-seventh rule in terms empowers the courts to dispense with "necessary or proper parties, in their discretion;" and attention is called to the case of Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat., 152, where it is said the objection for want of parties does not affect the jurisdiction, but addresses itself to the policy of the court, and is subject to its discretion. Neither the rule nor the case cited touch the question of indispensable parties; the term itself implies they can never be dispensed with. And the absent persons in this case belong to that class, and not only cannot be brought in on account of their common citizenship with the plaintiff, but they would not be permitted to come in; and in all such cases the court cannot act at all, but will leave the parties to terminate their dispute by other means. Florida v. Georgia, 17 How., 508; Florence S. M. Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co., 8 Blatch., 127; Kendig v. Dean, 97 U. S. 423. And if the absent persons were not indispensable parties, but only "necessary or proper," and if the forty-seventh rule invested the court with the discretion to proceed or not with the case in the absence of such parties, there is nothing in the case calling for an exercise of that discretion favorable to the plaintiff, but the reverse, as will be seen from a brief resumé of the case. The bill only seeks to set aside the contract between Davis and the company so far as it concerns the defendants' notes; it does not seek to set aside the contract as to the other securities embraced in it; nor does the plaintiff offer to repay what the company received in cash on this sale of its securities or any part of it, or to surrender back to defendants their stock, or to place any of the parties in statu quo, nor does it seek to annul the subsequent action of the company by which it blotted out of existence nine-tenths of its capital stock, including the shares formerly owned by the defendants, and which reduction was effected by using as cash the draft received from Davis on the life association. The validity of the company's action in reducing its stock $900,000 by the purchase of nine thousand shares from the life association and its cancellation ought to be determined before any relief is granted; for if that action was valid, it amounted to a ratification of all that had gone before, and the company ought not to be heard to assert that Davis did not pay value for the securities transferred to him when it appropriated and used the draft received from him as money. But that transaction cannot be inquired into in this case, because the bill does not attack, or even refer to it; and if it did, the indispensable parties to its determination are not before the court.

Passing by the originators, actors and participants in the alleged fraud, all of whom are citizens of the same state as the plaintiff, and solvent, so far as the record discloses anything on that subject, affirming the sale of the company's securities to Davis, so far as it profited by it, keeping all that was obtained by that transaction and the subsequent operations based on the fruits of that transaction, the plaintiff seeks a recovery against defendants, admittedly innocent of any participation in the alleged fraud, by proceeding in a mode that would deprive them of that sure recourse on the actual parties to the alleged fraud, to which they would be entitled, and in a mode that would probably result in exempting the actual perpetrators of the fraud from liability altogether. A plaintiff occupying this attitude has no claims to the favorable exercise of an equitable discretion on the subject of parties, if such discretion exists, which is not decided.

§ 1471. Objection for non-joinder; how taken.

Objection for the non-joinder of necessary parties need not be taken by demurrer, plea or answer; it is open to the defendant to make it any time; and it may, and in a clear case ought to be raised and acted upon by the court on its own motion.

These conclusions render it unnecessary to decide whether the transactions between Davis and the life association and the life insurance company were or not fraudulent, or to rule upon the other questions presented at the hearing. Decree dismissing bill without prejudice.

HALL v. WEARE.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois.

§ 1472. Requisites of record.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

This record has been brought up in a shape of which we can hardly speak in too strong terms of disapproval. The bill of exceptions spreads out at length the testimony of numerous witnesses, in regard to which no question arises that we can consider; and exception appears to have been taken to almost every paragraph in the charge. The whole is like a drag-net, bringing up in shapeless mass a portion of what occurred at the trial, apparently in the hope that something might somewhere be found that would justify a reversal of the judgment. The purpose in thus making up the record seems to have been to treat the case here both as a motion for a new trial and as a writ of error, and much of the argument has been directed to showing that the evidence did not justify the verdict that was rendered. Eighteen errors have been assigned, some of them to matters not reviewable in this court, as has often been decided, and others to matters that were quite immaterial, and that could have had no possible effect upon the judgment in the court below. We shall not consider in detail these assignments. It is not necessary to a correct decision of the case. Those that have any apparent soundness only will be noticed.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff sued upon two acceptances, together amounting to $4,500, and the defendants pleaded as a set-off a draft for $4,500, drawn by the First National Bank of Cedar Rapids, of which the plaintiff was cashier, upon the First National Bank of Chicago, and protested for non-payment. The draft was dated March 16, 1869. It was drawn in favor of Charles H. Hall, and by him indorsed to the defendants. To these pleas the plaintiff replied that the draft offered to be set off had been obtained from the bank by false and fraudulent representations of Charles H. Hall, the payee, and that the consideration for it had wholly failed; and, further, that the defendants, when they received it, had knowledge of the fraud, and of the failure of consideration. Following the replications, there were rejoinders and surrejoinders; but the replications tendered the only material issues between the parties, and to the maintenance of one side or the other of these issues the evidence was directed. Thus the case was put to the jury by the circuit court. The learned judge instructed them as follows: "The issues under the pleadings are these: First, that the consideration for the said draft has wholly failed, of which the defendants had notice at the time they received the same, and that it is not now a valid demand against the plaintiff in the hands of the defendants. Second, that the said draft was obtained from the said bank by certain fraudulent acts of the said Charles H. Hall, of which the defendants were cognizant at the time they took the same, and that the said draft is void in the defendants' hands, by reason of said fraud. If either of these issues is found for the plaintiff, he will be entitled to recover."

This instruction is the first error assigned to the charge. That the issues raised by the pleadings were correctly stated is perfectly plain. In our examination of the voluminous pleas, replications, rejoinders and surrejoinders, we have been unable to find any other, either tendered or accepted. But it is said the court erred in the instruction that, if either of the issues was found for the plaintiff, he was entitled to recover. The argument is that, even if there was a failure of consideration for the $4,500 draft, if the bank did not get for it all it was agreed it should have, the evidence was that the bank subsequently obtained $4,000 as fruits of Charles H. Hall's draft for $5,000 of even date therewith, a part of the proceeds of the discount whereof was the draft attempted to be set off. To understand this, it is necessary to look at the evidence. The $4,500 draft was given as part of the proceeds of a discount of Charles H. Hall's draft for $5,000. Both were dated March 16, 1869. The evidence tended to show that, when the $5,000 draft was offered for discount, Hall stated falsely that former drafts drawn by him upon the defendants, amounting to $12,000 or $13,000, had been accepted, and that collaterals had been put up to secure their payment; that he had grain in value equal to or exceeding $20,000, and that he engaged the $5,000 draft would be accepted and secured by collaterals; that such was his arrangement with the defendants. On the faith of these representations and assurances, the $5,000 draft was discounted, and the bank's draft for $4,500 was given on account. The former drafts had in fact not been accepted. Collaterals for acceptance had not been put up. Charles H. Hall had the day previous sold his grain, much less in value than he had stated, and the $5,000 draft was dishonored. It was not accepted, and collaterals were not put up for it. Had these been all the facts in evidence, the charge would have been strictly correct. What the bank gave its $4,500 draft for was not the draft it got, but that draft to be accepted and secured by collaterals; and when the defendants refused to accept the $5,000 draft, and put up collaterals, the consideration for the bank's draft failed. This would appear very plainly if Hall had himself sued the bank as drawer of the $4,500 bill. It cannot be pretended for a moment that he could maintain such a suit in the face of such a state of facts. And why not? Obviously for the reason that he failed to give the consideration for the bank's contract which he agreed to give. In other words, because, as between him and the bank, the consideration of the latter's contract had failed or been withheld. And if he could not enforce the bank's contract, certainly the defendants cannot, if at the time they took the draft they knew of the agreement between the drawer and the payee, and knew of the stipulated consideration, or knew of the fraud. And such was substantially the charge to the jury. But the judge overlooked, or did not notice, the subsequent recovery by the bank of $4,000, by suit upon the $5,000 draft, of which there was some evidence. It is true, no point was made of this in the court below. The circuit judge was not asked to instruct the jury as to the effect of a subsequent recovery of a part of the $5,000 draft, if there ever was such a recovery, and there was no averment in the pleadings that the bank or the plaintiff had ever obtained anything in virtue of that draft. And even if the bank did obtain $4,000 by suit upon Hall's draft, some time after it was discounted, there was still a failure of consideration for the bank's draft to the extent of $1,000; and for this reason the plaintiff, if either of the issues was found in his favor, was entitled to a verdict, so far as the consideration had failed. The instruction complained of, therefore, so far as it was given, was correct. If the defendants desired further instruction respecting the extent of the recovery, it was their duty to ask it. We think, however, the general effect of the charge must have been misleading. It tended to withdraw from the notice of the jury the evidence that the failure of consideration for the bank's draft was only partial. Had the bank made no use of the $5,000 draft, had there been no suit upon it, and no collection of any part of the sum mentioned in it, the jury would have been justified in finding a total failure of consideration for the instrument which the defendant sought to set off. But if Hall's draft has yielded $4,000 to the bank, though that was not the consideration stipulated for, it cannot be said that the consideration of the $4,500 draft has wholly failed. The bank cannot derive a benefit from Hall's draft, and at the same time insist that it got nothing for its own draft. This view of the case, we think, should have been presented to the jury, as bearing upon the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, if the issues, or either of them, were found for him.

We find no other error in the charge. Nor was there any material error in the admission of evidence. There was evidence from which the jury might have inferred that Hall, the defendants, and McAfee were acting in concert, having a common purpose to obtain drafts from the bank, and to cover up Hall's property so that the bank could not reach it. If such was the fact, the acts and declarations of Hall and McAfee in furtherance of the common design were evidence against the defendants. And if that was not so, Hall's declarations and acts were evidence to show his fraud in obtaining the bank draft, and McAfee's declarations were evidence of his fraudulent concert with Hall. Proof of Hall's fraud was legitimate, for it was a protection to the plaintiff, if knowledge of it was brought home to the defendants. The objection to the proof of the contents of the letter from the defendants to Charles H. Hall would be serious, if the letter as proved by the witness could have had any injurious effect upon the defendants' case. But we do not perceive that it could have had any injurious bearing.

It has been assigned for error that the court gave to the plaintiff the opening and close of the argument to the jury. The assignment cannot be sustained. Under the pleadings the affirmative of the issues framed was upon the plaintiff. He was, therefore, entitled to the conclusion. But if he was not, the decision of the court awarding it to him is not a subject that will be reviewed here.

§ 1475. Refusal to award new trial not reviewable.

The motion for an arrest of judgment was properly overruled. It rested upon no substantial basis, and the refusal to grant a new trial is not assignable in error, as we have often said heretofore.

But, for the error in the charge which we have noticed, the judgment must be reversed.

§ 1476. Duress.—The fact that a note was obtained from the maker by duress does not affect it in the hands of an innocent holder. McClintick v. Johnston, 1 McL., 414.

§ 1477. A., on a requisition from the governor of Pennsylvania, arrested and imprisoned B., in Indiana, for larceny. While in prison a note was given A. by B., C. becoming surety thereon. B. was then released, on the ground that the state of Pennsylvania had provided no means of carrying him back to Pennsylvania. It not appearing that the imprisonment was unlawful, nor that B. was detained until he executed the note, and there being no agreement that on executing the note B. should be released, held, no duress either as to the principal or the surety — especially as the latter signed the note deliberately, and received at the same time an indemnity for the liability he incurred. McClintick v. Cummins, * 3 McL., 158.

§ 1478. Defense of fraud generally.—Fraud may be set up as a defense by the maker against the payee of a note, or an assignee with notice, or one who took the note after maturity or without paying a consideration for it. But it cannot be set up against a bona fide indorsee for value and without notice. Slacom v. Wishart, * 3 McL., 517.

§ 1483. Fraud in inception.— Where a negotiable instrument is originally infected with fraud, invalidity or illegality, the rule is that the title of the original holder being destroyed, the title of every subsequent holder which reposes upon that foundation, and no other, falls with it. Commissioners v. Clark, 4 Otto, 278.

§ 1484. The amount of a bill of exchange given for the purchase price of a prize of war landed and sold in a neutral port may be recovered by the plaintiff (the captor), although the cargo was wrecked and landed at the neutral port by collusion of the captor and the purchaser (defendant), in order to avoid towing it to the captor's own country, at the risk of recapture, for regular condemnation and sale. Although such collusive wrecking and sale might be a fraud upon the courts of the captor's country, it was held not to be such an illegality as vitiated the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant. Hopner v. Appleby, 5 Mason, 71.

§ 1485. If a maker, when sued upon a note, shows that it was fraudulently obtained, this throws suspicion on the note, and plaintiff, an assignee, must then show that he received the note in due course of business, and paid for it a valuable consideration. McClintick v. Cummins,* 2 McL., 98.

§ 1486. Fraud of agent; charging upon principal.— In an action to subject directors to liability on notes of their bank, a plea which avers a fraudulent issue of said notes by one G., but which does not aver that G. was agent of the bank or the directors, and does not in any wise connect them with the fraud, nor show that the plaintiff was not a bona fide purchaser, is no defense. White v. How, 8 McL., 291.

§ 1487. County order.— An order drawn by the county supervisors upon the county treasurer, payable to A. or bearer, with interest, is an evidence of indebtedness which can only be set aside by showing fraud in the county officers,— and no proof of acceptance or notice is necessary. Lyell v. Supervisors of Lapeer Co., 6 McL., 446.

6. Forgery.

SUMMARY — Forged indorsement, §§ 1488, 1489. — Discount of note with knowledge of forgery, § 1489. — Forged bill of lading, § 1490.

§ 1488. As a general rule a forged indorsement of a bill conveys no title to it; the indorsee cannot recover of the acceptors, and if the latter pay the bill and subsequently discover that the indorsement was forged, they can recover the money paid to the indorsee. But if the drawer puts the bill in circulation, with the indorsement of the payee forged, and it comes into the hands of an innocent holder, and he is paid the amount of the bill by the drawee, the latter cannot recover from him the money paid. The fact that the drawer put the bill in circulation after the forgery authorizes the persons who take it to receive the money notwithstanding the forgery. Hortsmann v. Henshaw, § 1491. See § 42.

§ 1489. A. made a note payable to B., forged B.'s indorsement of it, and the C. Bank discounted it with knowledge of the forgery. Held, that the bank might sue the maker in the name of the payee for its use, notwithstanding the forgery; that A.'s partner could not urge the forgery as a defense to a suit against him and A. on the note, it having been made by A. within the scope of his authority as a partner. York Bank v. Asbury, §§ 1492-1496.

§ 1490. Where an acceptor of a bill of exchange drawn upon a bill of lading, with the bill of lading attached, pays the same to a payee or holder for value and without notice, he cannot recover the payment from such payee or holder, or have any recourse against him, although the bill of lading proves to have been forged. Hoffman v. Bank of Milwaukee, §§ 1497, 1498.

HORTSMAN v. HENSHAW.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Massachusetts.

Opinion by TANEY, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The material facts in this case may be stated in a few words. Fiske and Bradford, a mercantile firm in Boston, drew their bill of exchange upon Hortzman, of London, payable at sixty days' sight to the order of Fiske and Bridge, for £642. The drawers, or one of them, placed the bill in the hands of a broker, with the names of the payees indorsed upon it, to be negotiated; and it was sold to the defendants in error bona fide and for full value. They transmitted it to their correspondent in London, and, upon presentation, it was accepted by the drawee, and duly paid at maturity. The payees and indorsees all resided in Boston, where the bill was drawn and negotiated. It turned out that the indorsement of the payees was forged,—by whom does not appear; and a few months after the bill was paid the drawers failed and became insolvent. The drawee, having discovered the forgery, brought this action against the defendants in error to recover back the money he had paid them.

§ 1491. Rights of one who takes a bill upon a forged indorsement.

The precise question which this case presents does not appear to have arisen in the English courts, nor in any of the courts of this country, with the exception of a single case, to which we shall hereafter more particularly refer. But the established principles of commercial law in relation to bills of exchange leave no difficulty in deciding the question. The general rule undoubtedly is, that the drawee, by accepting the bill, admits the handwriting of the drawer, but not of the indorsers. And the holder is bound to know that the previous indorsements, including that of the payee, are in the handwriting of the parties whose names appear upon the bill, or were duly authorized by them. And if it should appear that one of them is forged, he cannot recover against the acceptor, although the forged name was on the bill at the time of the acceptance. And if he has received the money from the acceptor, and the forgery is afterwards discovered, he will be compelled to repay it. The reason of the rule is obvious. A forged indorsement cannot transfer any interest in the bill, and the holder, therefore, has no right to demand the money. If the bill is dishonored by the drawee, the drawer is not responsible. And if the drawee pays it to a person not authorized to receive the money, he cannot claim credit for it in his account with the drawer. But in this case the bill was put in circulation by the drawers, with the names of the payees indorsed upon it. And by doing so they must be understood as affirming that the indorsement is in the handwriting of the payees, or written by their authority. And if the drawee had dishonored the bill, the indorser would undoubtedly have been entitled to recover from the drawer. The drawers must be equally liable to the acceptor who paid the bill. For, having admitted the handwriting of the payees, and precluded themselves from disputing it, the bill was paid by the acceptor to the persons authorized to receive the money, according to the drawer's own order. Now the acceptor of a bill is presumed to accept upon funds of the drawer in his hands, and he is precluded by his acceptance from averring the contrary in a suit brought against him by the holder. The rights of the parties are therefore to be determined as if this bill was paid by Hortzman out of the money of Fiske and Bradford in his hands. And as Fiske and Bradford:

were liable to the defendants in error, they are entitled to retain the money they have thus received. We take the rule to be this: Whenever the drawer is liable to the holder the acceptor is entitled to a credit if he pays the money; and he is bound to pay upon his acceptance when the payment will entitle him to a credit in his account with the drawer. And if he accepts without funds, upon the credit of the drawer, he must look to him for indemnity, and cannot, upon that ground, defend himself against a bona fide indorsee. The insolvency of the drawer can make no difference in the rights and legal liabilities of the parties. The English cases most analogous to this are those in which the names of the drawers or payees were fictitious, and the indorsement written by the maker of the bill. And in such cases it has been held that the acceptor is liable, although, as the payees were fictitious persons, their handwriting, of course, could not be proved by the holder. 10 Barn. & Cress., 478. The American case to which we referred is that of Meachim v. Fort, 3 Hill (S. C.), 227. The same question now before the court arose in that case, and was decided in conformity with this opinion.

Another question was raised in the argument upon the sufficiency of the notice; and it was insisted by the counsel for the defendants, that, if they could have been made liable to this action by the plaintiff, they have been discharged by his laches in ascertaining the forgery and giving them notice of it. But it is not necessary to examine this question, as the point already decided decides the case. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, with costs.

YORK BANK v. ASBURY.

(Circuit Court for Ohio: 1 Bissell, 280-287. 1858.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Asbury & Pierce were partners in the cattle business. Pierce, being in Pennsylvania, agreed with the York Bank that it should discount his firm's note for $4,000, payable in sixty days to Cyrus Milner & Co., and indorsed by Samuel Milner and Amos Carter. This note was to be paid by another note for $4,000, indorsed by the same parties and payable in Philadelphia. All of this was without the knowledge of Asbury. The first note was discounted and at maturity paid with a second note payable to Amos Carter and indorsed by Cyrus Milner & Co. and Samuel Milner. Pierce forged the name of Amos Carter, the payee, and then gave the note to the bank—the forgery being known to the bank, which, when the note matured, brought suit upon it against Asbury & Pierce, in a court of the state of Ohio, and recovered judgment thereon. This action is assumpsit for $4,000, money lent. Pierce being in California, process was served upon Asbury alone, who sets up the foregoing facts by a special plea of res judicata, to which the York Bank, plaintiff, demurs.

Opinion by McLEAN, J.

This demurrer raises the question whether the above judgment is a bar to the present action. In support of the demurrer it is argued the note was made by Asbury to Amos Carter, or order, and that the indorsement of Carter was forged, of which Asbury was not privy, and that the court of common pleas held that Carter had neither paid anything for the note, nor indorsed it; that Asbury was not concluded by the felonious act of Pierce; that the bank was without remedy on the note against the firm.

§ 1492. A maker who forges the name of the payee may be sued on the note.

It may be admitted that the bank could not claim under the forged indorsement, nor was the action brought in that form. Carter being the payee of the note, the action was brought in his name, as payee, for the benefit of the bank; and no sufficient reason is perceived why this was not properly done. The bank received this note in payment of the first one discounted, of the same amount, which was a full consideration. The forgery did not affect the drawers on the paper, nor the obligations they assumed. It was treated as a genuine note, payable to Carter, for the benefit of the bank. And this was the true character of the note, before the indorsement, under the contract with the bank; and the indorsement being void, after the payment of the money, the bank held the note for its security and benefit. The facts stated in the plea are admitted by the demurrer. The note was made payable to the order of Amos Carter, and without his indorsement the other indorsers, it is supposed, could not be held responsible; but the drawers of the note, who received the money for their own benefit, could be sued in the name of Carter for the use of the bank. The drawers promised to pay him or order; and it is averred that Carter well knew the suit was prosecuted, but made no objection to it. Under the circumstances, the court would protect the bank in the use of his name, requiring it to indemnify him as to the costs. If the court of common pleas, of Madison county, erred in their decision on any point, it was the duty of the bank to remove the case by appeal or writ of error to the supreme court, and have the error corrected. Asbury, it is said, was not concluded by the felonious act of Pierce. This may be admitted; but, as one of the partners, it is not disputed that he had the right to draw the note and negotiate it; and although he was estopped from denying the indorsement of Carter, such indorsement could, in no respect, affect the rights of Asbury. If the maker of a note make it payable to a fictitious person, and puts it in circulation with the fictitious name written on it; or if he make it payable to a real person and forge the indorsement, or procure it to be done, and then put it in circulation, he is estopped from saying that it was not genuine. Riley's Law Cas., 248; Meacher v. Fort, 3 Hill (S. C.), 227. In England it has been held that a bill drawn payable to a fictitious payee is payable to bearer, and may be declared on as such in favor of a bona fide holder ignorant of the fact. Chitty on Bills, 10 Amer. ed., 157. Whether Carter had paid anything or not for the bill was a matter of no importance, as it was made to obtain money from the bank, and the suit was brought for its benefit.

§ 1493. Action on note bars a suit on the original cause of action against the same parties.

But it is contended that the judgment in the Madison court of common pleas is no bar to the action of the bank, as to constitute a bar the former action must not only be for the same cause of action, but between the same parties. And it is insisted the action of Carter was on his title as indorser; the present action being for the money originally advanced by the bank to Pierce and Asbury. The former action was not brought by Carter as indorser, but by the bank in his name as the payee of the note, for its benefit, the drawers having promised to pay him. Whether the cause of action was the same in the former action as in the present is matter of fact and law. The present action is brought on general counts for money, claiming $5,000. The former action was brought on the note for $4,000 signed by Pierce and Asbury. But the special plea in bar states in detail the former action in the name of Carter for the use of the bank to be the same cause of action as the present, and this is admitted by the demurrer. And on this the issue of law is raised whether the facts stated in the plea constitute a bar to the present action.

The judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the case before it is final between the litigant parties. And this is true whether the parties have used the proper vigilance or not to bring the entire equity before the court and jury. No defect of either party in this respect can avail him, under a plea in bar. If it be the same subject matter of controversy, if it was fully brought before the court and jury, or might have been so brought before them, the judgment is final. Negligence or want of knowledge in the management of the case by the counsel or party will constitute no excuse. If, on such ground, a judgment could be regarded as not final, it would destroy its effect and make litigation endless. Where injustice has been done, a motion for a new trial, appeal or writ of error is the only corrective at law. The suit brought by the bank in the name of Carter, for its benefit, as appears from the facts admitted in the special plea, brought into litigation the second note given to the bank by Pierce and Asbury, and which, on proof of the facts, entitled the bank to a recovery; nor can it be doubted that it was the same subject matter involved in the present suit. That such a trial and judgment is final between the parties is clearly shown by the authorities cited in the defendants' brief. LeGuen v. Gouverneur, 1 Johns. Cas., 436; Baker v. Rand, 13 Barb., 152, 160; Lawrence v. Hunt, 10 Wend., 81; Wood v. Jackson, 8 id., 10; Ehle v. Bingham, 7 Barb., 494; Dunckle v. Wiles, 6 Barb., 515; Birckhead v. Brown, 5 Sandf., 135; Miller v. Manice, 6 Hill, 114; Rose v. Turnpike Co., 3 Watts, 46; Hughes v. Blake, 1 Mason, 515; Greenl. on Ev., §§ 522, 528. The bank was substantially a party in the first suit. The suit was brought for its benefit and was under its control, and its right so to prosecute the suit would, if objected to, have been protected by the court. The bank was a party within the rule which requires a judgment to be between the same parties, to constitute a bar. 1 Greenl. on Ev., 523; Tuttle v. Wilson, 10 Ohio, 24. Where a suit is brought for the use of another, a second action cannot be sustained for the same cause. The case of McDonald v. Rainor, 8 Johns., 412, seems to have no application to the case under consideration. In that case the payee sued the maker of a note who pleaded that the payee had indorsed the note, and the indorsee sued the defendant, who defeated the suit on an objection to the assignment. This was pleaded in bar by the same defendant in a suit by the payee; but it was held that a defect in the assignment, on which the assignee failed, did not bar the suit by the payee, which did not involve the assignment. For the reasons assigned, the demurrer to this plea must be overruled.

§ 1494. Exchange to be added to interest will not necessarily make a note usurious.

The second special plea is usury. The bank is alleged to be located at the town of York, in York county, Pennsylvania; that by the terms of its charter it is prohibited from taking more than at the rate of one-half of one per centum for thirty days upon a loan. And it is averred that for many years before the time of the loan, the rate of money exchange between the town of York and the city of Philadelphia was and has been in favor of Philadelphia, and against the town of York, varying in amount from one-quarter of one per centum to one-half of one per centum; all which was known to the York Bank; and that as a scheme and device for the unlawful taking of more than at the rate of one-half of one per centum, for thirty days, it was agreed by the bank to loan Asbury and Pierce the sum of $4,000; and for the forbearance of the loan, that they should give their note for the above sum, indorsed and payable at the bank in sixty days, reserving $42 of interest; and when that note matured the said Asbury and Pierce, as had been agreed, paid the bank, by way of renewal of the same, the sum of $62 in money, and gave another note for the sum of $4,000, payable at the Western Bank of Philadelphia, in ninety days from date, which is the note on which the first suit was brought. The usury, as alleged in the plea, consists in agreeing to make the payment at the Philadelphia Bank, the exchange on which was worth from one-quarter to one-half per centum, at the York Bank. The exchange here spoken of must mean on sight bills, and can have no reference to a bill payable in ninety days. It is not alleged that more than six per cent. was reserved as interest, but this difference of exchange being added to the interest reserved or paid, makes the usury, and was a device adopted for that purpose. An agreement to pay the first note when due, in a note for the same amount payable at Philadelphia, or on the second discount to pay the note when due at the Philadelphia Bank, does not constitute usury. It is true, the plea alleges a corrupt agreement for the loan, but from the facts stated there was no such agreement. If the agreement had been that the difference of exchange proved should be added to the interest, and the payment made at the York Bank, it would have been usurious, and a device to cover the usury. But on a transaction to pay in ninety days the amount at the Philadelphia Bank, without showing that bills on that bank at ninety days commanded a premium at York, the court will not presume usury. Such a contingency cannot be incorporated with the contract to pay, so as to make it usurious.

To constitute usury there must be a loan of money, and for the forbearance, a corrupt agreement to pay more than the legal rate of interest. In the case under consideration, there was a loan of money, but there was no agreement that more than the legal rate of interest should be paid. The payment was to be made at a bank in Philadelphia, on which, at the York Bank, sight bills generally sold at from one-quarter to one-half per centum advance; but whether a bill would sell at an advance payable in ninety days is not shown. A contract must be usurious at the time it is entered into, or it cannot become so by any future contingency. The corrupt intent must be apparent on the face of the contract; or at least it must contain all the elements to make it usurious. It is believed that the books furnish no instance of a contract which might or might not become usurious, according to circumstances, at the time of payment.

The plea not only sets up the usury on the ground stated, but it alleges that the charter prohibits the bank from receiving more than at the rate of six per centum, and that on this ground the contract is void. These two defenses united in the same plea make it double, and consequently bad, on special demurrer. A general demurrer only has been filed, on which no advantage can be taken of this defect in the plea. But, aside from this consideration, the want of sufficient averments to show the usury is fatal. It must appear that more than at the rate of six per cent. was charged in violation of the charter.

It may be a convenience to the debtor to pay the amount in Philadelphia, rather than the York Bank. And a fair presumption arises that this would be the case with cattle dealers, who generally sell at the large cities.

The demurrer is sustained to the second special plea.

HOFFMAN v. BANK OF MILWAUKEE.

(12 Wallace, 181-193. 1870.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Wisconsin.

§ 1497. Acceptor's liability generally.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Acceptors of a bill of exchange, by the act of acceptance, admit the genuineness of the signatures of the drawers, and the competency of the drawers to assume that responsibility. Such an act imports an engagement, on the part of the acceptor, to the payee or other lawful holder of the bill, to pay the same if duly presented, when it becomes due, according to the tenor of the acceptance. He engages to pay the holder, whether payee or indorsee, the full amount of the bill at maturity, and if he does not, the holder has a right of action against him, and he may also have one against the drawer. Drawers of bills of exchange, however, are not liable to the holder, under such circumstances, until it appears that the bill was duly presented, and that the acceptor refused or neglected to pay the same according to the tenor of the instrument, as their liability is contingent and subject to those conditions precedent.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Three bills of exchange, as exhibited in the record, were drawn by Chapin, Miles & Co., payable to the order of the defendants, and the record shows that they, the defendants, received and discounted the three bills at the request of the drawers. Attached to each bill of exchange was a bill of lading for two hundred barrels of flour, shipped, as therein represented, by the drawers of the bills of exchange, and consigned to the plaintiffs; and the record also shows that the drawers, in each case, sent a letter of advice to the consignees apprising them of the shipment, and that they would draw on them as such consignees for the respective amounts specified in the several bills of exchange. Prompt reply in each case was communicated by the plaintiffs, acknowledging the receipt of the letter of advice sent by the shippers, and promising to honor the bills of exchange, as therein requested. Evidence was also introduced by the plaintiffs showing that the defendants indorsed the bills of exchange and forwarded the same, with the bills of lading attached, to the National Park Bank of the city of New York, their regular correspondent; that the same were subsequently indorsed by the latter bank, and forwarded to the Commonwealth Bank of Philadelphia for collection; that the Commonwealth Bank presented the bills of exchange, with the bills of lading attached, to the plaintiffs, as the acceptors, and that they paid the respective amounts as they had previously promised to do, and that the Commonwealth Bank remitted the proceeds in each case to the National Park Bank, where the respective amounts were credited to the defendants. Proof was also introduced by the plaintiffs showing that each of the bills of lading was a forgery, and that the plaintiffs, before the commencement of the suit, tendered the same and the bills of exchange to the defendants, and that they demanded of the defendants, at the same time, the respective amounts so paid by them to the Commonwealth Bank. Payment as demanded being refused, the plaintiffs brought an action of assumpsit against the defendants for money had and received, claiming to recover back the several amounts so paid as money paid by mistake, but the verdict and judgment were for the defendants, and the plaintiffs sued out a writ of error, and removed the cause into this court. Testimony was also introduced by the defendants tending to show that the shippers were millers; that they made an arrangement with the plaintiffs to ship flour to them at Philadelphia for sale in that market, the plaintiffs agreeing that they, the shippers, might draw on them for advances on the flour, to be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the sales; that for more than a year they had been in the habit of shipping flour to the plaintiffs under that arrangement, and of negotiating drafts on the plaintiffs to the banks in that city, accompanied by bills of lading in form like those given in evidence in this case; that the drafts, with the bills of lading attached, were sent forward by the banks, where the same were discounted, and that the same were paid by the plaintiffs; that the drawers of the drafts in every case notified the plaintiffs of the same, and that the plaintiffs, as in this case, answered the letter of advice and promised to pay the amount. They also proved that the drawers of the drafts in this case informed their cashier that the same would always be drawn upon property, and that the bills of lading would accompany the drafts, and that they had no knowledge or intimation that the bills of lading were not genuine. Instructions were requested by the plaintiffs, that if the jury found that the respective bills of lading were not genuine, that they were entitled to recover the several amounts paid to the Commonwealth Bank, with interest; but the court refused to give the instruction as prayed, and instructed the jury that if they found the facts as shown by the defendants, the plaintiffs could not recover in the case, even though they should find that the several bills of lading were a forgery.

Money paid under a mistake of facts, it is said, may be recovered back as having been paid without consideration, but the decisive answer to that suggestion, as applied to the case before the court, is that money paid, as in this case, by the acceptor of a bill of exchange to the payee of the same, or to a subsequent indorsee, in discharge of his legal obligation as such, is not a payment by mistake nor without consideration, unless it be shown that the instrument was fraudulent in its inception or that the consideration was illegal, or that the facts and circumstances which impeach the transaction as between the acceptor and the drawer were known to the payee or subsequent indorsee at the time he became the holder of the instrument. Fitch v. Jones, 5 Ell. & Bl., 238; Arbouin v. Anderson, 1 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 498; Smith v. Braine, 16 id., N. S., 244; Hall v. Featherstone, 3 Hurlst. & N., 287. Such an instrument, as between the payee and the acceptor, imports a sufficient consideration, and in a suit by the former against the latter the defense of prior equities, as between the acceptor and the drawer, is not open unless it be shown that the payee, at the time he became the holder of the instrument, had knowledge of those facts and circumstances.

Attempt is made in argument to show that the plaintiffs accepted the bills of exchange upon the faith and security of the bills of lading attached to the same at the time the bills of exchange were discounted by the defendants. Suppose it was so, which is not satisfactorily proved, still it is not perceived that the concession, if made, would benefit the plaintiffs, as the bills of exchange are in the usual form and contain no reference whatever to the bills of lading, and it is not pretended that the defendants had any knowledge or intimation that the bills of lading were not genuine, nor is it pretended that they made any representation upon the subject to induce the plaintiffs to contract any such liability. They received the bills of exchange in the usual course of their business as a bank of discount and paid the full amount of the net proceeds of the same to the drawers, and it is not even suggested that any act of the defendants, except the indorsement of the bills of exchange in the usual course of their business, operated to the prejudice of the plaintiffs or prevented them from making an earlier discovery of the true character of the transaction. On the contrary, it distinctly appears that the drawers of the bills of exchange were the regular correspondents of the plaintiffs, and that they became the acceptors of the bills of exchange at the request of the drawers of the same, and upon their representations that the flour mentioned in the bills of lading had been shipped to their firm for sale under the arrangement before described. Beyond doubt the bills of lading gave some credit to the bills of exchange beyond what was created by the pecuniary standing of the parties to the same, but it is clear that they are not a part of those instruments, nor are they referred to either in the body of the bills or in the acceptance, and they cannot be regarded in any more favorable light for the plaintiffs than as collateral security accompanying the bills of exchange.

Sent forward, as the bills of lading were, with the bills of exchange, it is beyond question that the property in the same passed to the acceptors when they paid the several amounts therein specified, as the lien, if any, in favor of the defendants was then displaced, and the plaintiffs became entitled to the instruments as the muniments of title to the flour shipped to them for sale, and as security for the money which they had advanced under the arrangement between them and the drawers of the bills of exchange. Proof, therefore, that the bills of lading were forgeries could not operate to discharge the liability of the plaintiffs, as acceptors, to pay the amounts to the payees or their indorsees, as the payees were innocent holders, having paid value for the same in the usual course of business. Leather v. Simpson, Law Rep., 11 Eq., 393. Different rules apply between the immediate parties to a bill of exchange — as between the drawer and the acceptor, or between the payee and the drawer — as the only consideration as between those parties is that which moves from the plaintiff to the defendant; and the rule is, if that consideration fails, proof of that fact is a good defense to the action. But the rule is otherwise between the remote parties to the bill, as, for example, between the payee and the acceptor, or between the indorsee and the acceptor, as two distinct considerations come in question in every such case where the payee or indorsee became the holder of the bill before it was overdue and without any knowledge of the facts and circumstances which impeach the title as between the immediate parties to the instrument. Those two considerations are as follows: First, that which the defendant received for his liability, and secondly, that which the plaintiff gave for his title; and the rule is well settled that the action between the remote parties to the bill will not be defeated unless there be an absence or failure of both these considerations. Robinson v. Reynolds, 2 Q. B., 202; Same v. Same, in error, id., 210; Byles on Bills (5th Am. ed.), 124; Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt, 1 Dæ G., F. & J., Ch. App., 10.

Unless both considerations fail in a suit by the payee against the acceptor, it is clear that the action may be maintained, and many decided cases affirm the rule, where the suit is in the name of a remote indorsee against the acceptor, that if any intermediate holder between the defendant and the plaintiff gave value for the bill, such an intervening consideration will sustain the title of the plaintiff. Hunter v. Wilson, 4 Exch., 489; Boyd v. McCann, 10 Md., 118; Howell v. Crane, 12 La. Ann., 126; Watson v. Flanagan, 14 Tex., 354. Where it was arranged between a drawer and his correspondent that the latter would accept his bills in consideration of produce to be shipped or transported to the acceptor for sale, the supreme court of Pennsylvania held (Craig v. Sibbett, 15 Penn. St., 240) that the acceptor was bound to the payee by his general acceptance of a bill, although it turned out that the bill of lading forwarded at the same time with the bill of exchange was fraudulent, it not being shown the payee of the bill was privy to the fraud. Evidence was introduced in that case showing that the payee knew what the terms of the arrangement between the drawer and the payee were, but the court held that mere knowledge of that fact was not sufficient to constitute a defense, as the payee was not a party to the arrangement and was not in any respect a surety for the good faith and fair dealing of the shipper. Failure of consideration, as between the drawer and acceptor of a bill of exchange, is no defense to an action brought by the payee against the acceptor, if the acceptance was unconditional in its terms, and it appears that the plaintiff paid value for the bill, even though the acceptor was defrauded by the drawer, unless it be shown that the payee had knowledge of the fraudulent acts of the drawer before he paid such value and became the holder of the instrument. United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet., 393 (§§ 127-134, supra). Testimony to show that the payees were not bona fide holders of the bills would be admissible in a suit by them against the acceptors, and would constitute, if believed, a good defense, but the evidence in this case does not show that they did anything that is not entirely sanctioned by commercial usage. They discounted these bills and they had a right to present them for acceptance, and having obtained the acceptance they have an undoubted right to apply the proceeds collected from the acceptors to their own indemnity. Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt, 1 De G., F. & J., Ch. App., 10; Robinson v. Reynolds, 2 Q. B., 211.

Forgery of the bills of lading would be a good defense to an action on the bills if the defendants in this case had been the drawers, but they were the payees and holders for value in the regular course of business, and the case last referred to, which was decided in the exchequer chamber, shows that such an acceptance binds the acceptor conclusively as between them and every bona fide holder for value. Very many cases decide that the drawee of a bill of exchange is bound to know the handwriting of his correspondent, the drawer, and that if he accepts or pays a bill in the hands of a bona fide holder for value he is concluded by the act, although the bill turns out to be a forgery. If he has accepted he must pay, and if he has paid he cannot recover the money back, as the money, in such a case, is paid in pursuance of a legal obligation as understood in the commercial law. Goddard v. Merchants' Bank, 4 Comst., 149; Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 3 id., 234; Bank of United States v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat., 348; Price v. Neal, 3 Burr., 1355. Difficulty sometimes arises in determining whether the plaintiff, in an action on a bill of exchange, is the immediate promisee of the defendant, or whether he is to be regarded as a remote party, but it is settled law that the payee, where he discounts the bill at the request of the drawer, is regarded as a stranger to the acceptor in respect to the consideration for the acceptance; consequently, if the acceptance is absolute in its terms, and the bill is received in good faith and for value, it is no answer to an action by him that the defendant received no consideration for his acceptance, or that the consideration therefor has failed; and it is immaterial in that behalf whether the bill was accepted while in the hands of the drawer and at his request, or whether it had passed into the hands of the payee before acceptance and was accepted at his request. Parsons on Bills, 179; Munroe v. Bordier, 8 C. B., 862.

Certain other defenses, such as that the payments were voluntarily made, and that the title to the bills at the time the payments were made was in the National Park Bank, were also set up by the defendants, but the court does not find it necessary to examine those matters, as they are of the opinion that the payments, if made to the payees of the bills, as contended by the plaintiffs, were made in pursuance of a legal obligation, and that the money cannot be recovered back.

Judgment affirmed.

§ 1499. Government paying forged draft; delay.—Where the United States paid a draft drawn upon it, and it afterwards appeared that it was forged, and the government did not sue to recover the money paid for six years, held, a delay fatal to the government's action. United States v. Cook,* 16 Int. Rev. Rec., 148.

§ 1500. Check; forged indorsement.—Where a check was paid upon a forged indorsement of the payee's name, and a credit entered to the bank in a settlement between the bank and the drawer, of the amount of the check, neither such payment nor credit amounts to a legal payment of the check, or to an acceptance or promise to pay it. First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 4 Otto, 343; 15 Alb. L. J., 392 (§§ 345-348).

§ 1501. When the United States government pays a check upon a forged indorsement, it is bound to give notice of the forgery within a reasonable time after it takes the check, and its failure to give such notice and make claim for the value of the check amounts to negligence which will bar a recovery. "No good reason can be assigned for relieving the government, when dealing with commercial paper, from observance of the rules respecting vigilance which are enforced against individuals." Per Cadwallader, J. United States v. Central Nat. Bank,* 6 Fed. R., 184.

§ 1502. Innocent holder; passing forged note; liability.—If the innocent bona fide holder of a forged note which he has received for a valuable consideration passes it to another innocent person, bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, without indorsing it, although not liable upon the note, he is liable for the amount he has received for it, provided the other party has not been guilty of such negligence as would deprive the person from whom he received the note of his remedy against prior parties who might be liable to him, and has given notice and offered to return the forged paper in a reasonable time. Semmes v. Wilson,* 5 Cr. C. C., 285.

§ 1503. Knowledge of forgery; proof of original cause of action.—It is not necessary to prove that one who passes a forged note knew it to be forged, or that he passed it fraudulently. One who takes such paper in payment for goods sold may sue on the original cause of action without making such proof. Ibid.

§ 1504. Money paid on forged note; recovery.—In order to recover money paid on a forged note it is only necessary to show that it is forged. It need not, as against an indorser, be shown that suit has been brought against the apparent maker. Ibid.

§ 1505. Liability of carrier of forged paper.—A. fraudulently obtained possession of B.'s promissory note, payable in three months. After changing it to a two months note A. delivered it to an express company, to be taken to a distant bank and discounted, and the proceeds returned to him. A. at the same time represented himself as B., and wrote a letter to the bank, to which he signed B.'s name, directing that the proceeds be returned by the carrier, and sent the letter by the carrier to be delivered with the note to the bank. The note was discounted and the proceeds, minus express charges, delivered to the express company in a package addressed to B., but the company delivered it to A. Held, that the note by its alteration became forged and was not binding upon B., and that the express company were not responsible for its genuineness. Norwalk Bank v. Adams Express Co., 4 Blatch., 455.

§ 1506. Payment in forged notes.—Bank A. paid Bank B. in the forged notes of the latter, neither bank knowing at the time that the notes were forged, and Bank B. accepted the notes as its own. Held, that it could not set up the forgery and payment as a defense against a suit by Bank A. for a balance due it upon general account. United States Bank v. Bank of Georgia, 10 Wheat., 333.

§ 1507. Raised check.—Where the payee of a check took it to the teller of the bank upon which it was drawn to ascertain if it was good, and the teller said: "It is all right, send it through the clearing house," and it afterwards turned out that the check had been raised, and the payee's name forged, held, that in the absence of anything to direct the attention of the bank officer to other matters, he had a right to suppose that information was desired of him merely in regard to the signature of the drawers and the state of their account, and the answer he gave was held responsive only as to these two points, and did not relate either to the amount of the check or to the signature of the payee. A drawee of a check is under no obligation to give information as to the amount of the check or the signature of the payee. Espy v. Bank of Cincinnati, 18 Wall., 604. See BANKS, §§ 234-238.

§ 1508. It is no more incumbent on the bank than on the holder to ascertain from the maker of the check its general validity. Ibid.

§ 1509. A check drawn by Bank A. on Bank B. was fraudulently raised before being presented for certification. Bank B. certified that the check was "good." Held, that the certifying bank became primarily liable to any innocent holder thereof for the debt, which it had certified was "good." Louisiana Nat. Bank v. Citizens' Bank, * 13 Alb. L. J., 275.

§ 1510. Certificate of deposit.—Where a certificate of deposit was made payable to the order of the depositor, a person who could not write, and the bank issuing the certificate took a description of him and his mark, in their signature book, and afterwards the depositor lost the certificate and the finder presented it to another bank, representing himself as the person mentioned in the draft and said that he could not write, and the bank without any identification had him indorse the certificate by making his mark, held, that the second bank was guilty of negligence in not having the person presenting the certificate identified. State National Bank v. Freedmen's Savings and Trust Co., 2 Dill., 11. See BANKS, § 259.

7. Alteration.

SUMMARY — Instrument given to another for use; filling up blanks, § 1511. — Alteration as to time of payment, § 1512.

§ 1511. Where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to another for use, with blanks not filled up, such intrusting carries with it implied authority to fill up the blanks, but not to vary or alter the material terms of the instrument by erasures, or by interpolations repugnant to the purpose for which the instrument was intended. If such erasures or interpolations are made, it renders the instrument void even in the hands of an innocent holder. Thus an order to pay money "in drafts to the order of" was signed in blank and given to a person who erased the words "drafts to the order of" and inserted the words "current funds," and upon such order secured the money in cash and absconded. Held, that the interlineation was so plainly repugnant to the erased words that it amounted to sufficient notice to put the payer of the money upon inquiry, and rendered the order void. Angle v. N. W. Mutual Life Ins. Co., §§ 1513-1516.

§ 1512. The alteration of a note as to time of payment, without the knowledge or consent of the maker or indorsers, discharges them, although such alteration may postpone the maturity of the paper. The rules that where one of two innocent persons must suffer, he who has put it in the power of another to do the wrong, and that the holder of commercial paper taken in good faith in the ordinary course of business is unaffected by the latent infirmities of the security, have no application in such a case. Wood v. Steele, §§ 1517, 1518. See § 1519.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Iowa.

§ 1513. Fraudulent erasure and interlineation in filling blanks in negotiable instrument.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Persons dealing with an agent are entitled to the same protection as if dealing with the principal, to the extent that the agent acts within the scope of his authority. Pursuant to that rule, it is settled law, that where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to another for use as such, with blanks not filled up, such instrument so delivered carries on its face an implied authority to complete the same by filling up the blanks; but the authority implied from the existence of the blanks would not authorize the person intrusted with the instrument to vary or alter the material terms of the instrument by erasing what is written or printed as part of the same, nor to pervert the scope and meaning of the same by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to what was plainly and clearly expressed in the instrument before it was so delivered. By virtue of the implied authority, such a depository may perfect, in his discretion, what is incomplete, by filling the blanks; but he may not make a new instrument by erasing what is written or printed, nor by filling the blanks with stipulations repugnant to the plainly expressed intention of the same as shown by its written or printed terms. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 361 (§§ 420–425, supra); Bank v. Neal, 22 id., 108 (§§ 405–407, supra).

Much reference to the pleadings will be unnecessary, as the questions presented for decision arise chiefly out of the facts deducible from the proofs exhibited in the record. Suffice it to say, in that regard, that the suit was instituted by the complainant to procure a decree that the bond and mortgage and the two fire insurance policies described in the bill of complaint were delivered and assigned to the respondents without consideration, and to obtain a decree setting aside said bond and mortgage, and for a return of said policies, the same having been delivered to the respondents as additional security for a loan of $10,000, the proceeds of which never came to the hands of the complainant; and he charges that the proceeds of the loan were never forwarded to him by his authority; that if the insurance company ever paid the same in current funds to the person through whom the loan was negotiated upon any order signed by him, as pretended by the respondents, the order was forged by the party who presented it, or by some person interested, to cheat and defraud the complainant out of the money. Service was made, and the corporation respondents appeared and filed an answer, in which they allege that the bond, mortgage and fire policies were duly delivered to the company by the agent of the complainant; and they deny that the order for the payment of the proceeds of the loan was forged, and aver that they made the payment to the person who presented it, in good faith. Proofs were taken, and the court, having heard the parties, entered a decree dismissing the bill of complaint, and the complainant appealed to this court. Sufficient appears to show that the respondents are a corporation created by the laws of Wisconsin, and that they were doing a life insurance business throughout the northwestern states; and it also appeared that they were accustomed to loan money on real estate securities. Agents were appointed by the respondents, in the different states, whose duty it was to solicit applications for policies, and to transact other matters connected with their insurance business.

State agents were appointed by the company; but it is conceded that they in turn appointed sub-agents to perform the same duties, and it appears that the commissions for all such services were paid by the company to the state agents. Applications for loans of money were frequently made to the company through the state agents; and it appears that such agents of the company were furnished with blank forms for such applications, and for the appraisement of real estate intended as security for such loans. When an application for a loan was made, the blank forms were filled up by the agent. It was the business of the borrower to furnish abstracts of the title of the real estate offered as security, all of which were transmitted by the agent to the home office for examination; and, if they were approved, the course of business was that the bond and mortgage were prepared and forwarded to the agent, to be delivered to the applicant for execution and return. Of course, the applicant might still refuse to execute the bond and mortgage; but if he was satisfied with the terms of the instruments, and completed the same, they were given back to the agent, and were by him returned to the company. It seems that the money loaned was usually transmitted to the applicant by means of a draft payable to the order of the borrower; or, in certain cases, the money was paid by the company at the home office, pursuant to the written order of the borrower, evidenced by a receipt on the back of the order by the person in whose favor it was drawn. Such papers from the home office to the borrower and from the borrower to the company, it is conceded, are usually mailed to the state agent, and that they pass through his office; but it is insisted by the respondents that he has no interest in the business, and that he receives no compensation from the company for his services. Sub-agents, it is conceded, were employed by the agents appointed by the company; and it appears that I. T. Martin, during the winter and spring of 1871, was a regular agent of the company, appointed for the state of Iowa; that he employed one C. W. Copeland, as sub-agent, to solicit applications for life insurance; that Copeland claimed to be the agent of the company to effect loans in their behalf on security of real estate; and that he represented to the complainant that he, the sub-agent, could procure for the complainant a loan from the company of $10,000 on such security.

Both the complainant and Copeland then resided at Cedar Rapids, and it was at that place and about that time that the former was introduced to the latter; and it appears that Copeland was at that time canvassing for the company, to procure customers to take policies in the company, and to induce persons to take loans from the company on security of real estate. About the same time, Copeland published a card in one or more of the local newspapers, representing that he was the agent of the company; and it appears that he exhibited to the complainant pamphlets, circulars, and other documents, of the kind prepared and distributed by the state agents, as the means of extending the business of the company, and that notice was published by the same party in one or more of the local journals, in which he is described as the agent of the insurance company. Evidence entirely satisfactory was introduced, showing that it was during that period that the complainant commenced negotiations with Copeland to obtain for him a loan from the company for the sum of $10,000, to be secured by bond, and mortgage of real estate. Conversation ensued between them; and the evidence shows that Copeland told the complainant that he was going to quit preaching, and that he had made arrangements to act as attorney for the said insurance company; that he had already secured a loan for one person; and that, being an intimate friend of the general agent, he could get the money whenever he recommended a loan. Blank forms were requisite; and it appears that Copeland furnished the complainant with a printed blank form of an application for a loan, and that he requested the complainant merely to insert the description of the property to be offered as security and his valuation of the same, stating that he, the agent, would fill the other blanks, and send the application forward. Accordingly, the complainant inserted the description of the property, giving his valuation of the same in figures, and also gave the name of his wife and the date of the instrument, and his own name, and place of residence. Incomplete though the instrument was, yet the witness states that he delivered it to Copeland, and that he, the witness, never saw it afterwards until he gave his deposition in the case, and that the indorsements on the back of the instrument were not there when it left his possession.

Due notice was received by the complainant, from the president of the company, that his application for the loan was accepted; and he was also informed, in the same communication, that abstracts of the title of the property and certain certificates were required to show that the property was free of incumbrances and liens, and that when the same were received, if found to be correct, their attorney would prepare the bond and mortgage, and forward the same to him for execution. Such abstracts and certificates were procured by the complainant, at the instance of Copeland, and they were delivered by the complainant to him at his request; and it appears that Copeland presented to the complainant the bond and mortgage, ready for his signature, he having procured the signature of the complainant's wife to the mortgage before the instruments were exhibited to the complainant for execution. They were signed by the complainant at his house, no one being present except his wife and Copeland; and the complainant testifies that he then and there delivered the same to Copeland, together with two fire policies of insurance, in order that the fire policies might be indorsed by the agent of the companies issuing the same, in a way to make the loss, if any, payable to the corporation respondents. Decisive proof that Copeland received the bond and mortgage for record and transmission is also exhibited by the receipt which he gave in behalf of the company, and which he signed as agent.

Throughout the whole transaction the negotiations with the complainant were conducted by Copeland; and the evidence shows beyond doubt that all the instruments and documents which were delivered by the complainant to Copeland were by him delivered or transmitted to the state agent of the company, and that they were all forwarded by the latter to the company at their home office, where the officers of the company transact all their business. Such applications for loans are usually made direct to the executive committee, and are required to be signed by the party desiring the loan; and when the loan papers have been perfected, the company pay to the owner directly, either in checks or drafts to his order, unless the borrower, by written request or order, may have otherwise directed; but the president, in his testimony, admits that the state agent sometimes forwards applications to the executive committee for parties residing in the state, and that the home office does advise such parties, through him, of the action of the company in respect to such applications. Cases of the kind, therefore, it may be assumed, had occurred before, where the business was transacted through the state agent; but, if not, still it is proved beyond all doubt that all the negotiations with the complainant were conducted by the sub-agent, and that all the propositions to and from the company, in respect to the loan in question, were transmitted to the company through the same state agent. Satisfactory abstracts and certificates having been forwarded, and the due execution and delivery of the bond and mortgage having been procured, nothing remained to be done to enable Copeland to carry his fraudulent scheme into effect, except to get an order for the money in such a form that he could convert the fund to his own use, without danger of immediate exposure and detection. Antecedent conversations between the parties made it known to him that the complainant expected to receive the proceeds in drafts payable to his own order; it appearing that the complainant had told him that he wanted the amount in two drafts, one for $6,000 and the other for $4,000, each payable to his own order. Apprised of what the complainant desired, he doubtless thought it prudent to seem to conform to his expressed wish. Circumstances occasioned some delay, but Copeland finally informed the complainant that the papers had gone forward, and stated that notice that the papers were satisfactory might come any day, and suggested that the complainant might as well sign the blank order for the money, adding that he "would fill it out;" and the witness testifies that he looked at the blank, and seeing that it contained the words "in drafts to the order of," put his signature to it, placed it in the drawer of Copeland, and went home.

Taken as a whole, the evidence satisfies the court, beyond all doubt, that the blank form which the complainant signed was without date, except the year, which was in printed figures; that it contained no direction except the printed word "to," followed by a blank; that it did not contain the name of any payee, nor anything upon the subject, except the printed words "pay to," followed by a blank; that it did not specify any amount, nor contain anything upon the subject, except the printed word "dollars," preceded by a blank; that it did not specify for what the payment was to be made, nor did it contain anything upon the subject, except the printed words "on account of," followed by a blank; and that it contained nothing in respect to the medium of payment, except the printed words "in drafts to the order of," the word "of" immediately preceding the name of the plaintiff, H. G. Angle, and so close to the first initial of the signature as to leave no blank between the erased sentence and the name of the complainant. Subsequent to the time when the blank form was signed by the complainant, and was left in the drawer of Copeland, the printed words "drafts to the order of," just preceding the signature of the complainant, were erased, evidently with pen and ink, and the words "current funds" were inserted in writing between the printed word "in" and the word "drafts," which is the first word of the sentence "drafts to the order of," the effect of which was to authorize the company to pay the proceeds of the loan "in current funds," instead of "drafts to the order of" the signer of the blank form. Armed with that instrument, the blanks having been filled, and the words "current funds" having been inserted in lieu of the words "drafts to the order of," which were erased, Copeland went to the home office and obtained the whole proceeds of the loan, and absconded with the whole amount.

Full power to receive the proceeds of the loan would have been conferred upon the person who presented it, even if the holder of the blank form had done nothing more than to fill the blanks contained in the incomplete instrument; but it is quite obvious, that, if he had merely filled the blanks of the instrument, the company would have been obliged to make the payment "in drafts to the order of" the complainant, which, it is easy to see, would have defeated the fraudulent intent of the party who presented it for payment, as the drafts, if payable to the order of the complainant, could not be by that party converted into current funds. Had he merely filled the blanks, the body of the completed instrument would have read as follows, to wit: "Pay to [the person named] ten thousand dollars, on account of bond and mortgage, in drafts to the order of H. G. Angle." Evidently such an instrument would not have answered the purpose of the holder of the blank form, if he intended to betray his trust, and to convert the proceeds of the loan to his own use, without the consent of the lawful owner of the fund. Blanks necessary to complete the instrument and render it operative, it may be admitted, might be filled by the holder of the instrument; but it is clear that it was not possible, within the meaning of that rule, to give the instrument such a form as would make it answer the supposed fraudulent intent, without doing violence to the scope and design of the blank form, as evidenced by the printed terms it contained, which, as outlines, plainly indicate that the signer required that the payment of the proceeds of the loan should be made in drafts to his own order. Manifest as that indication was, and as it would be, even to the casual reader, it became necessary, in order to make the completed instrument answer the fraudulent intent of the holder, to change the scope and design of the same, which he effectually accomplished by erasing the printed words "drafts to the order of," which immediately preceded the name of the signer, as before explained, and by inserting the words "current funds" between the erased word "drafts" and the word "in," between which and the erased word "drafts" there was a short blank, scarcely sufficient to admit the written words "current funds," as will be seen by reference to the instrument actually presented to the company, which was sent up with the transcript as an original paper.

Compare the altered instrument with what it would have been if nothing had been done to it except to fill the blanks, and the criminal character of the act is manifest. By the erasure and insertion of the words "current funds," it was made to read as follows: "Pay to [the person named] ten thousand dollars, on account of bond and mortgage, in current funds." Such an alteration, it is insisted by the complainant, is not and cannot be justified by any implication which arises from the existence of blanks in the instrument, inasmuch as the alteration consists both of the erasure of material words and the insertion of other material words in lieu of those erased, which change the scope and legal effect of the instrument from what it would have been if the blanks had been filled without any such erasure and insertion. Complainant concedes that blanks in such an instrument may be filled by the person to whom it is intrusted for use; but he contends that the said alterations made in the instrument in this case were a forgery, which renders the completed instrument void; and the court here concurs in that proposition.

Negotiable instruments are frequently delivered for use, with blanks not filled; and, in respect to such instruments, it is held that where a party to such an instrument intrusts it to the custody of another for use, with blanks not filled up, whether it be to accommodate the person to whom it was intrusted or to be used for the benefit of the signer of the same, such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks necessary to perfect the same; and the rule is that, as between such party and innocent third parties, the person to whom the instrument was so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed the instrument to his custody, in filling the blanks necessary to perfect the instrument. Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142; Russell v. Langstaffe, 2 Doug., 514; Collis v. Emett, 1 H. Black., 313; Montague v. Perkins, 22 Eng. L. & Eq., 516. Questions of the kind most frequently arise in respect to negotiable instruments; but the court here is of the opinion that the same rule is properly applicable to the case before the court. Authority to act for another may be express, or it may, in certain cases, be implied; but an implied authority has its limitations as well as that which is express. Examples to prove that proposition exist everywhere; but it would be difficult to give one more apposite and striking than the one presented by the case in decision, where the authority to fill blanks is implied from their existence in an instrument intrusted to another for use. 1 Greenl. Ev. (12th ed.), § 567. Beyond all doubt, such a party may fill every blank which it is necessary should be filled to perfect the instrument and render it operative, within its scope and design, if the terms or words of the instrument sufficiently indicate what that scope and design are. Cases arise, it must be conceded, where a party signs his name to a blank paper, and intrusts the paper containing his signature to another for use; but it is sufficient to say upon the subject, that the case before the court is not of that character. Instead of that, the blank form signed by the complainant contained terms clearly indicating that the money was to be paid on account of "the bond and mortgage," and that the signer of the blank form required the payment to be made "in drafts to the order of" the signer of the same; and it was no more competent for the person to whom it was intrusted, in that state of the case, to erase the words "drafts to the order of," and to insert in the short blank preceding that sentence the words "current funds," than it would have been for that person to have prepared and executed a new instrument in the name of the signer, requesting the company to pay the proceeds to the order of the holder of the blank form.

Argument is scarcely necessary to support that proposition, as it is self-evident that the erasure of the words "drafts to the order of" changed the manifest scope and design of the incomplete instrument; and it is equally clear that the words "current funds," which were inserted, are utterly repugnant to the printed terms "drafts to the order of," which were erased by black lines. Bank v. Douglas, 31 Conn., 180. Properly applied, that case is decisive of the present case. It appears that the defendant in that case put his name upon an inchoate bill of exchange, drawn and signed by the maker, on a certain firm, blanks being left for the date, amount, time of payment, and the name of the payee; and that the defendant delivered the paper, thus indorsed, to the maker of the same, who struck out the name of the place where it was made, and the name of the firm on which it was drawn, and filled out the instrument, so as to make it a promissory note for $3,500, payable to the order of another party. Upon these facts the court held that an inference arose — which, in favor of a bona fide holder of the paper, was irresistible — that the person to whom the paper was intrusted was authorized, by filling the existing blanks, to complete the instrument and to fill the blanks so as to bind the defendant as indorser of a bill of exchange, drawn by him on the firm therein named, for any sum, payable at any time and place. But, say the court, no inference, or presumption of authority, can arise that he might turn the bill drawn on one firm into a bill drawn on another, or to turn it into a promissory note. Neither dictum nor decision, say the court, has been cited to warrant such a claim; and they add, that they suppose that none such can be found. Suit in that case was brought by the bank, claiming to be an innocent holder; but the court held that, notwithstanding the erasures, unmistakable evidence of the original character of the instrument remained, and that the evidence was amply sufficient to excite distrust, and make it the duty of any one to whom the paper was offered to inquire when and by what authority such erasures and alterations had been made. Gardner v. Walsh, 32 Eng. L. & Eq., 162.

Where blanks exist in negotiable securities, delivered to another for use, the custody of the paper, under such circumstances, gives the custodian the right to fill the blanks; but it does not confer authority to make any addition to the terms of the note; and if any such of a material character are made by such a party, without the consent of the party from whom the paper was received, it will avoid the note, even in the hands of an innocent holder. Ivory v. Michael, 33 Mo., 400. Proof was given in that case that the parties had for many years been in the habit of indorsing for each other; that the defendant indorsed the note, which was in blank as to the time of payment, and was payable without defalcation or discount. Before using it the other party filled the blank with thirty days, and added after the word "discount," "bearing ten per cent. after maturity." Attempt was made in argument to sustain the right to make the addition to the note, because it was delivered before the blank was filled; but the court held that the insertion of the words, "bearing ten per cent. after maturity," was not the filling of a blank, and that it rendered the note invalid. Wood v. Steele, 6 Wall., 80 (§§ 1517–18, infra). Persons intrusted with negotiable securities for use by the parties to it may, if it contains blanks, fill the same; but Mr. Parsons, though he admits that rule to its fullest extent, adds, that if one materially changes words which are printed or written, the note by such change would be rendered invalid; and certainly it must be so if the change substantially varies the scope of the instrument to the prejudice of the party from whom it was obtained. 2 Pars. on Bills & Notes, 566. Suppose that is so; still it is insisted by the respondents that the rule is not applicable in this case, because they had not notice of the defect in the blank order. But the court here is entirely of a different opinion. Even the holders of negotiable securities taken in the usual course of business, before the securities fall due, are held chargeable with notice where the marks on the instrument are of a character to apprise one to whom the same is offered of the alleged defect. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 365 (§§ 420–425, supra).

When it is proposed to impeach the title of a holder for value by proof of any facts and circumstances outside of the written instrument itself, it is a very different matter. He is then to be affected, if at all, by what has occurred between other parties; and he may well claim an exemption from any consequences flowing from their acts, unless it be first shown that he had knowledge of such facts and circumstances at the time the transfer was made. These principles are of universal application; but where a person takes a negotiable security, which, upon the face of it, is dishonored, he cannot, says Taney, C. J., be allowed to claim the privileges which belong to a bona fide holder. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65. If he chooses to receive it under such circumstances, he takes it with all the infirmities belonging to it, and is in no better condition than the person from whom he received it. The same doctrine was enforced and applied in a subsequent case, where, in speaking of a promissory note, so marked as to show for whose benefit it was to be discounted, the court held that all those dealing in paper "with such marks on its face must be presumed to have knowledge of what it imported." Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet., 318 (§ 427, supra); Brown v. Davies, 3 Term R., 80.

§ 1516. Actual notice of fraudulent erasure and interlineation not necessary to put upon inquiry.

Actual notice in such a case is not required, even in suits founded upon negotiable securities, where the evidence of its infirmity consists of matters apparent on its face; nor is any different or stricter rule applicable in cases like the present, it appearing that the printed words, though erased so as to be inoperative, were still entirely legible, even to the casual reader; and that the words "current funds," inserted before the erased word "drafts," were plainly repugnant to the erased words, "drafts to the order of," which followed them in the same connection. Constructive notice in such cases is held sufficient, upon the ground that when a party is about to perform an act which he has reason to believe may affect the rights of third persons, an inquiry as to the facts is a moral duty, and diligence an act of justice. Whatever fairly puts a party upon inquiry in such a case is sufficient notice in equity, where the means of knowledge are at hand; and if the party, under such circumstances, omits to inquire, and proceeds to do the act, he does so at his peril, as he is then chargeable with all the facts which by a proper inquiry he might have ascertained. Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow., 712; Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. Jr., 170; Kennedy v. Green, 3 Myl. & K., 722; Booth v. Barnum, 9 Conn., 286; Pitney v. Leonard, 1 Paige, 461; Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sandf., 157. Authorities to show that the material alteration of a written instrument renders it void is unnecessary, as it is a principle of universal application.

Decree reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to enter a decree in favor of the complainant.

WOOD v. STEELE.

(6 Wallace, 80-83. 1867.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Minnesota.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The action was brought by the plaintiff in error upon a promissory note made by Steele and Newson, bearing date October 11, 1858, for $3,720, payable to their own order one year from date, with interest at the rate of two per cent. per month, and indorsed by them to Wood, the plaintiff.

§ 1517. Alteration in time of payment discharges maker.

Upon the trial it appeared that Newson applied to Allis, the agent of Wood, for a loan of money upon the note of himself and Steele. Wood assented, and Newson was to procure the note. Wood left the money with Allis to be paid over when the note was produced. The note was afterwards delivered by Newson, and the money paid to him. Steele received no part of it. At that time it appeared on the face of the note that "September" had been stricken out and "October 11th" substituted as the date. This was done after Steele had signed the note, and without his knowledge or consent. These circumstances were unknown to Wood and to Allis. Steele was the surety of Newson. It does not appear that there was any controversy about the facts. The argument being closed, the court instructed the jury "that if the said alteration was made after the note was signed by the defendant Steele, and by him delivered to the other maker, Newson, Steele was discharged from all liability on said note." The plaintiff excepted. The jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff prosecuted this writ of error to reverse the judgment. Instructions were asked by the plaintiff's counsel, which were refused by the court. One was given with a modification. Exceptions were duly taken, but it is deemed unnecessary particularly to advert to them. The views of the court as expressed to the jury covered the entire ground of the controversy between the parties. The state of the case, as presented, relieves us from the necessity of considering the questions,—upon whom rested the burden of proof, the nature of the presumption arising from the alteration apparent on the face of the paper, and whether the insertion of a day in a blank left after the month exonerates the maker who has not assented to it? Was the instruction given correct? It was a rule of the common law as far back as the reign of Edward III. that a rasure in a deed avoids it. Brooke's Abridg., Feats, pl. 11. The effect of alterations in deeds was considered in Pigot's Case, 11 Coke, 27, and most of the authorities upon the subject down to that time were referred to. In Master v. Miller, 4 Term R., 320, 1 Smith's Lead. Cas., 1141, the subject was elabo-ately examined with reference to commercial paper. It was held that the established rules apply to that class of securities as well as to deeds. It is now settled, in both English and American jurisprudence, that a material alteration in any commercial paper, without the consent of the party sought to be charged, extinguishes his liability. The materiality of the alteration is to be decided by the court. The question of fact is for the jury. The alteration of the date, whether it hasten or delay the time of payment, has been uniformly held to be material. The fact in this case that the alteration was made before the note passed from the hands of Newson cannot affect the result. He had no authority to change the date. The grounds of the discharge in such cases are obvious. The agreement is no longer the one into which the defendant entered. Its identity is changed; another is substituted without his consent; and by a party who had no authority to consent for him. There is no longer the necessary concurrence of minds. If the instrument be under seal, he may well plead that it is not his deed; and if it be not under seal, that he did not so promise. In either case the issue must necessarily be found for him. To prevent and punish such tampering the law does not permit the plaintiff to fall back upon the contract as it was originally. In pursuance of a stern but wise policy, it annuls the instrument as to the party sought to be wronged.

§ 1518. Rules as to bona fide purchaser, and as to which of two innocent persons must suffer, have no application to cases of altered notes.

The rules that where one of two innocent persons must suffer, he who has put it in the power of another to do the wrong must bear the loss, and that the holder of commercial paper taken in good faith and in the ordinary course of business is unaffected by any latent infirmities of the security, have no application in this class of cases. The defendant could no more have prevented the alteration than he could have prevented a complete fabrication; and he had as little reason to anticipate one as the other. The law regards the security, after it is altered, as an entire forgery with respect to the parties who have not consented, and, so far as they are concerned, deals with it accordingly.

The instruction was correct, and the judgment is affirmed.

§ 1519. Prolonging time.—The alteration of the date of the note so as to prolong the time of payment does not avoid it as to the maker. Union Bank v. Cook, 2 Cr. C. C., 218. See § 1512.

§ 1520. Adding place of payment.—The addition by a third person to the signature of the maker of a note of the words "Washington, D. C.," with the intention of affecting the negotiability of the paper, is a material alteration which avoids the note. Commercial & Farmers' Bank v. Patterson,* 2 Cr. C. C., 346.

§ 1521. Erasing place of payment.—In assumpsit on a note "payable at the Commercial Bank of Canada," held, that the erasure of these words after the note had left the maker's hands and without his knowledge or consent did not prevent a recovery, there being nothing shown connecting the plaintiff with the erasure and its effect being to enlarge, not restrict, the rights of the maker. Major v. Hansen,* 2 Biss., 195.

§ 1522. Adding "value received."—Writing after an indorsement the words "value received" does not avoid the note, unless done with the privity of the plaintiff. Riggs v. St. Clair,* 1 Cr. C. C., 606.

§ 1523. Adding "and company."—A. bought goods and gave his promissory note therefor. A. and B. afterwards formed a partnership and the goods became the property of the firm. After the note became due, and with the consent of the partners and the holder, the words "and company" were added to A.'s name. Held, binding on the firm. Crum v. Abbott, 2 McL., 233.

§ 1524. As to date.—An accommodation maker signed a blank form of a note. Subsequently the printed words of the form, "after date," were erased and the words "on demand" substituted, and then the blanks for amount and dates, etc., were filled up; and two or three weeks later two additional accommodation securities signed the note as makers.

Held, that neither the erasure and insertion, nor the addition of the two securities, were material alterations of the note operative to discharge the accommodation maker. Bingham v. Reddy,* 5 Ben., 266.

§ 1525. Delivery of a note or bill to an agent without date authorizes him to fill up the blank. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 843 (§§ 420-425).

§ 1526. Alteration apparent, holder must explain.—Where under a count in a declaration upon a note dated "April 14, 1838," a note was offered in which the original date, "March 24, 1838," appeared to be partially obliterated with a pen, and under it was written "April 14, 1838," the same was held not admissible until the alteration was accounted for by the holder. Low v. Merrill,* 1 Burn. (Wis.), 185; S. C., 1 Pin., 340.

WAYNESVILLE NATIONAL BANK v. IRONS.

(Circuit Court for Ohio: 8 Federal Reporter, 1-10. 1881.)

Charge by MATTHEWS, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought by the Waynesville National Bank as the owner and holder of a promissory note which reads as follows:

"$10,000.

LEBANON, OHIO, April 15, 1878.

"One year after date, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of the treasurer of the Miami Valley Railway Company ten thousand dollars, for value received."

It is signed by Samuel Irons, William F. Dill, Daniel Perrine, F. Hutchinson, William Morlatt and William V. Bone. On the back of it is the following indorsement: "Demand and notice of protest waived. W. B. Sellers, Treas. M. V. R'y Co."

§ 1532. What is sufficient for a recovery in an action on negotiable paper.

The note is what is known as negotiable paper, and the production of it by the plaintiff, with proof or admission of the genuineness of the signatures and of the indorsement, without any additional evidence, entitles it to recover from the parties the full amount thereof, with interest, unless the defendants make out some satisfactory defense. The railroad company is sued together with the makers, and they defend separately. The answer of the railroad company sets up that the note was not indorsed or delivered by the treasurer to the bank, neither for a valuable consideration nor otherwise; denies that there is anything due thereon, and denies that the plaintiff is the legal or equitable owner of it, and alleges that the plaintiff came into possession of it wrongfully and illegally, and without authority from, or consent of, the defendant. It sets up the circumstances in detail of the original negotiation of the note as collateral security by Mr. Irons and the treasurer of the company at the Lebanon National Bank to secure a demand note of the company for $3,000, and that it was obtained from the possession of that bank and discounted by the plaintiff without any authority.

§ 1533. Circumstances under which an indorser (corporation) is bound upon its indorsement.

The relation that the railway company occupies to the paper is different from that occupied by the other defendants, and it is proper to dispose of the questions arising on the defenses of the railway company independently, in the first instance, and with a view to that I give you this charge: If the jury are satisfied from the testimony that the note in suit, having previously been indorsed in blank by the treasurer of the railway company, was delivered to the plaintiff by Israel Wright, assuming to represent the railway company in the transaction, and in consideration thereof the plaintiff paid to Israel Wright the amount thereof, less the discount, or paid, at Wright's request, an equivalent amount in obligations of the railway company, so that the railway company in fact received the value thereof, and the transaction was reported by Wright to the secretary of the company, and by him to its treasurer, and the company has continued ever since to enjoy the benefit of the proceeds of said discount without any offer to return the consideration, then the railway company is not entitled to set up the defense upon which it relies.

The answer of Mr. Irons is filed separately. He denies that the plaintiff is the owner or holder of the note. It avers that the note was made by the defendant herein and his co-defendants, except the railway company, jointly and severally, and all as principals, for the accommodation of said railway company, and loaned to it upon the agreement and understanding that said company should, upon the maturity of said note, pay the same, and that the proceeds of said note should be applied exclusively by said company to the purchase of right of way for said company's road and the further construction and completion of the same; of all which the plaintiff had due notice before said note came into plaintiff's possession. He alleges that the note came into the possession of the plaintiff without the knowledge or consent of himself or of any of his co-defendants, and with notice that the proceeds would be applied to the payment of debts of said company incurred prior to the making of said note, and to purposes other than those aforesaid, for which said note was made. He further alleges that no part of said proceeds was applied by said plaintiff to the purposes aforesaid, for which said note was made, nor by any other person to whom they may have paid the same. The third defense alleges the insolvency of the railway company prior to the time when the note came into the possession of the plaintiff, and its final and complete suspension of work upon its road and all attempts to complete the same, whereby, and in consequence of other facts in the prior defense which I have just read, of which it is alleged the plaintiff also had notice, it is claimed that the negotiation of the note was illegal. The fourth defense alleges the circumstances in reference to the original deposit of the note with the Lebanon National Bank, and claims that possession of the note was obtained from the Lebanon National Bank without the authority, knowledge or consent of the defendants. The fifth defense denies that Sellers, as treasurer, assigned or transferred the note to the plaintiff, or that the railway company authorized him to do so. Then comes the sixth defense, in reference to which a ruling has already been made excluding testimony offered in its support, and which is not, therefore, open to any further consideration. The answers of the other defendants, except in one particular, in respect to which it is not necessary to refer you, contain substantially, if not literally, the same defenses which I have just enumerated as contained in Mr. Irons' answer. And without referring to them by number, inasmuch as the same defenses seem to be reiterated several times in different forms, I will state in the first place that the defense of these gentlemen rests upon a denial of the title of the plaintiff to this note, based upon the want of authority alleged to exist on the part of Mr. Sellers to make the transfer, and of Mr. Wright to make the negotiation, and a denial of the fact that the company, through any of its officers, assented to the arrangement whereby the plaintiff became the owner of the note. In respect to that I give you this charge: That if the title of the plaintiff, so far as it depends upon the question of indorsement and delivery, and the authority of Wright to bind the railway company in its negotiations, is sufficient as against the railway company, it is equally valid as against the other defendants.

§ 1535. Rule as to notice; bona fide holder for value.

And the further question is whether the legal title to the note, which was in the railway company, passed by the acts done in its name to the plaintiff. The note having been indorsed in blank by the treasurer of the railway company, the title would thereafter pass by mere delivery, and would be sufficient in the hands of a bona fide holder, for value paid, receiving the same before due in the ordinary course of business, without any notice of want of authority or other defect of title in the party transferring its possession. In other words, if this note, being indorsed in blank by the treasurer, was found in the possession of Israel Wright on a certain day before its maturity, and was by him presented for discount to the bank, and the bank discounted it and paid to him the proceeds of it, without any notice that Wright had no authority, and without notice that the railway company was not assenting to the transaction, and without notice of any other facts which would constitute a defect in the authority of either the treasurer or the agent representing himself to be such, then the plaintiff is what in law is termed a bona fide holder, for value, prior to maturity, without notice of defect. And it would make no difference whether Wright had found the paper somewhere or had stolen it, or had possession of it in any other way; his delivery of it, under these circumstances, would have vested the plaintiff with the complete legal title as against the railway company and as against the other parties. I speak of the legal title. I am not now considering the defenses resting on other grounds; they depend on other circumstances, to which I will now advert. I am simply calling your attention to the questions raised by these parts of the answer which assert that the plaintiff has no right to sue because it is not the holder and owner of the paper, or because it has not the title to it.

§ 1536. What does not constitute a contract by payee of a note to use its proceeds in a stipulated manner.

Then we come to the other defenses made on the part of the defendants, other than the railway company, and which constitute the equities claimed on their part. It is claimed, to state it shortly, that the other defendants signed the note as an accommodation to the railway company, upon the faith of an understanding between them and the railway company as to the appropriation of its proceeds; that this understanding was violated by the transaction in this case by which the bank became the holder of the note in suit, and that this was done, so far as the bank is concerned, with full notice on its part of the rights of the defendants. The first question under this head, therefore, is this: Was there such an understanding; if so, what were its terms? It is claimed, in the first instance, that that understanding exists by force of the resolutions of the board of directors of the railway company, of April 15, 1878, and of the obligation of the company, given to a trustee in trust for the makers of these notes, in pursuance of this preamble and resolution. I will read them:

“WHEREAS, in the judgment of this board of directors the interests of the Miami Valley Railway Company demand that certain rights of way should be speedily procured, and that the work of construction should be vigorously prosecuted, these two objects requiring much more money than is at present under the control of the company, and it having been suggested the most feasible mode of raising said money would be by certain of the directors and others executing their notes in sums not exceeding ten thousand dollars ($10,000), each due in one year, and loaning same to the company, said Miami Valley Railway Company to provide for the payment of said notes at their maturity, and also to indemnify the makers of said notes against loss by reason thereof, by depositing with a trustee the first mortgage bonds of the company, in the ratio of three dollars in bonds to one dollar of liability created by said notes; therefore,

“Resolved, that the treasurer of the Miami Valley Railway Company be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to execute, in the name and on behalf of the company, instruments of writing, in substance as follows, namely:

“Whereas, ——— have executed their joint notes to the order of the treasurer of the Miami Valley Railway Company, dated April 15, 1878, and due in one year, for the sum of ——— thousand dollars; now, this instrument of writing is to show that said notes are made for the accommodation of the Miami Valley Railway Company, and said company hereby agrees and binds itself to pay same at maturity, and said company has placed in the hands of ———, as trustee, first mortgage bonds of the company, in the ratio of three to one of the liability incurred, to indemnify said parties against any loss by reason of making said note; and in the event of the Miami Valley Railway Company failing to pay said notes at maturity, or within ten days (10) thereafter, then the said trustee is hereby authorized to realize the money upon said bonds at such rate as he shall deem proper, and apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of note; provided, however, sale of bonds shall not be made until authorized by a majority of the makers of said note, and when said note shall have been paid by the Miami Valley Railway Company, the aforesaid bonds shall be returned to said company, and the treasurer of the company be also authorized and instructed to deliver aforesaid bonds to said trustee in order to consummate the transaction."

I charge you that these papers do not constitute any pledge or agreement on the part of the railway company to use these notes for the purposes specified in the preamble and for no other purposes. Those purposes are referred to in the preamble by way of recital as indicating the grounds and reasons for the necessity which, in the opinion of the board of directors, existed for raising more funds than they then had in their control. But I am unable to perceive in it any pledge or agreement to use the notes in any other way than might at the time seem best to the board of directors for the general purpose of carrying on the interests in which they were engaged. I think, therefore, so far as any such agreement is deduced from this paper, that such claim is unfounded. I mean to be understood that the use of the note in maintaining the credit of the company, by the payment of any of its debts, is not a breach of the faith upon which the note was given.

§ 1537. Province of jury to distinguish between an (alleged) agreement and a recital of purposes and hopes.

Now, then, going beyond that paper, there is still a question of fact outside of it, or possibly the testimony taken in connection with it, from which it is possible to claim the existence of such an understanding, which cannot be deduced from the paper itself. That is for your consideration. You are to examine the oral testimony in addition to this and in connection with it, and to find what the facts are in regard to the claim,—whether there was any understanding and agreement outside of the paper, between the makers of these notes and the railway company, by which it was understood and agreed, as the condition on which these gentlemen signed these notes, that they were to be signed only and merely for the purpose of procuring rights of way and in payment of liabilities for construction thereafter to be incurred. In exercising your discretion and judgment in the examination of the evidence on that point, I deem it necessary only to say that you are to discriminate as reasonable, sensible, business men, so as to be satisfied clearly of the existence of a definite agreement and understanding to that effect, as distinguished from mere declarations and statements, on the part of the officers of the company, as to the purposes and expectations that they entertained and indulged the hope of realizing by the use of this additional fund. A mere statement that they believed that such and such an object would be accomplished, that they hoped the final and complete construction of the road would be secured, and they intended so to apply the money as to realize that purpose, does not, in my opinion, amount to proof sufficient to satisfy the law of the definite understanding which is claimed in this case to exist.

§ 1538. Notice to officer of bank notice to bank, when.

But if you find that the communications between the parties went beyond that, and that there was a definite understanding that the proceeds of these notes should be applied only to a specific purpose, then the defense based on that ground will have been established to that extent—as to the existence of an agreement. In order, however, to make that defense available in this case, as against this plaintiff, you must go another step and ascertain whether or not, at the time when the discount was in fact made by the plaintiff, the plaintiff had what is considered in law to be notice of the existence of such an understanding and agreement; and it becomes, therefore, important to understand what constitutes such notice. It is claimed by the defendants that the bank is chargeable with knowledge of all the facts of the transaction between the original makers of the note and the railway company; that they were in fact known to Mr. S. S. Haines, he at that time being president of both corporations, a member of the executive committee of the railway company, and a member of the committee of the bank having charge of the business of its discounts. The rule which should govern you on this point is this: If you find that Mr. Haines had actual knowledge of the facts, as alleged by the defendants, the makers of the note, that the proceeds should be applied only to particular purposes, or that it was to be discounted only under specified circumstances, and that he was aware of, and acted in, the negotiation on the part of the bank for its discount, while such negotiation was in progress, then the bank is chargeable with notice of these facts, otherwise it is not. And in order that I may not be liable to any misapprehension on a point that may turn out to be very important in your consideration of the case, I wish to add that it was quite competent and proper for Mr. Haines, occupying these relations to both parties to the transaction, to say, when it was proposed to have the note discounted by the bank, "My position in reference to both the bank and the railway company is such that I do not think it would be proper for me to take any part in the transaction on either side;" and that, if he did so, any knowledge of any facts which he might have had at that time would not affect the rights of the bank. To charge the bank with responsibility and liability on account of any knowledge of Mr. Haines, he must, in my opinion, be acting at the time in the name and on behalf of the bank, as its agent and representative. If he was not, but if the negotiation was in fact conducted by the cashier, and Mr. Haines declined to take any part in it, and refused to be considered as acting for either party, then the question will be, not what Mr. Haines knew, but what the bank may have known by reason of any knowledge on the part of the cashier, and is not chargeable with the knowledge of Mr. Haines.

I am asked to add to the charge, in reference to the relation between Mr. Haines and the bank, and the effect of any knowledge on his part, this charge: "If you find that Mr. Haines declined to participate in the negotiations for the discount of the note, but, notwithstanding that, he did in fact participate in any part of these negotiations, the bank is chargeable with notice of any facts in the knowledge of Haines constituting a defense to the makers of the note, as already stated in the general charge." I am unwilling to give that charge in these terms, because it is possible there is ambiguity in them. But I will add to my charge this: In order to prevent the bank from being liable for Mr. Haines' knowledge, his declining to participate in the negotiations must be real, and not merely formal; it must not have been a mere pretense; it must not have been merely in words, but in fact. What I mean to say is, not that he said so and so, but that he did not in fact participate in the negotiations on behalf of the bank. At the same time if you find this to be the fact: that Mr. Haines, on being inquired of by the cashier in respect of the propriety of discounting the note, had replied to him, "These names are undoubtedly good for $10,000, but my relation to the two companies is such that I decline any part in the decision of the question of the discount of the note" and thereupon withdrew and took no further part in it, I don't consider the mere answering of that question a participation in the transaction in such a manner as to warrant fixing any responsibility upon the bank for any knowledge of Mr. Haines.

There is one other matter that is essential to the maintenance of this defense: First, the agreement between the makers and the railway company upon which it is based; second, the knowledge of that on the part of the bank (of both of which I have heretofore spoken); and third, a violation of that agreement in the actual appropriation of the note at the time of the discount or subsequently. In respect to that, my charge to you is that the misapplication of the proceeds of the note, made by the officers of the railway company without the knowledge and without the participation of the bank, would not invalidate the right of the bank to recover on the note. It is only a knowledge of the purpose of the officers of the railway company to make the misapplication, and their joining in effecting that purpose, by giving them the amount of the discount of the note with that intention, that makes them responsible for the breach of faith towards the makers of the note. For instance, in respect to the $3,000 and the interest on it, part of the consideration of this note consisted of the payment of that amount of indebtedness from the railway company to the Lebanon National Bank, incurred by an original transaction with it; if you find that that was a legitimate transaction, and that the proceeds of that much of the note were applied in fact according to the intention of the makers of the note, then the Waynesville National Bank, in respect to that part of the consideration, stands exactly in the shoes of the Lebanon National Bank, and would be entitled to recover for that part of the consideration. So with regard to the additional amount of $1,500, applied in another similar way; and so with regard to all of them. These notes were obligations of the railway company, and in order to complete the defense of the makers of the note, as against the bank, on this ground, it must be shown that the appropriation of the proceeds, in which the bank participated with knowledge, was contrary to that agreement; that is, that the debts, the payment of which was provided for by the appropriation, were not embraced within the terms of the agreement according to which the note was originally given.

WALLACE v. M'CONNELL.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE THOMPSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case comes up on a writ of error from the district court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama. The action in the court below was founded upon a note, which, although under seal, is considered in Tennessee a promissory note, and is in the words following: "Three years and two months after date, I promise to pay Corry M'Connell, or order, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Nashville, four thousand eight hundred and eighty dollars, ninety-nine cents, value received." The declaration sets out this note according to its terms, and alleges the promise to pay at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Nashville, without averring that the note was presented at the bank, or demand of payment made there. The defendant pleaded payment and satisfaction of the note, and issue being joined thereupon, the cause was continued until the next term thereafter. At which time the defendant interposed a plea puis darrein continuance, alleging that the plaintiff, as to the sum of $4,204, part and parcel of the sum demanded in the declaration, ought not further to have and maintain his action therefor against him, because that sum had been attached by Blocker & Co., by proceedings commenced by them against the plaintiff in this cause, under the attachment law of Alabama, in which he was summoned as garnishee. And setting out the proceedings against him according to the requirements of that law, and under which he was examined on oath; and did declare that he executed the note to the said M'Connell, the plaintiff in this cause, as set out in the declaration; that he had paid on the note $372.34, and that the remainder of the said note was due by him to said M'Connell. And the plea further sets out that, under the proceedings on the attachment, the court had given judgment against him for $4,204, and costs; but with a stay of all further proceedings until the further disposition of the case, and which remains yet undetermined.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred. And the court sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for $675.39, the residue of the plaintiff's debt in his declaration mentioned, by default; and thereupon gave a final judgment for the plaintiff, for the full amount of the note, $4,830, the debt aforesaid, and $394, the interest assessed by the clerk, together with his cost. And the plaintiff remits upon the record the sum of $351.28; and the questions arising upon this record have been made and argued under the following objections: 1. That the declaration is bad for want of an averment that the note was presented and payment demanded at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Nashville. 2. That the matters pleaded of the proceedings, under the attachment laws of Alabama, were sufficient to bar the action, as to the amount of the sum so attached; and that the demurrer ought therefore to have been overruled. 3. That the judgment by nil dicit, for the $675.39, was erroneous.

§ 1539. When demand need not be averred and proved.

The question raised, as to the sufficiency of a declaration in a case where the suit is by the payee against the maker of a promissory note, never has received the direct decision of this court. In the case of the Bank of United States v. Smith, 11 Wheat., 171, the note upon which the action was founded was made payable at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, in the city of Washington; and the suit was against the indorser, and the question turned upon the sufficiency of the averment in the declaration of a demand of payment of the maker. And the court said, when in the body of a note the place of payment is designated, the indorser has a right to presume that the maker has provided funds at such place to pay the note, and has a right to require the holder to apply at such place for payment. In the opinion delivered in that case, the question now presented in the case before us is stated; and it said, whether, where the suit is against the maker of a promissory note, or the acceptor of a bill of exchange, payable at a particular place, it is necessary to aver a demand of payment at such place, and upon the trial to prove such demand, is a question upon which conflicting opinions have been entertained in the courts in Westminster Hall. But that the question in such case may, perhaps, be considered at rest in England, by the decision of the late case of Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B., 165, in the house of lords, where it was held that if a bill of exchange be accepted, payable at a particular place, the declaration on such bill, against the acceptor, must aver presentment at that place, and the averment must be proved. But it is there said a contrary opinion has been entertained by courts in this country; that a demand on the maker of note, or the acceptor of a bill payable at a specified place, need not be averred in the declaration or proved on the trial; that it is not a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right of recovery. As matter of practice, application will generally be made at the place appointed, if it is believed that funds have been there placed to meet the note or bill. But if the maker or acceptor has sustained any loss by the omission of the holder to make such application for payment, at the place appointed, it is matter of defense to set up by plea and proof. But it is added, as this question does not necessarily arise in this case, we do not mean to be understood as expressing any decided opinion upon it, although we are strongly inclined to think that, as against the maker of a note or the acceptor of a bill, no averment or proof of a demand of payment at the place designated would be necessary. The question now before the court cannot, certainly, be considered as decided by the case of the Bank of United States v. Smith, 11 Wheat., 171. But it cannot be viewed as the mere obiter opinion of the judge who delivered the judgment of the court. The attention of the court was drawn to the question now before the court, and the remarks made upon it, and the authorities referred to, show that this court was fully apprised of the conflicting opinions of the English courts on the question; and that opinions, contrary to that of the house of lords, in the case of Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B., 165, had been entertained by some of the courts in this country; and under this view of the question, the court say they are strongly inclined to adopt the American decisions. As the precise question is now presented by this record, it becomes necessary to dispose of it.

§ 1540. Authorities reviewed.

It is not deemed necessary to go into a critical examination of the English authorities upon this point; a reference to the case in the house of lords, which was decided in the year 1820, shows the great diversity of opinion entertained by the English judges upon this question. It was, however, decided that if a bill of exchange is accepted, payable at a particular place, the declaration in an action on such bill against the acceptor must aver presentment at that place, and the averment must be proved. The lord chancellor, in stating the question, said this was a very fit question to be brought before the house of lords, because the state of the law, as actually administered in the courts, is such that it would be infinitely better to settle it in any way than to permit so controversial a state to exist any longer. That the court of king's bench has been of late years in the habit of holding that such an acceptance as this is a general acceptance; and that it is not necessary to notice it as such in the declaration, or to prove presentment, but that it must be considered as matter of defense; and that the defendant must state himself ready to pay at the place, and bring the money into court, and so bar the action by proving the truth of that defense. On the contrary, the court of common pleas was in the habit of holding that an acceptance like this was a qualified acceptance, and that the contract of the acceptor was to pay at the place; and that as matter of pleading, a presentment at the place stipulated must be averred, and that evidence must be given to sustain that averment; and that the holder of the bill has no cause of action unless such demand has been made. In that case the opinion of the twelve judges was taken and laid before the house of lords, and will be found reported in an appendix to the report of the case of Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B., 180. In which opinions all the cases are referred to in which the question had been drawn into discussion; and the result appears to have been, that eight judges out of the twelve sustained the doctrine of the king's bench on this question, notwithstanding which the judgment was reversed.

It is fairly to be inferred from an act of parliament passed immediately thereafter, 1 & 2 Geo. IV., c. 78, that this decision was not satisfactory. By that act, it is declared that "after the 1st of August, 1821, if any person shall accept a bill of exchange payable at the house of a banker or other place, without further expression in his acceptance, such acceptance shall be deemed and taken to be, to all intents and purposes, a general acceptance of such bill. But if the acceptor shall, in his acceptance, express that he accepts the bill payable at a banker's house or other place only, and not otherwise or elsewhere, such acceptance shall be a qualified acceptance of such bill; and the acceptor shall not be liable to pay the bill except in default of payment, when such payment shall have been first duly demanded at such banker's house or other place." Bayley on Bills, 200, note. In most of the cases which have arisen in the English courts, the suit has been against the acceptor of the bill, and in some cases a distinction would seem to be made between such a case and that of a note when the action is against the maker, and the designated place is in the body of the note. But there can be no solid grounds upon which such a distinction can rest. The acceptor of a bill stands in the same relation to the drawee as the maker of a note does to the payee; and the acceptor is the principal debtor in the case of a bill, precisely like the maker of a note. The liability of the acceptor grows out of, and is to be governed by, the terms of his acceptance, and the liability of the maker of a note grows out of, and is to be governed by, the terms of his note; and the place of payment can be of no more importance in the one case than in the other. And in some of the cases where the point was made the action was against the maker of a promissory note, and the place of payment designated in the body of the note. The case of Nicholls v. Bowers, 2 Camp., 498, was one of that description, decided in the year 1810; and it was contended on the trial that the plaintiff was bound to show that the note was presented at the banking house where it was made payable. But Lord Ellenborough, before whom the cause was tried, not only decided that no such proof was necessary, but would not suffer such evidence to be given; although the counsel for the plaintiff said he had a witness in court to prove the note was presented at the banker's the day it became due; his lordship alleging that he was afraid to admit such evidence lest doubts should arise as to its necessity. And in the case of Wild v. Rennards, 1 Camp., 425, note, Mr. Justice Bayley, in the year 1809, ruled that if a promissory note is made payable at a particular place, in an action against the maker, there is no necessity for proving that it was presented there for payment.

The case of Saunderson v. Bowes, 14 East, 500, decided in the king's bench in the year 1811, is sometimes referred to as containing a different rule of construction of the same words, when used in the body of a promissory note, from that which is given to them when used in the acceptance of a bill of exchange. But it may be well questioned whether this use warrants any such conclusion. That was an action on a promissory note by the bearer against the maker. The note, as set out in the declaration, was a promise to pay on demand at a specified place, and there was no averment that a demand of payment had been made at the place designated. To which declaration the defendant demurred; and the counsel, in support of the demurrer, referred to cases where the rule had been applied to acceptances on bills of exchange, but contended that the rule did not apply to a promissory note, when the place is designated in the body of the note. Lord Ellenborough, in the course of the argument, in answer to some cases referred to by counsel, observed: "Those are cases where money is to be paid or something to be done at a particular time as well as place, therefore the party (defendant) may readily make an averment that he was ready at the time and place to pay, and that the other party was not ready to receive it; but here the time of payment depends entirely on the pleasure of the holder of the note. It is true Lord Ellenborough did not seem to place his opinion, in the ultimate decision of the cause, upon this ground. But the other judges did not allude to the distinction taken at the bar between that case and the acceptance of a bill in like terms, but placed their opinions upon the terms of the note itself, being a promise to pay on demand at a particular place. And there is certainly a manifest distinction between a promise to pay on demand at a given place, and a promise to pay at a fixed time at such place. And it is hardly to be presumed that Lord Ellenborough intended to rest his judgment upon a distinction between a promissory note and a bill of exchange, as both he and Mr. Justice Bayley had a very short time before, in the cases of Nicholls v. Bowes, 2 Camp., 498, and Wild v. Rennards, 1 Camp., 425, note, above referred to, applied the same rule of construction to promissory notes where the promise was contained in the body of the note. Where the promise is to pay on demand at a particular place, there is no cause of action until the demand is made, and the maker of the note cannot discharge himself by an offer of payment, the note not being due until demanded.

Thus we see that until the late decision in the house of lords in the case of Rowe v. Young, and the act of parliament passed soon thereafter, this question was in a very unsettled state in the English courts; and without undertaking to decide between those conflicting opinions, it may be well to look at the light in which this question has been viewed in the courts in this country. This question came before the supreme court of the state of New York in the year 1809, in the case of Foden v. Sharp, 4 Johns., 183, and the court said the holder of a bill of exchange need not show a demand of payment of the acceptor any more than of the maker of a note. It is the business of the acceptor to show that he was ready at the day and place appointed, but that no one came to receive the money, and that he was always ready afterwards to pay. This case shows that the acceptor of a bill and the maker of a note were considered as standing on the same footing with respect to a demand of payment at the place designated. And in the case of Wolcott v. Van Santvoord, 17 Johns., 248, which came before the same court in the year 1819, the same question arose. The action was against the acceptor of a bill payable five months after date at the Bank of Utica, and the declaration contained no averment of a demand at the Bank of Utica, and upon a demurrer to the declaration the court gave judgment for the plaintiff. Chief Justice Spencer, in delivering the opinion of the court, observed that the question had been already decided in the case of Foden v. Sharp; but considering the great diversity of opinion among the judges in the English courts on the question, he took occasion critically to review the cases which had come before those courts, and shows very satisfactorily that the weight of authority is in conformity to that decision, and the demurrer was accordingly overruled; and the law in that state for the last thirty years has been considered as settled upon this point. And although the action was against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, it is very evident that this circumstance had no influence upon the decision; for the court say that in this respect the acceptor stands in the same relation to the payee as the maker of a note does to the indorsee. He is the principal, and not a collateral debtor. And in the case of Caldwell v. Cassady, 8 Cow., 271, decided in the same court in the year 1828, the suit was upon a promissory note payable sixty days after date at the Franklin Bank in New York; and the note had not been presented or payment demanded at the bank. The court said, this case has been already decided by this court in the case of Wolcott v. Van Santvoord. And after noticing some of the cases in the English courts, and alluding to the confusion that seemed to exist there upon the question, they add: "That whatever be the rule in other courts, the rule in this court must be considered settled, that where a promissory note is made payable at a particular place on a day certain, the holder of the note is not bound to make a demand at the time and place by way of a condition precedent to the bringing of an action against the maker. But if the maker was ready to pay at the time and place, he may plead it as he would plead a tender in bar of damages and costs by bringing the money into court.

It is not deemed necessary to notice very much at length the various cases that have arisen in the American courts upon this question, but barely to refer to such as have fallen under the observation of the court; and we briefly state the point and decision thereupon; and the result will show a uniform course of adjudication, that in actions on promissory notes against the maker, or on bills of exchange, where the suit is against the maker in the one case, and acceptor in the other, and the note or bill made payable at a specified time and place, it is not necessary to aver in the declaration, or prove on the trial, that a demand of payment was made in order to maintain the action. But that if the maker or acceptor was at the place at the time designated, and was ready and offered to pay the money, it was matter of defense to be pleaded and proved on his part.

The case of Watkins v. Crouch, in the court of appeals of Virginia, 5 Leigh, 522, was a suit against the maker and indorser, jointly, as is the course in that state upon a promissory note like the one in suit. The note was made payable at a specified time, at the Farmers' Bank, at Richmond, and the court of appeals, in the year 1834, decided that it was not necessary to aver and prove a presentation at the bank and demand of payment, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover against the maker, but that it was necessary in order to entitle him to recover against the indorser; and the president of the court went into a very elaborate consideration of the decisions of the English courts upon the question; and to show that upon common law principles applicable to bonds, notes, and other contracts for the payment of money, no previous demand was necessary in order to sustain the action, but that a tender and readiness to pay must come by way of defense from the defendant; and that, looking upon the note as commercial paper, the principles of the common law were clearly against the necessity of such demand and proof, where the time and place were specified, though it would be otherwise where the place, but not the time, was specified; a demand in such case ought to be made; and he examined the case of Sanderson v. Bowes, to show that it turned upon that distinction, the note being payable on demand at a specified place. The same doctrine was held by the court of appeals of Maryland, in the case of Bowie v. Duvall, 1 Gill & J., 175; and the New York cases, as well as that of the Bank of United States v. Smith, 11 Wheat., 171, are cited with approbation, and fully adopted; and the court put the case upon the broad ground that when the suit is against the maker of a promissory note, payable at a specified time and place, no demand is necessary to be averred, upon the principle that the money to be paid is a debt from the defendant, that it is due generally and universally, and will continue due, though there be a neglect on the part of the creditor to attend at the time and place to receive or demand it. That it is matter of defense, on the part of the defendant, to show that he was in attendance to pay, but that the plaintiff was not there to receive it; which defense generally will be in bar of damages only, and not in bar of the debt. The case of Ruggles v. Patten, 8 Mass., 480, sanctions the same rule of construction. The action was on a promissory note for the payment of money, at a day and place specified; and the defendant pleaded that he was present at the time and place, and ready and willing to pay, according to the tenor of his promises, in the second count of the declaration mentioned, and avers that the plaintiff was not then ready or present at the bank to receive payment, and did not demand the same of the defendant, as the plaintiff in his declaration had alleged; the court said this was an immaterial issue, and no bar to an action or promise to pay money.

So, also, in the state of New Jersey, the same rule is adopted. In the case of Weed v. Van Houten, 4 Halst. (N. J.), 189, the chief justice says: "The question is whether, in an action by the payee of a promissory note, payable at a particular place, and not on demand, but at time, it is necessary to aver a presentment of the note and demand of payment by the holder at that place, at the maturity of the note." And, upon this question, he says: "I have no hesitation in expressing my entire concurrence in the American decisions, so far as is necessary for the present occasion; that a special averment of presentment at the place is not necessary to the validity of the declaration, nor is proof of it necessary upon the trial. This rule, I am satisfied, is most conformable to sound reason, most conducive to public convenience, best supported by the general principles and doctrines of the law, and most assimilated to the decisions, which bear analogy more or less directly to the subject." The same rule has been fully established by the supreme court of Tennessee, in the cases of M'Nairy v. Bell, and Mulherrin v. Hannum, 1 Yerg., 502, and 2 Yerg., 81, and the rule sustained and enforced upon the same principles and course of reasoning upon which the other cases referred to have been placed. And no case, in an American court, has fallen under our notice, where a contrary doctrine has been asserted and maintained. And it is to be observed, that most of the cases which have arisen in this country, where this question has been drawn into discussion, were upon promissory notes, where the place of payment was, of course, in the body of the note. After such a uniform course of decisions for at least thirty years, it would be inexpedient to change the rule, even if the grounds upon which it was originally established might be questionable; which, however, we do not mean to intimate. It is of the utmost importance that all rules relating to commercial law should be stable and uniform. They are adopted for practical purposes, to regulate the course of business in commercial transactions; and the rule here established is well calculated for the convenience and safety of all parties.

§ 1541. Place of payment of a note.

The place of payment in a promissory note, or in an acceptance of a bill of exchange, is always matter of arrangement between the parties for their mutual accommodation, and may be stipulated in any manner that may best suit their convenience. And when a note or bill is made payable at a bank, as is generally the case, it is well known that, according to the usual course of business, the note or bill is lodged at the bank for collection; and, if the maker or acceptor calls to take it up when it falls due, it will be delivered to him, and the business is closed. But, should he not find his note or bill at the bank, he can deposit his money to meet the note when presented; and should he be afterwards prosecuted, he would be exonerated from all costs and damages, upon proving such tender and deposit. Or, should the note or bill be made payable at some place other than a bank, and no deposit could be made, or he should choose to retain his money in his own possession, an offer to pay at the time and place would protect him against interest and costs, on bringing the money into court; so that no practical inconvenience or hazard can result from the establishment of this rule to the maker or acceptor. But, on the other hand, if a presentment of the note and demand of payment at the time and place are indispensable to the right of action, the holder might hazard the entire loss of his whole debt.

The next point presents the question as to the effect and operation of the proceedings under the attachment law of Alabama, as disclosed by the plea puis darrein continuance. The plea shows that the proceedings on the attachment were instituted after the commencement of this suit. The jurisdiction of the district court of the United States, and the right of the plaintiff to prosecute his suit in that court, having attached, that right could not be arrested or taken away by any proceedings in another court. This would produce a collision in the jurisdiction of courts that would extremely embarrass the administration of justice. If the attachment had been conducted to a conclusion, and the money recovered of the defendant before the commencement of the present suit, there can be no doubt that it might have been set up as a payment upon the note in question. And if the defendant would have been protected, pro tanto, under a recovery had by virtue of the attachment, and could have pleaded such recovery in bar, the same principle would support a plea in abatement of an attachment pending prior to the commencement of the present suit. The attachment of the debt, in such case, in the hands of the defendant, would fix it there in favor of the attaching creditor, and the defendant could not afterwards pay it over to the plaintiff. The attaching creditor would, in such case, acquire a lien upon the debt, binding upon the defendant, and which the courts of all other governments, if they recognize such proceedings at all, could not fail to regard. If this doctrine be well founded, the priority of suit will determine the right. The rule must be reciprocal; and where the suit in one court is commenced prior to the institution of proceedings under attachment in another court, such proceedings cannot arrest the suit; and the maxim, qui prior est tempore, potior est jure, must govern the case. This is the doctrine of this court in the case of Renner v. Marshall, 1 Wheat., 216, and also in the case of Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Maryland, 12 Pet., 102; and is in conformity with the rule that prevails in other courts in this country, as well as in the English courts; and is essential to the protection of the rights of the garnishee; and will avoid all collisions in the proceedings of different courts, having the same subject matter before them. 5 Johns., 100; 9 Johns., 221, and the cases there cited. In the case now before the court, the suit was commenced prior to the institution of proceedings under the attachment. The plea was, therefore, bad, and the demurrer properly sustained.

§ 1543. Plea puis darrein continuance waives prior pleas.

The remaining inquiry is, whether the judgment, by nil dicit, for the $675, was properly given after overruling the plea puis darrein continuance. The argument at the bar was that, as the attachment went only to a part of the debt, the case stood, as to the residue, upon the original plea of payment. The facts disclosed in the plea puis darrein continuance do not raise the question intended to be presented; for the defense set up in the plea puis darrein continuance goes to the whole cause of action, and leaves no part unanswered. And it may well be questioned whether such pleading ought to be sanctioned, even if the plea puis darrein continuance went only to a part of the cause of action. It would introduce great confusion on the record in the state of the pleadings. It is laid down in Bacon's Abridg., 6 Bac. Ab. by Gwillim, 377, that if, after a plea in bar, the defendant pleads a plea puis darrein continuance, this is a waiver of his bar, and no advantage shall be taken of anything in the bar. And it is added that it seems dangerous to plead any matter puis darrein continuance, unless you be well advised, because, if that matter be determined against you, it is a confession of the matter in issue. This rule was adopted in Kimball v. Huntington, 10 Wend., 679. The court say the plea puis darrein continuance waived all previous pleas, and on the record the cause of action was admitted to the same extent as if no other defense had been urged than that contained in this plea. In the case now before the court the oath of the defendant, taken in the proceedings on the attachment, is made a part of the plea puis darrein continuance. And he admits that he executed the note on which this suit is brought for $4,880. That he had paid on the note $372.34, and that the remainder of the note was due by him to the plaintiff. And if the $4,204 attached could not be deducted, the whole debt, according to his own admission, was due, except the $372.34 set up by him to have been paid; and the plaintiff remits upon the record $351.28, and the judgment will stand within a few dollars for the amount admitted by the defendant to be due. And this difference must arise from some error in the mere calculation, and may easily be corrected. The judgment of the court below is accordingly affirmed, with costs.

§ 1544. Arresting judgment; title of plaintiff.—The fact that at the trial plaintiff's name is indorsed on the back of the bill he sues upon is not ground for arresting judgment. The fact that the indorsement is not stricken out does not show that the plaintiff has no interest in the bill. Vowell v. Alexander,* 1 Cr. C. C., 38.

§ 1545. Surety.—Under a statute of Georgia, passed in 1826, which provides that the security or indorser of a promissory note or other instrument, after the same has become due, may require the holder to proceed to collect the same, and, if he does not do so within three months after such notice, the surety or indorser shall be no longer liable, does not apply where the principal is a resident of another state. The courts of Georgia having so decided, their decisions are binding on this court. Davie v. Hatcher, 1 Woods, 456.

§ 1546. Plaintiff not the owner.—It is a defense to an action on a promissory note that the plaintiff in whose possession the same is, is not the owner of it. Hartshorn v. Green,* 1 Minn., 92.

§ 1547. Forfeiture of stock.—A corporation that has forfeited the defendant's stock cannot recover payment of his note given before forfeiture for an unpaid assessment upon such stock. Neither can a party taking the note after maturity recover upon it. Ashton v. Burbank, 2 Dill., 435.

§ 1548. Duty to make settlement.—A note given provisionally and to abide a settlement between the maker and the payee cannot be sued upon by the payee until settlement; and this must be proved. McMicken v. Webb,* 6 How., 292.

§ 1549. Equitable interest in mortgage.—If a negotiable note and a mortgage to secure it be given a creditor to indemnify him, upon an agreement that they shall be retransferred when he has been indemnified, it is a conveyance in trust and not a legal mortgage. The maker of the note may acquire the equitable interest of the assignor and use it as a defense to an action on the note. Warren v. Emerson, 1 Curt., 239.

§ 1550. Omission to stamp.—An objection that the maker of a promissory note omitted to stamp it, with intent to defraud the government, and that therefore it was void, is not available on demurrer. Campbell v. Wilcox, 10 Wall., 421.

§ 1551. Ultra vires.—Two railway companies consolidated without statutory or charter authority so to do, and the president of the consolidated company gave a note in its name for the price of a steamboat to run in connection with the roads. Held, ultra vires, and notes not recoverable. Pearce v. Madison, etc., R. Co., 21 How., 441.

§ 1552. Refusal to allow purchaser of share to enter firm.—The fact that the remaining partners in a firm would not allow the purchaser of an aliquot share of a retiring partner to participate in the business is not a defense to an action on a note given for such share. Varnum v. Monroe, 2 Cr. C. C., 425.

§ 1553. Injury to stock in transit; set-off.—In an action on bills of exchange drawn for the price of transporting certain horses, an injury to such horses in transit is not a defense which can be set up in bar to the action. It must be set up, if at all, by way of set-off. Cent. Ohio R'y Co. v. Thompson, 2 Bond, 296.

§ 1554. Misappropriation.—A. accepted a draft for the accommodation of B. and for the special purpose of enabling B. to raise money to pay his indebtedness to C. Failing to negotiate the draft, B. induced C. to receive it for the amount he owed him, and for the further consideration of advances up to its full amount. B. agreed to take up the acceptance at maturity, and C. was informed of this agreement at the time of the transfer. The draft went to protest. Held, that there was no misappropriation of the acceptance; that the negotiation was for value, and in the usual course of business, and C. was held entitled to recover against A. Leach v. Lewis,* 1 MacArth., 112.

§ 1555. Set-off.—Debts due from the payee to the maker cannot be set off against a note discounted at the bank at which it is negotiable. Mandeville v. Union Bank of Georgetown,* 9 Cr., 9.

§ 1556. One of several defendants will not be allowed to introduce an account of his own as a counterclaim to defeat an action upon a joint and several promissory note given by all the defendants. Great Western Insurance Co. v. Pierce,* 1 Wyom. Ty., 45.

§ 1557. A Virginia statute provided that "assignments of bonds, bills and promissory notes, and other writings obligatory for payment of money or tobacco, shall be valid; and an assignee of any such may thereupon maintain an action of debt, but shall allow all just discounts not only against himself, but against the assignor before notice of the assignment was given to the defendant." The maker of a note, when sued upon it by an indorsee, set up a note given by the assignor as a set-off. It matured before the note sued upon became due. Held, a valid set-off. Stewart v. Anderson,* 6 Cr., 208.

§ 1558. Maker or payee has no right of set-off against indorsee. National Bank of Washington v. Texas,* 20 Wall., 72.

§ 1559. A stockholder of a bank having died insolvent and largely indebted to the United States, and also indebted to the bank as indorser of discounted notes, held, that the bank had no right to set off the dividends accruing on his stock against the notes. Brent v. Bank of Washington, 2 Cr. C. C., 517.

§ 1560. An acceptor of a bill cannot set off the bill against the claim of B., the indorser, on another bill which the indorser had paid, and upon which A. was the acceptor; both A. and B. being accommodation parties. Robinson v. Kilbreth,* 1 Bond, 592.

§ 1561. The defendant, in an action on a bill of exchange, may set off a claim he has upon the plaintiff for not having insured a particular sum on a vessel, as he was ordered and bound to do; the vessel being lost without insurance. De Taslet v. Crousellat, 1 Wash., 504.

§ 1562. Damages on bills paid by defendant for plaintiff may be set off in action on bill. Ibid.

§ 1563. Note of plaintiff may be set off against his claim for goods sold for cash. Stettinius v. Myer,* 4 Cr. C. C., 349.

X. LOST, DESTROYED OR STOLEN INSTRUMENTS.

SUMMARY — Non-negotiable instrument; bona fide holder, § 1564.

§ 1564. Certificates of money due A. under a convention between the United States and Mexico were issued to A. by the treasury department of the United States. Three of them, for $1,000 each, were indorsed by him in blank. They were (it was alleged but not proved) subsequently lost or stolen. A. advertised for them, and notified the treasury department not to pay them. Subsequently they were presented for payment by B., who took them from C. in good faith as collateral security for a debt due B. from C. Held, that such certificates, though not negotiable commercial paper, were nevertheless assignable by indorsement in blank; that as B. was a bona fide holder his title was good against A., but that B., being a pledgee, the certificates should be returned to A. upon his repaying B.'s advances to C., or, if A. refused to repay B. the amount of such advances, the certificates should be sold, the advances repaid to B., and the balance paid to A. Baldwin v. Ely, § 1565.

BALDWIN v. ELY.

Opinion by TANEY, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This case is brought here by appeal from the decision of the circuit court for the District of Columbia for the county of Washington, sitting as a court of chancery. The appellant filed his bill in that court, stating that large sums of money were awarded to him under the convention with Mexico, for which he obtained certificates, payable to him or his assigns, from the treasury department, according to the act of congress of September 1, 1841 (5 Stats. at Large, 452). That among these certificates were three for $1,000 each, numbered 989, 990 and 991; that upon the back of these certificates, among others, he wrote his name, but without any words of transfer or assignment, and continued to hold them as the lawful owner; and that while he thus held them, the said three certificates were either casually lost by him, or, as he verily believed, purloined or stolen. He states further that, upon discovering their loss, he gave notice of it to the secretary of the treasury, who agreed to suspend payment in case they should be presented, until an opportunity should be afforded him to regain possession of them, or to assert his right by some legal proceeding; but that he had been unable to discover where these certificates were, or who held them, until a short time before the bill was filed, when he received notice from the department that they had been presented for payment on behalf of the appellee, and would be paid accordingly, unless sufficient grounds for refusing should be furnished by the appellant; and that, as the appellee resided out of the District of Columbia, and his agent was a member of congress, and therefore not liable to arrest, he was without remedy except by the aid of the court to obtain a discovery of the right and title which Ely, the appellee, possessed, or under which he claimed; and prayed that he might be required to prove and show how the certificates were procured from the appellant, and for what consideration, and when and where, and to produce them before the court, and be compelled by its decree to deliver them to the complainant.

The appellee appeared and put in his answer, in which he states that these certificates, indorsed in blank by the appellant, were delivered to him by a certain Perry G. Gardiner, to be held as security for loans and advances previously made by the appellee to the said Gardiner, and also for such further loans and advances as he might thereafter make. He further states that he afterwards made sundry advances, which he particularly mentions, and that he has altogether advanced to Gardiner $2,077, for which he holds these certificates. He further states that, at the time he took them, he believed, from Gardiner's representations, that he was the owner, and had no knowledge or suspicion of any circumstance that could invalidate his title. And, further, that he is informed, and believes, and charges, that they were indorsed with the express intention of passing by such indorsement a perfect title to Gardiner, and handed by the appellant to him that he might go into the market and negotiate them, and apply the proceeds in payment of a debt due from Baldwin to him. The transactions between the appellee and Gardiner are set out in the answer much more particularly and in detail than is here stated, and a great portion of it is taken up in stating a transaction between him and Gardiner concerning a pledge of other certificates, upon which a large portion of the advances now due were originally made, and explaining how these three certificates became finally pledged for the whole amount loaned by the respondent, and the others released. But it is unnecessary to state these particulars here, because we see nothing in the case to impeach the fairness and good faith of the appellee, and the summary above given is sufficient to show the issues upon which this controversy must be decided. Gardiner was examined as a witness on the part of the appellee, and sustains in every respect the statement in the answer. But his testimony is objected to by the appellant, first, upon the ground that he is interested, and therefore incompetent; and secondly, that if he is competent, he is not worthy of credit. It is not necessary to express an opinion upon the validity of either of these objections, for the admission or rejection of his testimony would not change the equity of the case.

§ 1565. Bona fide pledgee of government certificates that were, after assignment in blank, lost or stolen, held to have a good title against original owner.

Putting aside, therefore, the testimony of Gardiner, it appears from the bill and answer that the appellee is in possession of these certificates, claiming title to them as assignee. The act of congress directs that such certificates shall be made payable to the person entitled under the award of the commissioners, his legal representatives or assigns, and the certificates in question were issued in conformity to the law, and made payable to the party, his legal representatives or assigns, upon the surrender of the certificates at the department. They are therefore legally transferable by assignment, and no particular form of assignment is prescribed. The certificates in question were indorsed in blank by the appellant, and that indorsement would be altogether useless and unmeaning, unless made for the purpose of transferring the property to an assignee, and authorizing any person entitled to it in that character to write over his name a formal and regular assignment, if it should become necessary, or he should deem it his interest to do so. The holders of certificates of this description, thus indorsed in blank, have always been recognized at the treasury department as assignees, without any formal assignment, and the money due on the certificate paid to them, except only when doubts were entertained of the genuineness of the indorsement, or notice given that the title of the holder was disputed. Neither the law nor the usages of the department require that the indorsement or assignment should be attested by a witness. There is nothing, therefore, in the form and character of the indorsement calculated to awaken suspicion that the appellee had obtained them unfairly. The handwriting of the appellant is admitted, and the indorsement is according to the usage sanctioned by the department at which they are to be paid. His possession, therefore, upon established principles of law, is prima facie evidence that he is entitled to the property until the contrary appears. A different rule would put in jeopardy the title to a great portion of this scrip, which has been fairly purchased for a valuable consideration. For it has been a common article of traffic, and much of it has passed through a variety of hands, with no other evidence of an assignment to the holder but the indorsement in blank of the original payee. We do not mean to say that these certificates are to be regarded as commercial instruments, to be regulated by the commercial law, and that the holder is entitled to all the rights which belong to a bona fide indorsee of a promissory note. He certainly is not. They are, however, property, and the legal right to them may, under the act of congress, be transferred to another, like the right to any other property. And the possession of them by the appellee, with the customary form of assignment indorsed upon them, in the handwriting of the party to whom they were originally issued, entitles him to the benefit of the legal presumptions in favor of his right which always arise from possession, until proof is offered to the contrary. Now the appellant offers no proof that the certificates were lost or stolen, as charged in his bill, nor any proof that they remained in his possession after he indorsed them, nor any evidence that the indorsement was made for any other purpose than that which it imports, that is, for the purpose of transferring it to another person.

It is true that it appears from the testimony of witnesses to whom there can be no objection, that these certificates were advertised by the appellant as having been improperly obtained from him, and that his advertisement appeared in some newspaper before they were pledged the second time to Ely. But the advertisement is no evidence of the fact stated in it, and there is no reason to believe that it came to the knowledge of the appellee before the last transaction between him and Gardiner. And if Gardiner's testimony is rejected, there is no evidence in the case to support the allegations in the appellant's bill, nor any ground upon which he can entitle himself to the relief he asks for. Besides, the object of the appellant's bill is for discovery as well as relief, and to obtain from the appellee a discovery of the right and title which he possesses, or under which he claims. The answer, therefore, is responsive to the bill when it states the transactions with Gardiner, and the circumstances under which he received the certificates, and the advances he made upon them. And it is entitled to all the weight which the rules of equity give to an answer when it is responsive to the bill and speaks of facts within the personal knowledge of the respondent.

The case of Williamson v. Thomson, 16 Ves. Jr., 442, relied on by the appellant, depended on different principles. The East India certificate in dispute in that case was not by law assignable, and the order indorsed upon it by the party to whom it was issued, to pay the amount to another, did not transfer the legal right to the money. It might pass the equitable title, if so intended, but nothing more. The decision turned upon the meaning and intention of the indorsement. The court of chancery was called upon to expound it, and to determine, from the evidence, whether it was intended as a transfer of the equitable right, or as an authority merely to receive the money as the agent of the original payee, and for his use. The court determined that he took it in the latter character, but upon evidence which presented a case altogether unlike the one now before us.

The decree of the circuit court dismissing the bill cannot, however, be sustained. The appellee admits that he did not purchase the certificates from Gardiner, but took them as security for the money loaned. Consequently, the appellant is entitled to redeem, upon payment of the advances stated in the answer, with interest upon the several sums from the time they were respectively loaned. The decree of the court below must, therefore, be reversed, with the costs in this court, and the case remanded, with directions to cause an account to be stated in conformity to this opinion, and to pass a decree requiring the certificates to be delivered to the appellant upon his paying or tendering to the appellee the amount found to be due, and in case the money is not paid or tendered by a day to be fixed by the circuit court, then the certificates to be sold, and the proceeds apportioned between the parties in the manner herein directed. In taking the account, the appellee is to be allowed the whole amount of the loans and advances to Gardiner, for which these three certificates were ultimately left in pledge. And as the appellant did not offer to redeem them, and insisted on their absolute redelivery to him, the court think that, under the circumstances as they appear in the record, the appellee is equitably entitled to his costs in the circuit court, and they are accordingly in the account to be charged against the appellant. But as regards the costs in this court, the appellant, by the established rules and practice of the court, is entitled to recover them, and they must be charged against the appellee. A mandate will be issued to the circuit court in conformity with this opinion.

§ 1566. Note destroyed by holder.—The plaintiff sued for a sum due on settlement, but alleged that he had destroyed the note. On exception to the petition, Woods, J., delivered the following opinion: The exception must be sustained. Applying the rule that a pleading should be most strongly construed against the pleader, the petition in effect avers a voluntary destruction by the plaintiff of the evidence of the debt, to recover which his suit is brought. In such a case there can be no recovery, based either on the instrument itself or on the debt, which was the consideration for which the instrument was given. (Angell v. Felton, 8 Johns., 149; Vanauken v. Hornbeck, 2 Green (N. J.), 179; Fisher v. Mershong, 3 Bibb, 527; Blade v. Noland, 12 Wend., 173; "Joannes" v. Bennett, 5 Allen, 173; Broadwell v. Styles, 3 Halst. N. J. L., 58; Rev. Civil Code, art. 2279; Code Nap., art. 1348; Nagel v. Mignot, 7 Martin, 657). Booth v. Smith, 3 Woods, 19.

§ 1567. Recovery on one-half of bank note.—Where half of a bank note is lost, the holder may recover the whole amount on indemnifying the bank. Armat v. The Bank, *2 Cr. C. C., 180.

§ 1568. A bank note was cut in two, one-half of it sent by one mail and the other half by another subsequent mail, to the same person. One half failed to reach him. Held, that he might recover the whole amount of the note, on presenting one-half of it and showing the loss of the other half. Bullet v. Bank of Pennsylvania, 2 Wash., 172.

§ 1569. Assignee to sue; loss of note; recovery.—A note indorsed merely to enable the indorsee to collect it, and which has been lost, may be recovered upon for the benefit of the original promisee, in the name of the assignee. Leavitt v. Cowles, 2 McL., 491.

§ 1570. Stolen notes; recovery by owner; notice; record of; custom.—A bank purchased treasury notes overdue, and after notice that they had been stolen. In an action to recover them the bank attempted to prove that it was not the custom of dealers in government securities to keep records of those alleged to have been stolen. Held, that the owners might recover the notes, and that bankers and others could not establish a custom in their own interest which would contravene the established commercial law as to the rights of those who buy overdue paper. Vermilye v. Adams Ex. Co., 21 Wall., 138.

§ 1571. Indemnity.—The indorsee of a lost bill of exchange cannot recover against the payee without tendering indemnity, and making demand upon the drawer for a new bill. Riggs v. Graeff, *2 Cr. C. C., 298.

§ 1572. Proof of genuineness.—Bank notes and drafts stolen from a letter are sufficiently proved if the person sending them is able to state that they were fair upon their faces, appeared genuine, and passed as instruments of value. United States v. Keen, 1 McL., 429.

§ 1573. Accounting for non-production.—It is sufficient to account for the non-production of bills to show that they are in England on file in a bankruptcy court. Palmer v. Blight, *2 Wash., 96.

§ 1574. A note was delivered to a person. It was proved that he was afterwards assassinated by insurrectionary negroes, that it was their custom to destroy the papers of those they assassinated, and that the town where the person lived was burned. Held, insufficient to establish the loss of the note so as to permit secondary evidence of its contents to be introduced. Evidence of the burning of such person's house should have been introduced. Vuyton v. Brenell, 1 Wash., 469.

§ 1575. Evidence that drafts are among the papers of a former holder, to whom they were paid by the payee, and cannot be found or are lost, and that they are the property of the payee, is sufficient after long lapse of time without their being produced by other parties, to entitle the payee to recover. Fremont v. United States, *4 Ct. Cl., 252.

§ 1576. To establish that certain drafts were lost it was shown that they were given to a receiver, to whom and others likely to have them application had been made for them without success. Held, insufficient evidence of the loss, no evidence being given that application or search had been made for them in the court that appointed the receiver, and to which the drafts were likely to have been returned by him with other papers. Rogers v. Durant, * 16 Otto, 644.

§ 1577. An indorser is a competent witness against his immediate indorsee to prove a written agreement made between them, but destroyed by fire, that the indorsement was made pro forma merely to pass title to the paper, and that, notwithstanding his indorsement, the indorser should not be liable as such. Davis v. Brown, 4 Otto, 423 (§§ 1410-15).

§ 1578. Secondary evidence.—Secondary evidence of the contents of a note indorsed in blank, which had been put into an attorney's hands for collection, but which could not be found after his death, held, admissible. Patriotic Bank v. Little, 2 Cr. C. C., 627.

§ 1579. Parol evidence is admissible to show the contents of a note canceled and surrendered to the maker. Bank of Washington v. Pierson, 2 Cr. C. C., 685.

§ 1580. Where a note was claimed to be lost, and a witness swore to having presented the note to one of the makers for payment, who admitted the note to be due, and that he lost the note, and the plaintiff also produced what purported to be a notarial copy of the same note, held, that the copy was admissible, and, taken in connection with the witness' testimony, afforded a presumption that the note copied by the notary was the same that the witness presented for payment. Peabody v. Denton, 2 Gall., 351.

§ 1581. Secondary evidence is not admissible to prove the contents of a written instrument without first showing that it is not in possession of the person offering the evidence, and this rule is not affected by the statute dispensing with proof of execution except where it is denied by affidavit. Sebree v. Dorr, 9 Wheat., 553.

§ 1582. It need not be proved that a note was destroyed, in order to introduce secondary evidence of it. Proof that it is lost, mislaid or cannot be found is enough—the party offering secondary evidence not being in fault. And secondary evidence of the note need not be a notarial copy of the note, nor need such loss be alleged in the declaration in order to admit secondary proof. Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 581 (§§ 754-759).

XI. PARTNERSHIP PAPER.

SUMMARY — Note by one partner; bona fide holder, §§ 1583, 1584.

§ 1583. Notes payable at bank are governed by the law merchant in Alabama, and an indorsee of a note for value, without notice, and before maturity, takes it free of equities which might have been urged against his indorser, such as that the note was issued by one partner in the firm name after a dissolution and in fraud of his copartners. Smyth v. Strader, §§ 1585-1593.

§ 1584. A partner cannot testify, as against an innocent indorsee of his firm's note, that it was issued by one partner in fraud of himself and other copartners after the firm had been dissolved. Ibid.

SMYTH v. STRADER.

(4 Howard, 404-420. 1845.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Alabama.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MCLEAN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff brought his action as the second indorsee of two promissory notes in favor of E. Stevenson, purporting to be signed by Strader, Perrine & Co., which partnership consisted of Daniel P. Strader, James Perrine, E. Stevenson and John H. Woodcock. The notes were assigned by Stevenson to Stinson and Campbell, of New Orleans, and by them to the plaintiff. Stevenson died before the commencement of the suit, and the process was served only on Perrine and Woodcock. At the fall term of 1842, Woodcock pleaded a discharge under the bankrupt law, and Perrine pleaded that the partnership of Strader, Perrine & Co. commenced in November, 1835, and that in December of the same year he withdrew from it. That at the time of leaving the firm he sold, for $1,000, his interest to Stevenson, who, by Stinson and Campbell, through one Primrose, paid him the above sum; and that they knew of his withdrawal. That the notes were antedated, and were not in possession of Stinson and Campbell, or assigned to them, till after the 17th of May, 1836. Issues being joined on these pleas, the case was submitted to a jury, who found in favor of Perrine, and that Woodcock had been discharged under the bankrupt law.

The questions for decision arise on a bill of exceptions, taken by the plaintiff. The plaintiff proved, by the deposition of Hood, that Stevenson was a member of the firm of Strader, Perrine & Co., and that he executed the notes, and that they are dated before any public notice was given of the dissolution of the firm. That the firm of Stinson and Campbell were indebted to the plaintiff, in a large sum, in the summer of 1831; and that in part payment, the notes, before maturity, were assigned to him, for which a credit on their account was entered. And here the plaintiff's evidence closed. The defendant Perrine proved "that he withdrew from the firm the 6th of December, 1835, but that there was no public advertisement, giving notice of the dissolution of the firm, until the 23d of April, 1836, although the fact was known to Stinson and Campbell at the time of Perrine's withdrawal." The defendant also proved, by John Test, that in August, 1836, he saw in the hands of the plaintiff's agent an account current between him and the firm of Stinson and Campbell; that he made a copy of the same, which he produced, and from which it appeared that no credit had been entered for the notes sued on.

§ 1585. Notes payable at a bank are governed by the law merchant in Alabama. An indorsee of a note for value without notice, and before its maturity, is not affected by fraud in its inception.

The plaintiff's counsel moved the court to exclude from the jury all testimony as to the transactions between Stevenson and the firm of Stinson and Campbell, or between Stevenson and the other members of the firm of Strader, Perrine & Co., there being no proof of any notice to the plaintiff of any of these matters insisted on by the defendant in his defense. But the court overruled the motion, and "instructed the jury, that if they believed the said notes were made by Stevenson, without the knowledge and consent of his partners, and that he passed them off to the said Stinson and Campbell without the knowledge or consent of his partners, and that if the said Stinson and Campbell, at the time of their receiving the notes, knew that, prior to that time, to wit, on the 6th of December, 1835, Perrine had withdrawn from said firm, and was not then a partner, and that if it was also proved to them that the said notes were passed to the said Stinson and Campbell by Stevenson for his individual benefit, and not for the interest and benefit of the said firm, and that this was known to the said Stinson and Campbell when they received the said notes, that then the jury must find for Perrine, the defendant." To the above ruling and instruction, exceptions were taken by the plaintiff. From the instruction of the court, it appears the notes in controversy were considered as governed by the law merchant. By the Alabama statute of 1812 (Clay's Dig., 381), the assignee of "bonds, obligations, bills single, promissory notes, and all other writings for the payment of money," may sue in his own name; but all equities and grounds of defense remain open as fully as though the instrument had not been assigned, until the defendant had notice of the assignment. But by the act of 1828, Clay's Dig., 383, it is provided "that the same remedy on bills of exchange, foreign and inland, and on promissory notes payable in bank, shall be governed by the law merchant as to days of grace, protest and notice;" and, by the succeeding section, all other contracts for the payment of money, etc., are made "assignable as heretofore, and the assignee may maintain such suit thereon as the obligee or payee could have done, whether it be debt, covenant or assumpsit." The phraseology of this section would seem to place all other instruments, for the payment of money, etc., on a different footing from those described in the preceding section. The provision of that section appears only to relate to the remedy on bills of exchange and promissory notes payable at bank under the law merchant, as regards the days of "grace, protest and notice." But as the following section defines the rights of the assignee of "all other contracts in writing for the payment of money," etc., it may perhaps be fairly inferred that the legislature intended the negotiability and character of the instruments above named should be regulated by the general commercial law. Such seems to be the opinion of the supreme court of Alabama. In the case of M'Donald v. Husted, 3 Ala., 297, it was held "that a note made negotiable and payable at bank is not subject to offset in the hands of a bona fide indorsee, who has acquired it previous to maturity, although it has never been negotiated at the bank where it is made payable." Also in Beal v. Wainwright, 6 Ala., 156, the same principle is recognized.

§ 1586. Firm bound by frauds of a member.

However fairly Stevenson may have acted in the execution of these notes payable to himself, it is clear that he could not have sustained on them an action at law. A partner of a firm cannot, at law, sue it, for that would be to sue himself. But a bona fide assignee of Stevenson might maintain an action. Jones v. Yates, 9 Barn. & Cress., 532; Bosanquet v. Wray, 6 Taunt., 597; Aubert v. Maze, 2 Bos. & Pull., 371; Smith v. Lusher, 5 Cow., 688. Stevenson, in executing the notes to himself, under the circumstances proved, committed a fraud against his partners; and this fraud was greatly aggravated if, as alleged, he antedated the notes so as to charge Perrine as partner. That he assigned the notes to Stinson and Campbell, if for any consideration, for one that was personal to himself, and wholly disconnected with the partnership, is not controverted. These facts, or a part of them, of which Stinson and Campbell must have had knowledge, would have defeated a recovery by them. Every "contract in the name of the firm, in order to bind the partnership, must not only be within the scope of the business of the partnership, but it must be made with a party who has no knowledge or notice that the partner is acting in violation of his obligations and duties to the firm, or for purposes disapproved of by the firm, or in fraud of the firm." Story on Partnership, 193. This rule as well applies to the indorsement of negotiable instruments as to other contracts. But the fraud of Stevenson, and the knowledge of that fraud by Stinson and Campbell, do not necessarily defeat the plaintiff's action. And the charge of the court on this point was clearly erroneous. If, before the maturity of the notes, in the due course of business, and without any knowledge of the circumstances of their execution and first indorsement, the plaintiff received them, he may be entitled to recover, notwithstanding the fraud. By "forming a partnership the partners declare themselves to the world satisfied with the good faith and integrity of each other, and impliedly undertake to be responsible for what they will respectively do within the scope of the partnership concerns." Story on Partnership, 161. On this principle the firm is bound for the frauds committed by one of its partners. Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third person, the rule is just, that he shall suffer who reposed the higher confidence and credit in such person.

§ 1587. Taking note with notice of defenses.

But if the plaintiff received these notes after their maturity, he holds them subject to all the defenses which might have been set up against them in the hands of Stinson and Campbell. Or, if he received them out of the ordinary course of business, without consideration, or under circumstances which authorize an inference that he had knowledge of the fraud in their execution or their first indorsement, he cannot recover. These are matters of evidence for the jury.

The testimony of John Test, which was excepted to, we think was rightfully admitted. He proved that in August, 1836, he saw in the hands of an agent of the plaintiff an account current between him and the firm of Stinson and Campbell. That he copied the account, which copy he exhibited, and from which it did not appear that a credit had been entered for the notes in controversy. As this, compared with the evidence of the plaintiff, might conduce to disprove the consideration alleged to have been paid for the notes by the plaintiff, it was properly admitted. The relevancy of the deposition of Charles, which was also excepted to, is not very apparent. It shows that Stinson and Campbell, in 1836, drew a large amount of drafts on the plaintiff, in part payment of drafts which he had previously drawn on them. This drawing and redrawing constituted no part of the account current spoken of by Test, but at the foot of the account a memorandum was made of these drafts. As this deposition conduced to show the nature of the accounts between the plaintiff and the firm of Stinson and Campbell, no very strong objection is perceived to its admission as evidence. It could not have misled the jury.

The deposition of Strader, which was also excepted to by the plaintiff, was not admissible under the decisions of this court. He was one of the firm of Strader, Perrine & Co., and his testimony conduced to show the fraud of Stevenson in the execution of the notes. In the case of the Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 57, this court said: "It is a well settled principle that no one who is a party to a negotiable note shall be permitted, by his own testimony, to invalidate it." The same principle was held in Bank of Metropolis v. Jones, 8 Pet., 12. This was decided in the case of Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term R., 296; and although that decision was overruled by the king's bench in the case of Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, 7 Term R., 601, this court, in the cases cited, and in several subsequent cases, have established the rule as above stated. In the state courts there is a great diversity of judgment on this point. Strader was a party on the record, and that rendered him an incompetent witness. Scott v. Lloyd, 12 Pet., 149; Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet., 219.

Upon the whole, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed and a venire de novo awarded.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CATRON.

In this case my opinion is founded on considerations that differ so much from those proceeded on in the principal opinion that I am under the necessity of stating my own views, or of dissenting, which I am not prepared to do.

§ 1589. Firm note payable to partner valid only in hands of purchaser. Time of negotiation is true date of note.

In the first place, Stevenson had been one of the firm of Strader, Perrine & Co. He made the note payable to himself, and signed the name of the firm to it. Being both a maker and the payee, the note was void on its face, or at least could have no legal effect; when negotiated, that is, when it was indorsed by Stevenson and sold to Stinson and Campbell, it could only become a binding instrument in their hands on Strader, Perrine & Co., as Stinson and Campbell could enforce payment. The time of negotiation, therefore, is the true date of the note.

It is in proof that the firm of Strader, Perrine & Co. was dissolved on the 23d of April, 1836, and that the usual advertisement was then made of the fact. This bound all persons who had not had previous dealings with the firm; nor is there any proof found in the record showing that either Stinson and Campbell or Smyth, the plaintiff, had had any such dealings. If the note was negotiated, therefore, to Stinson and Campbell after the dissolution of the partnership, it was void, and does not bind Perrine, inasmuch as Stevenson had no power to bind him.

§ 1591. Partner who has withdrawn must charge bona fide purchaser of firm note with notice.

2. Perrine is proved to have withdrawn from the firm in December, 1835. But as no regular notice was given of this fact, it rests on him to bring home knowledge of it to the holder of the paper. If Stinson and Campbell had knowledge when they took the note from Stevenson, then they could not have recovered from Perrine on it. So again, if Stinson and Campbell took the note from Stevenson in discharge of the individual debt of the latter, they could not recover from Perrine, whether he was or was not a partner at the date of its negotiation. The proof of either of these events is imposed on the plaintiff. But having shown either of the last two circumstances, then the plaintiff is bound to prove "under what circumstances or for what value he became the holder." I need only refer to Chitty on Bills (9th ed.), 648, for the established rule. If the plaintiff fails to show in such case that he came by the note in the due course of trade and before it fell due, then the defendant is entitled to a verdict.

§ 1592. Where one member of a dissolved firm fraudulently signs a note in the firm name, the evidence of other members is competent to show the fraud.

3. In regard to the question of the competency of Strader's evidence, I have found much difficulty. The competency of Strader to depose, in the principal opinion, is held to be governed by the cases of United States Bank v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51, and Bank of Metropolis v. Jones, 8 Pet., 12. In the one case, Carr, the first indorser, was introduced by the second indorser, Dunn, who was sued, to make out a defense. In the second case Jones, the indorser and defendant, introduces Mr. Blake, the maker of the note, to establish a defense; and in each instance this court held that the witness was incompetent to invalidate the negotiable paper to which he was a party; and the decision in Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term R., 296, was followed. Of this case Mr. Chitty says (669): "Though it was formerly held that no party should be permitted to give testimony to invalidate an instrument he had signed, a contrary rule now prevails;" and refers to Bent v. Baker, 3 Term R., 36, and Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, 7 Term R., 601. "The general rule is," says Chitty, "that it is no objection to the competency of a witness that he is also a party to the same bill or note, unless he be directly interested in the event of the suit, and he be called in support of such interest, or unless the verdict, to obtain which his testimony is offered, would be admissible evidence in his favor in another suit." This was the principle on which the cases of Bent v. Baker and Jordaine v. Lashbrooke proceeded. By the statute of 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 42, § 26, for the amendment of the law, the rule was enlarged so as to let in parties to negotiable paper as witnesses for or against whom the verdict and judgment might be evidence, the statute providing that the record should not be evidence for or against them. And thus the law of evidence, in this regard, now stands in the courts of Great Britain. It is also settled, and had been, long before 1832, when the decision in the Bank of the United States v. Dunn was made, in a large majority of the states of this Union, in accordance with the principles laid down in Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, and Bent v. Baker; and the question now is for this court to determine how far the United States circuit courts, when acting in the states, shall enforce the doctrine laid down in Dunn's case, and which was very properly applied in that of Jones. The decision is: "That no man who is a 'party' to the note or bill shall, by his own evidence, invalidate it." But suppose he is no party to it, and that his name has been put on it, or to it, by forgery, and he is called on by another to establish that the defendant's name was forged, as well as that of the witness, is he then competent? He gave no credit to the paper; and, if the evidence of all those who could prove the defense is cut off, by the mere name appearing, nothing more would be required to effectuate the fraud than to put on the names of all persons who could prove the fraud. In such an instance, I feel sure the rule laid down by this court does not apply. Nor can I, satisfactorily to my own mind, distinguish the case put from one where a fraudulent note is made in the name of a firm by one of the original partners, after the dissolution of the partnership, when he had no authority to use the name of those he attempts to bind. Indeed, it is difficult to say that Stevenson was not guilty of forgery, if he made the notes and passed them off to Stinson and Campbell, after the dissolution of the partnership, in discharge of his own debt, and with the intention to defraud his former partners. In the cases that have heretofore come before this court, the witnesses proved in advance that they gave credit to the paper by signing their names; and that they were, beyond dispute, parties to it, as well as the defendant.

§ 1593. Rules for the admission of evidence; state laws.

The principle assumed in Walton v. Shelley is in violation of one of the most familiar and general principles of evidence known to courts of justice; that is to say, that any person of sufficient age and sanity can be a competent witness to depose in any cause where he is not directly interested in the event of the suit. To this rule there are exceptions, but they are almost uniformly favorable to the admission of the testimony, are of comparatively recent origin, founded on experience, and conducive to the due administration of justice in a high degree. Again, the act of May 19, 1828 (4 Stats. at Large, 278), declares that "the forms and modes of proceeding in suits in the courts of the United States (in states admitted into the Union since 1789), in those of common law, shall be the same in each of those states respectively as are now used in the highest court of original and general jurisdiction of the same." That the court below proceeded, in the admission of Strader as a witness, according to the modes of proceeding in the circuit courts of the state of Alabama, is not questioned. The method and manner of administering justice in the state courts is the mode referred to in the act of congress, as I understand it; and I cannot resist the conclusion that the modes prescribed by the act of congress to the federal courts held in that state embrace the rules in regard to the competency of evidence; without evidence there can be no proceedings; rules for its admission are indispensable; these rules must be derived from some authority; from statutes they cannot be, and therefore congress has said the state courts shall furnish them to the foreign tribunals administering the laws there, and this for the plain reason that the measure of justice shall be the same in the foreign that it is in the domestic tribunals, and evidence is the measure of justice in great part. There can be no objection to the competency of Strader because he was a party of record. The original writ issued against him and Perrine jointly; but Strader was not found, and a nolle prosequi was entered as to him, and Perrine was declared against alone. I concur that the charge of the circuit court was erroneous in so far as it assumed that the instruments sued on were subject to the same equities in the hands of Smyth that they were when held by Stinson and Campbell. The courts of Alabama have construed the statutes of that state affecting negotiable paper, and held they did not apply to notes payable in bank; of which description are the ones sued on. The charge, therefore, violated the commercial rule that the innocent indorsee takes the paper discharged of a previous infirmity.

§ 1594. Drawing and accepting bills.—A member of a trading firm may draw bills of exchange, although the firm are also engaged in farming. Kimbrow v. Bullitt, 22 How., 256.

§ 1595. Where an acceptance is made in a firm name by one member of the firm, without the knowledge or privity of his copartners, a taker of such bill, with notice of this fact, cannot sue the partners jointly; but he may sue the one who accepted the bill, and he may sue all if he has no notice of the partner's want of authority to bind the firm. City Bank of Columbus v. Beach, * 1 Blatch., 438.

§ 1596. Bona fide holder's rights.—If the indorsee of a bill receive it before due, and without notice of the fact that it was drawn by the payee, who was a partner in two firms, in the name of one of the firms, and accepted by the payee, in the name of the other firm, for his individual debt, the holder may recover from either the drawers or the acceptors. Babcock v. Stone, 8 McL., 172.

§ 1597. Right to sue firm for partner's note.—A person who advances money upon a note signed by one of several partners, knowing that it is for the use of the firm, cannot, on this ground, sue the other partners. In re Herrick, * 13 N. B. R., 312.

§ 1598. Ratification by firm.—A bill was drawn by A., charged to a firm of which he was a member. Held, that if A. exceeded his authority at the time of drawing, a subsequent ratification by the firm would inure to the benefit of persons who had advanced money or acted on the faith of A.'s representations. Van Reimsdyk v. Kane, 1 Gall., 630.

§ 1599. Unauthorized accommodation note of firm not provable against its assets in bankruptcy.—An accommodation note indorsed by a partner in his firm's name for the benefit of the maker, but without the consent of the firm, is not provable against the assets of the firm. In re Irving, * 17 N. B. R., 22.

§ 1600. Renewal note.—A note given by a partner in the firm name after dissolution, but in renewal of a note given during the existence of the firm, is valid. Greatrake v. Brown, 2 Cr. C. C., 541.

§ 1601. Notes given creditor by partners; firm liability.—The creditor of a firm of three persons took the notes of the firm, indorsed by one of the partners, for a part of his debt, and for the balance took three several notes, each made by one of the copartners, and indorsed by the other two. The firm was adjudicated bankrupt. The creditor proved his debt against the makers of the four notes. Held, that he had a right to dividends as against the joint and separate estates of the bankrupts, and that the partners, in respect to the notes made and indorsed by them in their individual names, were accommodation makers or indorsers for the firm, which, as between the copartners and in equity, was the principal debtor. Mead v. National Bank of Fayetteville, 6 Blatch., 180.

§ 1602. Misappropriation by partner.—The right of an innocent holder of a firm note or bill is not affected by the fact that one of the partners misappropriated the proceeds. Kimbrow v. Bullitt, 22 How., 256; Winship v. United States Bank, 5 Pet., 529.

§ 1603. Retired partner.—After the dissolution of a firm the partner who assumed the business and liabilities executed his draft and applied the proceeds to pay the firm debts. Held, that a holder of the draft could have no claim upon it against the retired partner on account of the use to which the proceeds of the draft were put. Le Roy v. Johnson, 2 Pet., 186.

§ 1604. Liability of firm on partner's draft.—Where one of several partners was authorized by the firm, if he should be deficient in funds for certain purposes, to take up money on the joint account of the firm, and, if necessary, to draw upon C., in Amsterdam, and bills were drawn by the partner, signed by himself, but directing the amount to be charged to the firm, held, that in equity one who advanced money on the faith of the joint credit was entitled to recover against all the partners. Van Reimsdyk v. Kane, 1 Gall., 680.

§ 1605. Indorsements.—Evidence that by the articles of copartnership one partner has no authority to bind the firm by indorsing commercial paper is not admissible to defeat a bona fide holder, for value and without notice of such articles, of a note indorsed in the firm name by one of the partners. Michigan Bank v. Eldred, 9 Wall., 544 (§§ 250-255).

§ 1606. Notes indorsed in the firm name are presumed to have been drawn on account of the firm, and a bank that discounts them in good faith can collect them of the firm, even if they were made by one partner without authority, unless the bank has notice of the excess of authority. Lemoine v. Bank of North America, 3 Dill., 44 (§§ 428-431).

§ 1607. Note of partner held his individual note.—A silent partner in a firm advanced money to the active partner, took his demand notes therefor, and indorsed and delivered them to a third party who furnished the funds advanced by the silent to the active member. The firm became insolvent and was dissolved, the active partner taking the stock and assuming all liabilities. The third person then gave up the notes to the active partner and took from him renewal notes secured by mortgage on the stock. Held, that the first notes given by the active partner were his separate notes, and that, being payable on demand, were subject to the same equities in the hands of the indorsee as in the hands of the payee. In re White, 1 Low., 207.

§ 1608. Diligence.—A partner of the payees of a bill is not personally bound to active diligence to collect it, although he has funds of the drawee in his possession. Barnes v. Ryder,* 3 McL., 374.

BALCH v. COLMAN.

(Circuit Court for Indiana: 2 McLean, 85-87. 1840.)

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action was brought on a promissory note for $536, payable at the Lafayette Bank, with the rate of exchange between the place of payment and the city of New York.

§ 1620. Exchange to be estimated with reference to specie values.

At the time the note was given the Lafayette Bank, and the other banks of Indiana, redeemed their notes with specie; but having suspended specie payments for some months past, a question was raised, what shall be the rate of exchange which the plaintiff has a right to demand. Shall it be the present rate of difference between the depreciated currency of the state and funds in New York; or, shall it be the ordinary rate of exchange between specie, or its equivalent, at Lafayette, and funds in the city of New York? The judgment of this court is not given to be discharged in depreciated currency. The plaintiff has a right to demand specie, or its equivalent; and we cannot regard the amount, which he has a right to recover by way of exchange, as of less value than specie.

§ 1621. — not to include solely the expense of transportation.

When the contract to pay the exchange was made, both parties, no doubt, looked to a sound circulating medium, convertible into specie, and, of course, of value equal to specie. And in such a state how is the rate of exchange to be ascertained? It is clearly not by ascertaining what would be the expense of transporting specie from the place of payment to the city of New York. This, undoubtedly, enters into the general calculation on the subject and has great influence in fixing the rate, but there are other ingredients which must be looked to in making an estimate. Specie is not transported at the same rate as other merchantable commodities. There is the risk, the insurance, the delays, and other contingencies which are taken into the account; and, not unfrequently, the scarcity or abundance of specie at the place of remittance has an important effect on the price of exchange. The only correct rule, therefore, is to ascertain the ordinary rate of exchange between the two places; to be established by evidence, the same as the value of any other thing. The inquiry of the jury should be, what was the current price of drafts in specie or its equivalent, on New York, at Lafayette, at the time this note became payable. This must give the rate of damages which the plaintiff claims for the difference of exchange between the two places.

WEED v. MILLER.

Opinion by the Court.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought on a note given at New York, without stating where payable, and suit being brought in this state, the plaintiffs contend that they are entitled to recover, in addition to the amount specified in the note and interest, the difference in exchange between this state and New York. It is admitted that the rate of exchange is two per cent. The declaration does not allege that the note was payable in New York, nor is there any count on the rate of exchange. The note is dated at New York, and from this it is contended that it was payable there.

There can be no question that the rate of exchange may be recovered on a bill of exchange payable at a particular place, where the declaration contains the necessary averment, but the instrument now under consideration is not a bill of exchange, and the declaration is in the common form. In the case of Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65, the court held that the indorsee of a bill of exchange payable in New York properly included the rate of exchange in a second bill payable at Mobile, given in payment of the first bill, if the transaction was fair and not designed as a cover for usury. And in Story's Conflict of Laws, page 225, it is laid down as a general principle that where a debt payable at a particular place is paid elsewhere, the rate of exchange ought to be included, and is recoverable. But in such cases, the place of payment must not only appear upon the face of the instrument, but the declaration must contain the necessary averments. In the case of Adams v. Stimpson, where a foreign creditor sues for his debt, the court say (8 Pick., 260) that in that state he will recover, in the case of a bill of exchange, at the par of exchange. And in 4 John., 125, Martin v. Franklin, "the plaintiffs were merchants in Liverpool, and it was admitted the debt was contracted in Great Britain, that the account between the parties is in sterling, and that the interest is calculated at five per cent., the legal rate of interest in Great Britain. In the declaration all the counts, except the last, state the defendants as being indebted to the plaintiffs in the city of New York, and the last count lays the venue in New York, but does not mention any particular place at which the defendants were indebted. And the court held that the debt was to be paid according to the par and not the rate of exchange. It is recoverable, say they, and payable here to the plaintiffs or their agents, and the court are not to inquire into the disposition of the debt after it reaches the hand of the agent; he may remit the debt to his principal abroad, in bills of exchange, or he may invest it here on his behalf, or transmit it to some other part of the United States, or to other countries on the same account; we cannot trace the disposition which is to take place, subsequent to the recovery, nor award special damages upon such uncertain calculations. All that the plaintiffs can ask is their debt justly liquidated and paid in the lawful currency of the United States."

And in the case of Hendricks v. Franklin, 4 John., 122, the court remark, "in this case the question is what damages the plaintiff, who is indorser of a foreign bill of exchange, of which the defendant is the drawer, and which was returned protested for non-acceptance and non-payment, is entitled to recover; the plaintiff contending that he has a right to recover as well the principal and interest as also twenty per cent., damages, and an additional two per cent., as the difference of exchange. The payment of this two per cent. the defendant resists." "The right to recover twenty per cent. on the protest of a foreign bill of exchange rests with us on immemorial commercial usage, sanctioned by a long course of judicial decisions." The two per cent. for difference in exchange was not allowed. And the court, in 8 Pickering, say, "We subscribe to this doctrine, and are satisfied, when the suit is brought in this commonwealth, by a foreign creditor, who sues here on the trustee process, the judgment can only be for the amount due at the par value of lawful money for sterling." In the case of Schofield v. Day, 20 John., 102, which was an action of assumpsit on a promissory note made by defendants at Montreal, in Lower Canada, payable to the plaintiffs, who resided in England, or to their order with interest, until paid in England, the court say, "the plaintiffs are entitled to English interest, and not to the rate of interest in Lower Canada. And the interest is to be calculated up to the time of the judgment, not to the time when the money might, in the ordinary course of business, be remitted to England. The plaintiffs are not entitled to any allowance on account of the difference of exchange with England." In the case of the United States v. Barker, 1 Paine, 156, the court decided that the holder of a bill is entitled to recover at the rate of exchange at the time notice of the protest is given; and that such was the settled law in New York. And in the case of Cropper v. Nelson, 3 Wash., 125, the court held where the money stated in the bill is sterling money, the jury are to settle the amount according to the rate of exchange at the time of the trial.

From these authorities, the law would seem to be settled that on a foreign bill of exchange, under the commercial usage that obtains, the rate of exchange may be recovered. At all events, that the rate of exchange is not recoverable on a note of hand where the declaration lays the venue in the state where the suit was brought, and there is no count nor allegation to cover the difference of exchange. This is a matter which depends upon authority founded on commercial usage. And under the circumstances of this case we think the plaintiff is not entitled to the two per cent. claimed, admitted to be the difference of exchange between this state and New York.

BANK OF UNITED STATES v. UNITED STATES.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE McLEAN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A writ of error brings this case before the court from the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. On the 7th of February, 1833, the secretary of the treasury of the United States drew the following bill on the minister and secretary of state for the department of finance of the French government: "Sir: I have the honor to request that at the sight of this, my first bill of exchange (the second and third of the same tenor and date unpaid), you will be pleased to pay to the order of Samuel Jaudon, cashier of the Bank of the United States, the sum of 4,856,666 francs and 66 centimes; which includes the sum of $3,916,666.66, being the amount of the first instalment to be paid to the United States under the convention concluded between the United States and France, on the 4th of July, 1831 (8 Stats. at Large, 430) (after deducting the amount of the first instalment to be reserved to France under the said convention), and the additional sum of 940,000 francs, being one year's interest at four per cent. on all the instalments payable to the United States, from the day of the exchange of the ratification to the 2d of February, 1833."

This bill was purchased by the bank and indorsed by it to Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co., of London, and by them for value was indorsed, pay the order of N. M. Rothschild, Esq.; and by him it was directed to be paid to Messieurs De Rothschild, Brothers, or order, of Paris, for value in account. This bill, on presentation, not being paid, was protested, and was afterwards taken up on account of the first indorser by Hottinguer & Co., who also paid the costs, etc., and charged the whole sum to the Bank of the United States. Notice of the non-payment of this bill was given, in due time, to the drawer; and also that the bank claimed of the government interest, costs and fifteen per cent. damages on the bill. The government accounted to and paid the bank the principal of the bill and the costs, but refused to pay the damages. Sometime after the protest, a dividend on the stock held by the United States having been declared by the bank, it retained a part of the dividend to cover the above damages. A suit being brought against the bank by the government to recover the dividend thus withheld, the bank set up as an offset the fifteen per cent. damages, claimed on the above bill. On the trial, the court held, and so instructed the jury, that the action was maintainable. That the set-off or credit claimed by the defendants was governed by the statute of Maryland. That if the bank had been the holder of the bill, at the time of the protest, it would, under the statute, be entitled to the damages claimed; but that it must be viewed as indorser, and consequently could not recover such damages unless upon proof that they had been actually paid by the bank. To this charge the defendant's counsel excepted, and this brings before the court the questions for consideration.

Before we consider the rulings of the court excepted to, it may not be improper to notice the structure of the bill, which has been much commented on by the counsel; though not having been excepted to by the government, it is not a matter for decision. It is supposed not to be a bill of exchange, as it was drawn payable out of a particular fund. This seems not to be the character of the bill. It was drawn for a certain sum, and the drawer then states on what account such sum was due from the French government. But there was no restriction as to what moneys or appropriation out of which the bill should be paid. This could in no sense restrain the negotiability of the instrument. It has the frame, character and effect of a bill of exchange. It was so called and treated by the secretary of the treasury, who drew it; by his successor, who had some correspondence in regard to it; by the attorney-general, to whom it was submitted for his opinion, by congress; and by the eminent bankers in Europe, through whom it was negotiated and paid. That the United States can sustain an action against the bank, to recover a dividend declared in their favor, is undoubted. This seems to have been doubted by the counsel for the bank in the circuit court, but the objection has been abandoned in this court. Nor can there be any question of the right of the bank to set up, in this case, by way of offset, the damages in controversy, if the claim for damages be sustainable. This right is not contested by the attorney-general.

§ 1625. The Maryland statute on bills of exchange.

The main point in the case depends upon the construction of the Maryland statute, which applies to this district. It is singular that this statute, which was enacted in 1795, in regard to the question now before us, has never been construed by the local courts. And the same may be said of other and prior statutes of Maryland containing similar provisions. The first section of the act provides "that upon all bills of exchange hereafter drawn in this state, on any person, corporation, company or society, in any foreign country, and regularly protested, the owner or holder of such bill, or the person or persons, company, society or corporation, entitled to the same, shall have a right to receive or recover so much current money as will purchase a good bill of exchange of the same time of payment, and upon the same place, at the current exchange of such bills, and also fifteen per cent. damages upon the value of the principal sum mentioned in such bill, and costs of protest, together with legal interest upon the value of the principal sum mentioned in such bill from the time of protest, until the principal and damages are paid and satisfied; and if any indorser of such bill shall pay to the holder, or the person or persons, company, society or corporation, entitled to the same, the value of the principal, and the damages and interest as aforesaid, such indorser shall have a right to receive and recover the sum paid, with legal interest upon the same, from the drawer, or any other person or persons, company, society or corporation, liable to such indorser upon such bill of exchange."

§ 1626. — as to the recovery of interest and damages.

That the holder of a foreign bill, or other person entitled to it, may recover, under this statute, from the drawer, in case of protest, a sum that will purchase a similar bill of the same amount, together with fifteen per cent. damages on the principal sum, is admitted. But it is insisted that the bank paid the bill as indorser; and that, as there is no proof that it paid the fifteen per cent. damages, they are not recoverable under the statute. The first part of the section gives to the holder of a protested bill its value at the place drawn, the fifteen per cent. damages, and interest upon the value of the principal sum. The latter part of the section gives to the indorser, who has paid to the holder the value of the principal, the damages and interest on the entire sum paid with legal interest. So that while the holder of the bill recovers only interest upon the principal sum, the indorser is entitled to interest on the whole sum paid by him. And to give interest on this sum, seems to have been the object of the latter clause of this section. Had the bank retained the bill until its presentation and protest, there could be no question of its right, as holder, to the damages claimed. It indorsed the bill to Baring, Brothers & Co., and they to Rothschild, who indorsed it to De Rothschild and Brothers. These last were the holders; and had not the bill been paid, supra protest, on account of the bank, as first indorser, they would have been entitled to the damages. Hottinguer & Co., having paid the bill for the honor of the bank, became the holders, and could recover the damages from it or the drawer. But they being the depositaries of the bank, charged it with the amount they paid, by which the bank was remitted to its original character as payee and holder of the bill. In this light the bank was viewed and treated by the government, for it paid not only the principal sum and interest to the bank, but also the costs of protest and other expenses chargeable under the laws of France. But the damages allowed by the statute were refused.

It has been intimated that these damages must be considered as a penalty, and not as a part of the bill. This is a mistaken view of the subject. Had there been no statute, the bank, as the holder of the bill, would have been equally entitled to damages. They would have been claimed on a different principle, and might have been of a greater or less amount, according to circumstances. The origin and character of a bill of exchange are found in the law merchant; that law which pervades the commercial world, and which, though founded on usage, has become as fixed and definite as any other branch of the law. Under this law, the drawer of a bill in this country, payable in a foreign country, is liable, should such bill be protested, not only for the costs of protest and other incidental charges, but also to re-exchange on the bill. The exchange is sometimes direct, at other times circuitous, depending in some degree upon the commercial intercourse between the countries where the bill is drawn, and where it is made payable. Between this country and France, the exchange is often, if not generally, by the way of London.

§ 1628. The doctrine of re-exchange.

The bill under consideration having been protested at Paris for non-payment, the holder under the general commercial law was entitled to a bill drawn at that place, payable in this city, for such sum as would pay the original bill at Paris, including costs of protest and other legal charges. This is re-exchange, and it varies, as must be seen, with the fluctuations of commercial intercourse, influenced somewhat by local circumstances and the general state of the money market. In some instances, owing to peculiar circumstances, re-exchange has been found to exceed forty or even fifty per cent. To avoid so ruinous a charge, so uncertain a rule of damages, and one so difficult to establish by evidence, the state of Maryland, and almost all the other states of the Union, have fixed by legislation a certain amount of damages on protested foreign bills, in lieu of re-exchange. Experience has shown that this is a judicious regulation. It relieves the parties to the bill from uncertainty, and promotes punctuality by showing the drawer what damages he must pay on the dishonor of his bill. Fifteen per cent. on the principal sum, which the statute adopts, may be greater than the actual re-exchange in the present case. But whether this be so or not, is not open for inquiry. It is believed that if this per cent. excluded the re-exchange, at the time this bill was protested, there are many other cases in which it would fall short of that charge. The statute has, probably, fixed an amount which would be an average charge for re-exchange. This being the basis of the act, the damages cannot be considered as a penalty. The damages given by the statute are as much a part of the contract as the interest. On this point there is believed to be no difference of opinion among enlightened courts or commercial men. The doctrine of re-exchange is founded upon equitable principles. A bill is drawn in this country, payable at Paris, in France. The payee gives a premium for it, under the expectation of receiving the amount at the time and place where the bill is made payable. It is protested for non-payment. Now the payee and holder is entitled to the amount of the bill in Paris. The same sum paid in this country, including costs of protest and other charges, is not an indemnity. The holder can only be remunerated by paying to him, at Paris, the principal, with costs and charges; or by paying to him in this country those sums, together with the difference in value between the whole sum at Paris, and the same amount in this country. And this difference in value is ascertained by the premium on a bill drawn in Paris, and payable in this country, which should sell at Paris for the sum claimed. The statute of Maryland, then, is founded on equitable considerations, although the rule of damages may be considered arbitrary, as it does not yield to circumstances.

§ 1629. Allowance of damages for non-payment of bill of exchange—government liable for.

In this case the bank purchased the bill from the government, and paid for it. It was sold and transferred by the bank. But the bill not being paid to the holder, the bank paid the amount of it, including the costs of protest and other charges, to Hottinguer & Co., at Paris, who had taken it up supra protest, for the honor of the first indorser. The bank in this manner came again into possession of the bill, the indorsements, in effect, being stricken out. In a commercial and legal sense, then, the bank is the holder of the bill, and has the same claim for damages as if it had never been indorsed. Had the government been suable by the bank, it must have declared and recovered as payee and holder, and not as indorser of the bill. No objection is taken in the bill of exceptions as to the liability of the government to damages on a protested bill of exchange drawn by it, the same as an individual. No such question, therefore, arises in this case. As the holder of a protested bill, the government exacts damages; it would seem to be equitable, therefore, that, as drawer, under like circumstances, it should pay them. Upon the whole, we think that, in view of the circumstances of this case, the bank is entitled to the fifteen per cent. damages, under the Maryland statute, and that, consequently, the instructions of the circuit court were erroneous. The judgment of that court is, therefore, reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court, and a venire de novo is awarded, etc.

Mr. Justice WAYNE concurred in reversing the judgment, but not for the reasons stated by the court. Mr. Justice CATRON dissented, holding that the bank was not within the first class of cases provided for by the statute (owner or holder), and that the instruction given by the court below was proper.

UNITED STATES v. BANK OF UNITED STATES.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CATRON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The United States sued the Bank of the United States for a dividend on stocks held by the government in the bank, and the defendant pleaded and relied in defense on a set-off, being the damages claimed by the defendant of fifteen per cent. on a protested draft in the form of a bill of exchange, drawn by the government of the United States on the government of France, for a sum of money due from the latter government to the former, by treaty stipulations, to obtain possession of which the draft was drawn. The bank was the payee and original holder. The holders at the time of protest (Messrs Rothschilds, of Paris) caused it to be protested for non-payment; and Hottinguer & Co. intervened immediately after, and took up the draft for the honor of the bank. The corporation refunded to Hottinguer & Co. the amount advanced, including interest and charges, together with one-half per cent. commissions, and thus again became possessed of the draft.

The circuit court, on a former trial, held that the damages claimed as a set-off depended on a statute of Maryland of 1785; that by the statute the holder, at the time of protest, alone could demand damages from any previous party to a bill; and that, if he failed to do so, and recovered less from any previous indorser, the latter could only recover the amount actually paid (with interest and charges accruing subsequently) from the drawer; and therefore the bank could set up no claim by force of the statute of Maryland, taking its own assumption to be true, that this was a legal bill of exchange, and properly subject to protest. This instruction altogether rejected the defense relied on, and the jury found for the plaintiffs; and from that decision the defendants prosecuted a writ of error to this court. When the cause came before us in 1844, 2 How., 711, this single question was presented for our determination; nor could this court decide any other question; and such was the unanimous opinion of the court, although the judges then present differed as regarded the true construction of the statute of Maryland; the majority holding the construction of the circuit court to have been erroneous, and that the bank, as payee, on taking up the draft from Hottinguer & Co., had the same right to demand damages under the statute that the holder had at the time of protest. The court, however, when giving its opinion, threw out some suggestions on the structure of the bill; first remarking that, "before we consider the rulings of the court excepted to, it may not be improper to notice the structure of the bill, which has been much commented on by the counsel, though, not having been excepted to by the government, it is not a matter for decision." The instruction given cut off every other question the government might have raised in opposition to the set-off claimed; and as this court, when acting as a court of errors, can only legitimately revise the questions of law that have been raised and decided in the circuit courts, it must of necessity, on a second writ of error being prosecuted, have power to revise such rulings of the court below on the second trial as affect the merits of the controversy, and to pass on the questions not previously presented, as open questions, in the particular cause. However high the regard of judges that did not concur may be for the views entertained and expressed by other judges on a question of law not brought up for decision, still it is impossible to recognize such views as binding authority, consistently with the due administration of justice; as by doing so the merits of the controversy might be forestalled, without proper examination. We, therefore, feel ourselves at liberty to treat of the structure and character of the instrument before us as an open question. And so, also, we deem the question open, whether the statute of Maryland subjected to protest and damages a government. The statute provides: "That upon all bills of exchange hereafter drawn in this state on any person, corporation, company or society in any foreign country, and regularly protested, the owner or holder of such bill shall have a right to so much money as will purchase a good bill of the same time of payment, and upon the same place, at the current rate of exchange of such bills; and also fifteen per cent. damages upon the value of the principal sum mentioned in such bill, with costs of protest, together with legal interest," etc. The United States refunded to the bank, on the return of the draft, the principal sum, together with all the charges actually incurred by the bank, and the interest accruing from the date of drawing to the time when the money was refunded; but refused to pay the fifteen per cent. damages claimed by the bank. This refusal was not founded on the true construction of the Maryland statute; the government insisting it had no application to the transaction, but that the drawing was of nation upon nation, and not governed by the law merchant; and that the form of one of the instruments making up the transaction did not and could not alter its character or legal effect, so as to bring it within the law merchant; that the government was only bound to do equity to the bank to the extent of the amount refunded to Hottinguer & Co. And these conflicting assumptions make up the question we are now called on to determine, as will be seen by referring to the third and fourth instructions asked to be given to the jury, on part of the plaintiffs, on the second trial; they are as follows:

"3. That the bill in question, being drawn by one government upon another, and upon a particular fund, is not a bill of exchange within the legal meaning of the terms, and is not embraced by the statute. 4. That the defendants, being indorsers of the bill, and not the holders or owners at the time of protest, are not entitled to the damages, since they have not paid them."

Being refused, the judge stated to the jury that "these questions appear to me to have been determined by the supreme court of the United States in the present cause in favor of the defendants;" and further remarking, that "if I am mistaken in their views on this, it will be corrected by a re-examination of the cause in that court." That the judge was mistaken as regarded the questions arising on the third instruction, we have already stated; but in regard to the fourth instruction the charge was proper, as the question presented by it had been decided.

§ 1630. The Maryland act allowing damages for dishonor of foreign bills does not apply to bills drawn on a foreign government.

Suppose, then, a bill of exchange could be drawn by the government of Maryland, or by the government of the United States in this District, as the successor of Maryland, on the government of France; would the statute of Maryland give damages to a holder in case the bill was dishonored by France, and formally protested? The statute provides for damages upon all foreign bills drawn in that state "on any person, corporation, company or society." Is the government of France either a person, corporation, company or society, within the meaning of the act? If it is, and was indebted, and could be drawn on and protested, then it follows that the drawer of the bill in such an instance as this, on taking it up and paying the damages, could lawfully demand from France, as drawee, the damages paid, and rightfully enforce the demand by the sword, if payment was refused; as the demand would be a perfect right, and this the ultimate remedy. In our opinion, Maryland, by her act of 1785, never contemplated the idea that a foreign government should be subject to be drawn upon by bills of exchange, and to protest and damages as incidents, like individual persons, or trading companies, or corporations; but that the statute had reference to the latter only; and that, therefore, this bill, on its face, "is not embraced by the statute," in the language of the rejected instruction.

The second consideration arising on the instruction involves the structure and character of the instrument, not so much in form as in substance; for the name of the instrument cannot change its nature and character. The draft was drawn by one government on another, and of necessity accompanied by other documents, and the question is, Was it a negotiable bill of exchange, in the legal meaning of the terms? The circuit court held that it was; and this is the prominent legal point in the cause, or at least has been so treated at the bar, and on which this court has bestowed much consideration. A bill of exchange is an instrument governed by the commercial law; it must carry on its face its authority to command the money drawn for, so that the holder or the notary acting as his agent may receive the money and give a discharge on presenting the bill and receiving payment; or, if payment is refused, enter a protest, from which follows the incident of damages; but if no demand can be made on the bill standing alone, and it depends on other papers or documents to give it force and effect, and these must necessarily accompany the bill and be presented with it, it cannot be a simple bill of exchange that circulates from hand to hand as the representative of current cash. The draft in question was drawn for 4,856,666.66 francs, being moneys owing and shortly to become due from France to the United States, according to a treaty stipulation (8 Stats. at Large, 430); and these facts are distinctly set forth on the face of the draft, and by indorsements on it. The paper was signed by the secretary of the treasury of the United States, and addressed to the minister and secretary of state for the department of finance of the kingdom of France, and was payable to the order of Samuel Jaudon, cashier, etc. The mere signature of our secretary of the treasury could not be recognized by the French government as conferring authority on the holder to demand payment. The transaction being one of nation with nation, he who demanded payment must have had, not only the authority of this nation, before he could have approached the French government, but that authority must have been communicated by the head of this government through the proper department carrying on our national intercourse, which was the state department. Accordingly, of even date with the draft, 7th February, 1833, an instrument was drawn up reciting the fact of indebtedment and cause thereof, the amount due, the authority conferred by an act of congress (4 Stats. at Large, 574) on the secretary of the treasury to apply for the money in such manner as he might deem best; the fact and manner of drawing for it, and then comes the official authority to the payee to receive the money, in these terms:

"Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Jackson, president of the United States, do ratify and confirm and approve the drawing of the said bill by the secretary of the treasury aforesaid, and do hereby authorize the said Samuel Jaudon, or his assignee of the said bill, to receive the amount thereof, and on receipt of the sum therein mentioned to give full receipt and acquittance to the government of France for the said first instalment, and the interest due on all the instalments, payable on the said 2d day of February, by virtue of the said convention; and I, Andrew Jackson, president as aforesaid, do hereby ratify and confirm all that may be lawfully done in the premises.

"In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand at the city of Washington, [L. s.] the seventh day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, and of the independence of the United States of America the fifty-seventh.

ANDREW JACKSON.

"By the President:

"EDW. LIVINGSTON, Secretary of State."

This accompanied the draft, and was placed in the hands of the payee, and, no doubt, passed through the hands of the different indorsees. Still, neither the power, more than the draft, could be presented to the French government by a mere individual who was holder or by a notary public, and therefore, on the next day after the draft and power bear date, the secretary of state of our government addressed a dispatch to our chargé d'affaires and representative at the French court in the following terms:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, 8th February, 1833.

"Nathaniel Niles, Esq., Paris:

"SIR:—The secretary of the treasury, in conformity with the provision of a law of the last session of congress, yesterday drew a bill upon the minister of state and finance of the French government for the first instalment and interest thereupon and for the interest upon the remaining instalments, which interest is stipulated to be paid by that government to this in twelve months from the date of the exchange of the ratification of the late convention between the United States and his majesty the king of the French. The bill is drawn in favor of Samuel Jaudon, cashier of the Bank of the United States, or order, and will go accompanied, to the assignee thereof in France, by a full power from the president authorizing and empowering him, upon the due payment of the same, to give the necessary receipt and acquittance to the French government, according to the provision of the convention referred to.

"You will take an early opportunity, therefore, to apprise the French government of this arrangement.

"I am, sir, respectfully your obedient servant,

"EDW. LIVINGSTON."

§ 1632. Transaction with a foreign government not governed by the commercial law.

Until the French government was thus officially advised, the bill and accompanying power combined were valueless in the hands of the holder, as against France. It follows, as we suppose, from the character of the drawer and the drawee, and the nature of the fund drawn upon, that this transaction could not be governed by the commercial law, much less by a statute of Maryland, which happened to be in force in the District of Columbia, where the draft was drawn. But it is insisted, and with much plausibility, that as between the bank as payee, and the United States as drawer, no such objections can be alleged by the United States; they having assumed the draft to be a bill of exchange, and dealt with it as commercial paper, are bound by the assumption. Still, the question meets us, that no form of draft could authorize a legal demand upon the drawee (France) on the face of the draft. So far from being a simple paper, carrying its authority to receive the money with it, the parties now before the court conceded, at the time the drawing took place, by obtaining the power, that the right to receive the money did mainly depend, and must depend, on the power signed by the president, and countersigned by the secretary of state, with the seal of the United States attached, and the communication of the facts in official form, and through the proper channel, to the government of France, that is, through its department of foreign affairs. These were the conditions and contingencies with which the draft was incumbered. They were legal consequences, apparent on its face, and are yet more apparent by the accompanying facts that took place at the time of drawing.

Again: This controversy is between the original parties; the law governing the dealing, each was bound to know; the facts they did know equally well; and if a mutual mistake was made in supposing that a negotiable commercial instrument could be founded on our claim against France, this mistake cannot change the commercial law, which, in our opinion, could not be made to apply to the subject matter of drawing, nor in any form of instrument founded on the subject matter.

The principal argument adduced to sustain the set-off claimed is founded on the fact that, by an act of congress, the secretary of the treasury had a discretion to adopt any appropriate means to obtain the money, and that a bill of exchange was an appropriate means. To this assumption it may be answered that France was not bound by the act of congress, but by the treaty; it stipulated "that the indemnity of twenty-five million francs should be paid in six annual instalments, into the hands of such person or persons as should be authorized to receive it." We repeat, that this authority was to come from our government to the French government; was to pass through the department of state here, and through the department of foreign affairs there, and thus only could it reach the minister of finance, M. Humann. Our secretary of the treasury could not communicate with the minister of finance, nor with any other functionary of the French government, and, therefore, the bill drawn by Mr. McLane on M. Humann, standing alone, was idle as waste paper, notwithstanding the act of congress, in so far as the French government was concerned. Nor had M. Humann any power to pay the money had it been in the treasury, until instructed to do so by the department of foreign affairs.

1. For these reasons we are of opinion that the question on the structure of the bill is an open question, because for the first time presented to this court for decision.

2. That the statute of Maryland of 1785 in its terms does not embrace a bill of exchange drawn on a foreign government.

3. That a bill of exchange in form, drawn by one government on another, as this was, is not, and cannot be, governed by the law merchant; and that therefore it is not subject to protest and consequential damages.

And on these grounds we order that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to that court for another trial thereof, on the principles stated in this opinion.

TANEY, C. J., filed a memorandum, stating his concurrence in the decision, and, also, his withdrawal from the bench on account of an official opinion rendered by him as attorney-general. WOODBURY, J., also withdrew from the bench on account of an opinion rendered by him as secretary of the treasury. Justices WAYNE and McLEAN dissented, the latter holding that the instrument was a bill of exchange, and that damages were recoverable under the statute of Maryland. BANK OF UNITED STATES v. DANIEL.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Kentucky.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CATRON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—To a just comprehension of the legal questions arising in this cause, it becomes necessary that the facts be stated in the form and sense they present themselves to the court. The first transaction giving rise to the controversy was a bill of exchange in the following words:

"Exchange for $10,000.

LEXINGTON, October 12, 1818.

"One hundred and twenty days after date, of this my first of exchange, second and third of same tenor and date unpaid, pay Henry Daniel, or order, ten thousand dollars, at the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, in New Orleans, for value received of him, which charge to the account of yours, etc.

ROBT. GRIFFING.

"To Mr. James Daniel."

James Daniel duly accepted the bill, and it was indorsed by Henry Daniel, Isaac Cunningham and Samuel Hanson, to the president, directors and company of the Bank of the United States. When it was made and accepted, the drawer, Griffing, and James Daniel, the acceptor, resided and were in Kentucky, where the transaction took place. The indorsers, Henry Daniel, Cunningham, and Hanson, also resided there. The bill was transmitted to New Orleans for payment; but not being paid, it was regularly protested and returned, and the bank looked to the drawer, acceptor and indorsers for the payment of principal and interest thereon, from the 9th February, 1819, the time it fell due, together with the charges of protest, and ten per centum damages on the principal. Griffing, the maker, and James Daniel, the acceptor, believing the claim for damages to be legal, paid the bank, July, 1819, the sum of $3,330.67 on account of the aggregate amount due and supposed to be due, and, for the balance, Griffing and James Daniel executed their negotiable note for $8,000, payable sixty days after date, to William Armstrong, to which Cunningham, Hanson and Henry Daniel were parties, either as co-drawers or indorsers, and which was discounted by the office of discount of the Bank of the United States at Lexington, for the benefit of Griffing and James Daniel, upon the express agreement between the parties making and indorsing the note with the bank, that the proceeds should be applied to the payment of the balance due on the bill. Griffing and James Daniel were the principal debtors, and Cunningham, Hanson and Henry Daniel sureties. The principals paid $500 in part discharge of the note; and in August, 1820, Griffing, James Daniel, Henry Daniel, Cunningham and Hanson executed their joint note to the bank for $7,500, payable sixty days after date, for the balance. Griffing having died, and the note for $7,500 not having been discharged when due, the bank sued James Daniel, Cunningham, Henry Daniel and Hanson, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, and recovered a judgment at law for the principal and interest, at what time does not precisely appear.

In 1827, the defendants to the judgment at law filed their bill in equity in the same court; and, after setting out the facts substantially as above, further alleged, "they were advised the bank was not entitled to ten per centum damages on said protested bill of exchange, inasmuch as the drawer and acceptor thereof both lived in Kentucky at the date and maturity of said bill; and that therefore so much of said $8,000 note as exceeds the balance due on said bill, for principal, interest and damages (after deducting said payment of $3,330.67), was included in said note by mistake; as to the legal liability of said Griffing and James Daniel for said ten per cent. damages, and as to said excess, said note was executed without any consideration whatever." The complainants also alleged that the failure of consideration, on which the note for $7,500 was founded, being partial, relief against the excess in the note and judgment could only be had in a court of equity, and prayed the bank might be restrained by injunction from the collection of $1,515, the excess that entered into the judgment, because of the mistake. At the November term, 1827, an injunction was ordered by the court, restraining the bank from proceeding to collect $1,515, part of the judgment, until the hearing. The bank answered, admitting the statements of the complainants in reference to the liquidation of the bill of exchange, and the part payment and renewal of the $8,000 note; and further averred that, on the return of the protested bill, the sum of $1,000, being ten per cent. on the amount thereof; was claimed by the respondents as their damages; and the claim was assented to by the complainants, with a full knowledge of the facts upon which it was founded, and all the principles of law upon which it was asserted; and, in pursuance of such assent, the amount of said bill, with interest, and the $1,000 damages, was liquidated and discharged by complainants in manner alleged, but aver respondents cannot admit "this was done under any mistake, either as to fact or law; indeed, two of complainants were lawyers of celebrity, and of deservedly high rank; and respondents cannot impute to them ignorance of the law; and ignorance of the facts is not pretended." The respondents further alleged that, by a statute of Kentucky, bills of exchange drawn by a person in that state on another out of the state, when returned protested, bore ten per cent. damages, besides interest; and, independently of the statute, the bill for $10,000 was subject to damages for re-exchange and expenses; that the effect of the statute was to reduce to uniformity and certainty the amount to which holders were entitled in consequence of the money not being paid at the place agreed upon, and the loss arising from difference of exchange and expenses. It is insisted the claim for damages comes within the statute; yet, if not within it, that respondents are entitled to equal damages with those given by the statute, their risk and loss being the same.

In bar of the claim, the respondents say that all the grounds of equity alleged in the bill accrued to complainants more than five years next before the commencement of the suit, and are barred by the lapse of time; they further allege that the damages were liquidated, assented to and discharged more than five years next before the commencement of the suit; and all claim to relief is barred by the statute of limitations. The allegations in the complainants' bill, not responded to, are admitted. To the answer a general replication was filed. The only evidence in the cause was an agreement of facts entered into by the parties, to wit: "It is agreed that the statements contained in said bill, as to liquidation of the bill of exchange of $10,000, are true. It is also agreed that this liquidation was on the 8th day of July, 1819, and that no interest was charged up to that time, except upon $10,000. It is also admitted that such renewals of the $8,000 note were made, as are stated in said bill, and that the judgment at law was on one of the notes given in renewal." Upon the pleadings and admissions, the court proceeded to a hearing of the cause at the November term, 1836, and decreed: "That a credit be entered on the judgment at law obtained by the defendants against the plaintiffs, as set forth in the bill for $1,000, the amount of damages charged on the protested bill, with all interest charged on said sum up to the time of the judgment; and that the defendants be perpetually enjoined from taking out execution on said judgment for the sum thus decreed to be credited; but the decree not to affect the balance of the judgment. From which decree the president, directors and company of the bank of the United States appealed to this court.

§ 1633. An appeal may be taken to this court if the sum in controversy exceeds $2,000 at the hearing of the cause, though part of that sum be interest.

The first question raised on the facts, and in advance of the merits, is whether the matter in controversy in the circuit court was of sufficient dignity to give this court jurisdiction by appeal. The act of congress (2 Stats. at Large, 244) provides that appeals shall be allowed to the supreme court from final decrees rendered in the circuit courts, in cases of equity jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the sum or value of $2,000. The expression, sum or value of the matter in dispute, has reference to the date of the decree below, alike in case of appeals in equity and writs of error at law; they are each grounded on the original process of this court, operating on the final decree or judgment, and are limited to the sum or value then in controversy, and of which the decree or judgment furnishes the better evidence, should it furnish any. The matter in dispute below was a claim to have deducted from the judgment at law $1,000, with interest thereon, after the rate of six per centum, from the 8th day of July, 1819, up to the date of the decree, in November, 1836, being upwards of seventeen years; and the circuit court decreed the reformation to be made of the judgment at law, by expunging therefrom, and as of its date, the $1,000 with the interest. The effect was to cut off the interest that had accrued on the $1,000 from the date of the judgment in 1827, to that of the decree in 1836; interest on the principal sum recovered being an incident of the contract by the laws of Kentucky, as well after judgment as before. The practical consequence of the decree will immediately be manifest when the bill is dismissed by the order of this court; the appellants will then issue their execution at law, and enforce the $1,000 with the accruing interest from the 8th day of July, 1819, until payment is made; it follows that, upon the most favorable basis of calculation, and disregarding the statute of Kentucky of 1789, giving ten per cent. damages in addition to legal interest on sums enjoined, the amount to which the decree below relieved the appellees and deprived the bank of the right of recovery was $2,040; that is, $1,000 principal, with seventeen years and four months of interest; this being the aggregate amount in dispute, and enjoined by the decree, of course, the supreme court has jurisdiction.

The second question raised by the record rests mainly on the pleadings in the cause. It is alleged the bank was not entitled to ten per cent. damages on the protested bill, inasmuch as the drawer and acceptor both resided in Kentucky; that the $8,000 note included the damages of $1,000 through mistake; and so far it wanted consideration. The defendants deny this was done through either mistake of the fact or law; insist they were entitled to ten per cent. damages by the statute of Kentucky; but if the statute did not apply, they were entitled to damages for re-exchange and charges; and that the statute was justly referred to for the rule settling the measure of compensation. As no mistake of the facts is positively alleged, and, if impliedly stated, is directly and positively denied, we must take it no such mistake existed; and such is manifestly the truth. In regard to the mistake of law, however, the pleadings can settle nothing; they make an issue, and refer it to the court for decision, on the local and general laws governing damages on bills of exchange of the character of the one set forth.

§ 1634. Law of Kentucky as to damages, where drawer and acceptor reside in the state.

The statute, by force of which the bank claimed damages, declares: "If any person or persons shall draw or indorse any bill or bills of exchange upon any person or persons, out of this state, on any person or persons within any other of the United States of North America, and the same being returned back unpaid, with legal protest, the drawer thereof, and all others concerned, shall pay the contents of said bill, together with legal interest from the time said bill was protested, the charges of protest, and £10 per cent. advance for the damages thereof; and so proportionably for greater or smaller sums." In 1821, the court of appeals of Kentucky gave a construction to their statute in the case of Clay v. Hopkins, 3 A. K. Marsh., 488, where it was holden that where the drawer and acceptor were both of Kentucky, and the transaction took place there, the statute did not apply, although the bill was made payable in Baltimore. That and this case are alike in all their features. In a subsequent cause of Wood v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Lexington, 7 Mon., 284, the same court held that a bill addressed to "Mr. J. J. Wood, New Orleans," was within the statute, and drew after it ten per cent. damages on protest; distinguishing Wood's case from that of Clay and Hopkins, because the acceptor was addressed at the foot of the bill as of New Orleans, although in fact he was of Kentucky.

This court, in accordance to a steady course of decision for many years, feels it to be an incumbent duty carefully to examine and ascertain if there be a settled construction by the state courts of the statutes of the respective states, where they are exclusively in force; and to abide by and follow such construction, when found to be settled. Looking to the two adjudications in Kentucky, on the construction of the statute of 1798, in the spirit of the rule we have laid down for our government, and without any reference to the misgivings we may entertain of the correctness of the construction declared to be the true one in Clay v. Hopkins, 3 A. K. Marsh., 488, we have come to the conclusion that Wood's case, 7 Mon., 281, did not overrule the former. It is therefore declared by this court that the bill of exchange for $10,000, drawn by Robert Griffing, although payable at a bank in New Orleans, did not, by force of the statute of Kentucky, subject the drawer or others bound to take it up, to the payment of ten per cent. damages.

§ 1636. Where a bill of exchange is payable out of the state in which it is drawn, the holder is entitled to damages.

Not having been entitled by the statute, the appellants insist they were authorized to charge damages by commercial usage, and that the statute prescribed a fair measure. The assumption that the holder could lawfully demand damages depends on the fact whether the bill was foreign or inland; if foreign, then the bank had the right to redraw from New Orleans to Lexington for such amount as would make good the face of the bill, including principal, re-exchange and charges, with legal interest; the law does not insist upon actual redrawing; but the holder may recover the price of a new bill at the place of protest. Had a jury been called on to assess the amount due, proof of the exchange against Lexington would have been necessary to the recovery of damages on the ground of re-exchange; but the parties themselves having liquidated them at the rate the statute of Kentucky allowed, in cases very similar, we must presume, at this distant day, aside from any proof to the contrary, that ten per cent. was fair compensation; it may have been less; of this, however, the parties were the proper judges. Kent's Com., Lecture 44. Whether a bill of exchange, drawn in one state of this Union, payable in another, is a foreign bill, involves political considerations of some delicacy, although, we apprehend, of no intrinsic difficulty at this day. The respective states are sovereign within their own limits, and foreign to each other, regarding them as local governments. 2 Pet., 586. Kentucky and Louisiana, as political communities, being distinct and sovereign, and consequently foreign to each other in regard to the regulation of contracts, it follows, a bill drawn in one, payable in the other, is a foreign bill; and so this court adjudged in the cause of Buckner v. Finley, 2 Pet., 586 (§ 941, supra). The bill, in that case, was drawn at Baltimore, by citizens of Maryland, on Stephen Dever, at New Orleans; whereas, the one in this case was drawn and accepted in Kentucky, but payable at a bank in New Orleans. Yet, we think, the place of payment, being within a jurisdiction foreign to Kentucky, subjected the acceptor, James Daniel, to the performance of the contract, according to the laws of Louisiana, to every extent he would have been had he become a party to the bill at New Orleans; and that the effect of the contract, on all the parties to it, does not vary from the one sued on in Buckner v. Finley, 2 Pet., 586; Story's Conflict of Laws, §§ from 281 to 286. Being a foreign bill, and not having been affected by the statute of Kentucky, of course, the holders, by commercial usage, were entitled to re-exchange when the protest for non-payment was made; and those bound to take it up having paid, or agreed to pay, the damages, with a full knowledge of the facts, and a presumed knowledge of the law, voluntarily giving the bank a legal advantage, it would be going far for a court of chancery to take it away; the equities of the parties being equal, to say the least, it cannot be against conscience for the appellants to retain their judgment.

§ 1637. Mistake or ignorance of law affords no ground of relief from contracts fairly entered into, with a full knowledge of the facts.

The main question on which relief was sought by the bill, that on which the decree below proceeded, and on which the appellees rely in this court for its affirmance, is, Can a court of chancery relieve against a mistake of law? In its examination, we will take it for granted, the parties who took up the bill for $10,000 included the damages of $1,000 in the $8,000 note, and did so believing the statute of Kentucky secured the penalty to the bank; and that, in the construction of the statute, the appellees were mistaken. Vexed as the question formerly was, and delicate as it now is, from the confusion in which numerous and conflicting decisions have involved it, no discussion of cases can be gone into without hazarding the introduction of exceptions that will be likely to sap the direct principle we intend to apply; indeed, the remedial power, claimed by courts of chancery to relieve against mistakes of law, is a doctrine rather grounded upon exceptions than upon established rules. To this course of adjudication we are unwilling to yield. That mere mistakes of law are not remediable is well established, as was declared by this court in Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 1 Pet., 15; and we can only repeat what was there said: "That whatever exceptions there may be to the rule, they will be found few in number, and to have something peculiar in their character," and to involve other elements of decision. What is this case, and does it turn upon any peculiarity? Griffing sold a bill to the United States Bank, at Lexington, for $10,000, indorsed by three of the complainants, and accepted by the other, payable at New Orleans; the acceptor, J. D., was present in Kentucky, when the bill was made, and there accepted it; at maturity it was protested for non-payment, and returned. The debtors applied to take it up, when the creditors claimed ten per cent. damages, by force of the statute of Kentucky. All the parties bound to pay the bill were perfectly aware of the facts; at least the principals, who transacted the business, had the statute before them, or were familiar with it, as we must presume; they and the bank earnestly believing (as in all probability most others believed at the time) that the ten per cent. damages were due by force of the statute; and influenced by this opinion of the law, the $8,000 note was executed, including the $1,000 claimed for damages. Such is the case stated and supposed to exist by the complainants, stripped of all other considerations standing in the way of relief. Testing the case by the principle "that a mistake or ignorance of the law forms no ground of relief from contracts fairly entered into, with a full knowledge of the facts," and under circumstances repelling all presumptions of fraud, imposition, or undue advantage having been taken of the party, none of which are chargeable upon the appellants in this case, the question then is, Were the complainants entitled to relief? To which we respond decidedly in the negative.

Lastly, the appellants rest their defense on the statute of limitations. If the $1,000 claimed as damages were paid to the bank at the time the bill of exchange was taken up, then the cause of action to recover the money (had it been well founded) accrued at the time the mistaken payment was made, which could have been rectified in equity, or the money recovered back by a suit at law. The courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction; and the complainants having elected to resort to equity, which they had the right to do, were as subject to be barred by statute in the one court as in the other. In such cases the courts of equity act in obedience to the statute of limitation, from which they are no more exempt than courts of law. This suit having been brought more than five years after the bill was taken up, to apply the bar, it becomes necessary to inquire whether the damages were then paid. The complainants allege that they paid in July, 1819, $3,330.67, on account of the whole amount due, consisting of principal, interest, charges and damages; and for the balance of the amount of the bill, Griffing and James Daniel executed their negotiable note for $8,000, payable sixty days after date, to William Armstrong, to which Cunningham, Hanson and Henry Daniel were parties as indorsers or co-drawers; which note was discounted by the bank for the benefit of Griffing and James Daniel; and upon the express agreement between them and the bank, and the other parties to the note, that the proceeds of said $8,000 note should be applied to the payment of the balance due on said bill of exchange. The parties to this suit agreed in writing that the statement above set forth was true; and the bill was liquidated by the proceeds of the note, and the $3,330.67. If the pre-existing debt due the bank, and evidenced by the bill of exchange, was extinguished when the bill was taken up, then the remedy of the bank was gone, and the right to recover the $1,000 of excess arose. It is generally true that the giving a note for a pre-existing debt does not discharge the original cause of action, unless it is agreed that the note shall be taken in payment. 6 Cranch, 264. In reference to this principle, it is insisted for the appellees that the $8,000 note given to the bank, and the renewals of it afterwards, furnished mere evidence of the continuance of the original liability, from which they should be relieved; because the notes covered too much by $1,000 with interest, so the court below thought, and decreed the abatement. This court thinks the facts do not involve the principle referred to. We are not told by the appellees that the $8,000 note was taken in payment of the balance of the bill of exchange, but that $3,330.67 in cash was paid, and the note discounted, the money obtained upon it, and "by express agreement applied to the payment of the balance due on said bill of exchange." The debtors raised the cash, and paid the bill, nor did the $8,000 note enter into the transaction, further than that the proceeds were applied to the extinguishment of the pre-existing debt. Payment was, therefore, made on the 8th of July, 1819, and the $1,000 could have been sued for then as well as in 1827, when the bill of injunction was filed. It follows, the act of limitations is a bar to the appellees, aside from any other grounds of defense.

EX PARTE HEIDELBACK.—RE GLYN.

(District Court for Massachusetts: 2 Lowell, 526-537; 15 N. B. R., 495. 1876.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The bankrupt drew bills of exchange at Boston on London, to his own order, and indorsed and negotiated them in New York. They were protested. The question was, whether the rate of damages and interest was governed by the law of Massachusetts or of New York.

§ 1639. Authorities as to conflict of laws as to commercial paper.

Opinion by LOWELL, J.

The principles of law upon which this case must be decided have been thus laid down by the supreme court in Scudder v. Union Nat. Bank, 91 U. S. (1 Otto), 406 (§§ 158-162, supra): Matters pertaining to the execution, validity and interpretation of a contract are determined by the law of the place where it is made; those connected with its performance, by the law of the place of performance; those respecting the remedy, by the lex fori. The distinction between the law applicable to the validity and that governing the performance was first clearly announced in this country, I believe, in the very able opinion of the court in Depeau v. Humphreys, 20 Martin (La.), 1. A bill of exchange given in Louisiana for money advanced in that state, with a reservation of interest lawful there, but usurious in New York, was held to be valid though the payment was to be in New York. This decision is criticised by Judge Story, who inclines to refer all contracts, even as to their validity, to the place of performance. Conf. Laws, § 304. Judge Curtis, in arguing the important case of Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Metc., 381, assailed the same case, and maintained the doctrine of Story; but the court decided that the contract, which was a letter of credit issued in Boston, authorizing bills of exchange to be drawn at Gottenburg in Sweden on London, was to be governed, as to its validity and effect between the original parties, by the law of Massachusetts, though the bills drawn under it must conform to the law of Sweden, and the acceptance of the bills to the law of England; which is precisely the doctrine of Depeau v. Humphreys, and Scudder v. Union Bank, above cited. Mr. Wharton, in his valuable work on the Conflict of Laws, § 401, proposes as a rule which best harmonizes the authorities, one substantially like that of the decisions above referred to, though carrying the division one step further: "Obligations, in respect to the mode of their solemnization, are subject to the rule locus regit actum; in respect to their interpretation, to the lex loci contractus; in respect to the mode of performance, to the law of the place of performance. But the lex fori determines when and how such laws, when foreign, are to be adopted, and in all cases not specified above supplies the applicatory law."

§ 1640. By what law the drawer is bound.

In the case of a bill of exchange, the contracts of the various parties are distinct, and the drawer is bound, generally speaking, according to the law of the place where the bill is drawn, which is in most cases the same as that in which it is to be paid by him, if he pays it. Still he is to a certain extent involved in the same law with the acceptor, because upon due protest, demand and notice, he is bound to make good to the holder what the acceptor ought to have paid at the place where he was to pay, which makes it necessary to ascertain what that amount was by the law of that place, and whether by the same law due demand was made of the acceptor and due protest upon the dishonor. What the drawer should pay as interest, ex mora, or as damages, does not depend upon the law of the place where the acceptor was to pay the bill, if that is different from the place where the drawer's contract is to be performed. So far the parties to this petition are agreed, and I have therefore cited no authorities for some of my positions; but here they divide. The general creditors contend that the law of Massachusetts governs this matter of damages in the present instance, because the remedy is sought here; and, if that be not so, because Boston is the place of performance. The petitioners maintain that the law of New York is to be followed, because the bill was negotiated there and the first holder lived there.

§ 1641. State laws not binding on commercial questions, or in case of a conflict.

I am of opinion that the Massachusetts law governs, not because the damages are part of the remedy, which they are not, but because Boston was the place in which the drawer undertook to perform his contract. In Massachusetts it is held that the rate of interest to be recovered, ex mora, for default in paying a promissory note, is a mere matter of remedy. The decisions which establish this point, if applicable to bills of exchange, are not binding on this court, because the law of bills of exchange is part of general commercial jurisprudence, and not of local law or usage: Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, supra); Watson v. Tarpley, 18 How., 517 (§§ 1174-77, supra); and so is any question of the conflict of laws. When we have ascertained what local law applies to the case, we follow it; but the ascertainment itself is not a local question.

§ 1642. Rule that the contract is governed by the place of performance.

In most cases the place where a note is made or a bill is drawn, indorsed or accepted is, in fact, the place where the parties respectively undertake to pay it; and therefore questions rarely come up of any distinction between the law of the contract and that of the performance; and the courts, in pronouncing on such cases, have had no such distinction in mind, and any general statements as to the contract being governed by the law of the place where it is made or is to be performed must be taken with that allowance. When they say that a bill is to be paid by the acceptor at the place where he accepts, and by the drawer where he draws, they are stating the general presumption of fact that a bill or note is probably dated at the place where the party intends to pay it. The petitioners do not deny that it is the place of performance whose law must govern the decision of this controversy if that is a different place from the place of entering into the contract; but they insist that unless the contract provides expressly for a different place, that of making the contract is conclusively, and always, the place of performance, and that a contract is made where it is delivered.

§ 1643. What is the place of performance where none is mentioned.

My opinion is, that where no place of performance is mentioned in a note or bill, it is to be paid by each person liable upon it at the place of his own domicile, using that word in a sense large enough to include an established place of business as well as one of residence. Mr. Justice Story, Conf. of Laws, § 293 c, note 3, says that if a note is made in one state, and negotiated to an indorser in another, the contract of the maker with the indorsee takes effect as a promise in the state where the note was made, and not where it was indorsed. It will be recollected that Judge Story refers all contracts to the place of performance, and therefore his meaning here is that the maker of a note is to pay it at his own home. So Westlake (§ 235) affirms that the acceptor promises to pay the bill, if no place of payment is named, at the known place of business from which he dates his acceptance. And Wharton (§ 451) says that if an indorser indorses a note when casually absent from his domicile, it is the law of such domicile that binds, that being construed to be the place, so far as he is concerned, of payment. The eminent jurist Savigny, as quoted by Mr. Wharton (§ 426), gives several rules of law on this subject, of which two are pertinent to this case. One is, that the seat of a continuous business supplies its local law to all obligations emanating from him who conducts the business; and the other, that the debtor's domicile supplies the law to his obligations emanating from the domicile. These remarks agree with the general opinion of business men, as I suppose. I take it that if a banker issues bills or notes to circulate as money, there is no doubt that his undertaking is to pay them over his counter. I take it that this bill would be called a Boston bill on London, and that all merchants would understand that the drawer's undertaking is to pay in Boston if the drawee shall not do so in London, and he is duly notified thereof in Boston. Boston bills on London are bought in large quantities by merchants in New York, sometimes in Boston by agents of the buyers, and sometimes in New York from agents of the sellers, and sometimes, I dare say, on the cars between the two places. Now, it seems to me inadmissible to say that the same apparent contract between the same parties may have three different modes of performance, according as it is delivered in one place or another. It is true that all contracts take effect from delivery, but the question in every case is, what does the contract mean after it has been delivered? And I am of opinion that a banker's draft, dated at his usual and only place of business, is payable there on the default of the drawee by the implied terms of the contract itself, and by the usage of merchants and by law.

Let us look now at some of the decisions. It is well settled that, in order to hold the indorser of a note not by its terms payable at any place, demand must be made upon the maker at his domicile; that the date of the note is presumptive evidence of the domicile, and in Massachusetts, at least, the date proves the domicile for the purposes of demand and notice, unless the holder knows of some other. But if the holder knows the real domicile, payment must be demanded there. If the promisor has changed his domicile after the note is made, the holder is not obliged to follow him beyond the jurisdiction; but if his new domicile is within the same jurisdiction, he must demand payment there. Fisher v. Evans, 5 Binn., 541; Stewart v. Elen, 2 Caines, 127, per Livingston, J., explained in Anderson v. Drake, 14 Johns., 114; Woodworth v. Bank of America, 19 id., 391; McGruder v. Bank of Washington, 9 Wheat., 598 (§§ 801, 802, supra); Reid v. Morrison, 2 Watts & S., 401; Taylor v. Snyder, 3 Denio, 145; Smith v. Philbrick, 10 Gray, 252; Bank of Orleans v. Whittemore, 12 id., 469; Pierce v. Whitney, 22 Me., 110; 29 id., 188. The meaning of these rules is that the contract of the maker of a note is to pay it at his domicile, no matter where he makes or negotiates it; that the domicile being usually the same as the date, he may be held to the latter as his domicile, if he has not notified the taker or holder of his note to the contrary; that the domicile, so far as jurisdiction is concerned, is that which he had when the debt was contracted, and his contract is not to vary with every removal which he may make. Many of the cases turn on due diligence; but diligence in what? In demanding payment of the note at the place where the maker of it is bound and is presumed to be ready to pay it; that is to say, the place of performance. The decisive proof of this is, that if a place is agreed on for the performance, no demand need be made elsewhere; so that actual diligence and actual demand are not the important things, but a compliance with the law which requires demand to be made at the place of performance.

Coming now to decisions of particular cases more or less like that at bar, the first which I shall cite is a leading Scotch decision, which is given at large by two learned writers on the Conflict of Laws,—Sir R. Phillimore, vol. iv, p. 612 (1st ed.), and Mr. Wharton, § 452. In that case a Scotchman residing in Edinburgh made a note payable to a banker, named and described as manager of the British & Australian Bank, 55 Moorgate street, London. This was held to be a Scotch debt; nothing was proved about the place of delivery or of negotiation, from which we may infer that they were not considered important. In Hicks v. Brown, 12 Johns., 142, A. drew at New Orleans a bill on B. in Pennsylvania in favor of C. in Tennessee, and it was held that the law of the drawer's contract was that of Louisiana. That is precisely this case; the bill taking effect when it reached the hands of the person who had given consideration for it in a state other than that in which it was drawn. In Pine v. Smith, 11 Gray, 38, a citizen of Massachusetts negotiated in New York for a loan from a citizen of that state, at eight per cent. interest, which would make the contract void for usury in New York, and this was secured by note, with a mortgage of land in Massachusetts. Held, a Massachusetts contract; not, however, by reason of the mortgage, which is not once mentioned in the opinion of the court. The case of Grimshaw v. Bender, 6 Mass., 319, goes much beyond the present. There, a bill was drawn in England upon a firm whose domicile was in Boston; but the bill was payable in London, and was accepted in England by a member of the Boston house who happened to be there. The bill not having been paid, was sued against the acceptors in Boston, and the court held that the measure of damages was regulated by the law of Massachusetts, because that was the domicile of the acceptors. That case is not considered sound by Judge Story. Conf. Laws, § 419; Mr. Wharton cites both the case and the criticism, without giving his own opinion. Conf. Laws, § 451, note a. The bill was expressly made payable in London, and of course the acceptors should pay in Boston what would have produced the amount of the bill in London, which, in the absence of statute or local usage, is exactly what a drawer in Boston would be obliged to pay, and, therefore, the substance of the decision is sound; but in making the acceptors technically drawers in Boston, and liable to damages as such, the court overlooked the circumstance that they were not the drawers, but stood as London acceptors casually sued in Boston. After this allowance is made, the case remains a high authority for holding the domicile to be the place of performance, when none other is appointed by the contract itself.

It has been twice held in England that a bill drawn abroad and filled up and negotiated in England is valid, if sufficiently stamped according to the law of the place of apparent drawing, though not sufficiently by the law of England. Snaith v. Mingay, 1 Maule & S., 87; Baker v. Sterne, 9 Ex., 684. These decisions have been supposed to depend upon an estoppel worked by the negotiation of the bills to innocent holders; but this explanation is not sound; they are put by the judgments upon the plain and simple reason that the contract of the drawer was made abroad; and not only so, but estoppel does not avail against the stamp laws of England. Steadman v. Duhamel, 1 C. B., 888. In Pennsylvania, too, it was decided that the drawer of a bill, signed by him in blank as to amount, etc., in that state, though filled up and passed in England, must pay damages according to the law of Pennsylvania at the date of the drawing, and this though the rate of damages had been diminished by a statute passed before the bill was actually negotiated. Lennig v. Ralston, 23 Penn. St. (11 Harris), 137. In Campbell v. Nichols, 4 Vroom, 81, the precise distinction is taken that the validity of an acceptor's contract depends upon the law of the place where the bill is negotiated and first becomes a contract, but that in all matters concerning the interest to be paid by him, upon that of the place where he undertook to pay. In a later case, cited by the petitioners here, the same court, citing Campbell v. Nichols, say, though they do not decide, that a drawer's contract may differ from an acceptor's in this respect (Freese v. Brownell, 6 Vroom, 235); but there is neither reason nor authority for any distinction; each is liable to make good his promise when and where he undertook to make it good, as I have already shown; and if that means at the acceptor's domicile for his part, it means at the drawer's for his. In Van Zant v. Arnold, 31 Ga., 210, the maker and the indorser of a note both lived in Georgia, but they made and indorsed it in Tennessee, where it took effect as a contract by being delivered to an agent of a creditor of the maker who lived in New York. It was held to be a contract governed by the law of Georgia as against the indorser, because he was domiciled there.

§ 1645. Lex loci contractus the place where the bill is negotiated — exceptions.

Many cases are cited by the petitioners to prove that the lex loci contractus is where the bill or note is actually negotiated. I have assumed that to be the general rule; though, if it were needful, I could point out many exceptions to it. It is not necessary, because every case but one which touches that point turns upon the validity of the contract, and not upon the mode of performance, nor upon the damages for a breach. Thus in Tilden v. Blair, 21 Wall., 241 (§§ 389, 390, supra), a bill for $5,000 was drawn in Illinois and accepted in New York, and then sent back to Illinois, where it was indorsed and negotiated at a rate of interest which would be usurious in New York, and avoid the contract. The acceptor was sued in the circuit court of the United States sitting in New York; and the court held that the validity of the acceptance depended upon the place of negotiation, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for an amount which it considered the law of Illinois made the contract available for, in its inception. The supreme court said that the bill was good for its face, and that the only error was in not giving judgment for the whole $5,000 and interest. They could not correct the error, nor say whether the interest should be reckoned at the legal rate in Illinois or in New York, because the plaintiff had acquiesced in the ruling below. The only point in this case, therefore, is not reached by that decision. All the other cases cited are open to a similar remark, excepting Cook v. Moffat, 5 How., 295, which is said to be decisive of this question in favor of the petitioners. I do not so understand it. That case was, that A., in New York, sold goods there to B., of Baltimore, who gave his note for the price, and afterwards took the benefit of the insolvent law of Maryland. The court held that the discharge in Maryland did not release the debt due to A. Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court, says that the notes, being delivered in New York in payment of goods purchased there, were, of course, payable there, and governed by the laws of that place, citing Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet., 635; Story, Confl., § 287. The case cited decides that advances made by a factor are to be reimbursed to him at the place where he makes them; and Judge Story, at the place cited, repeats the same doctrine. I cannot suppose that Mr. Justice Grier intended to overrule all the cases and opinions which I have cited above. There is undoubtedly much authority for the proposition, that the whole contract of sale of goods, including the payment, is governed by the law of the place of sale; this is to say, the buyer is to seek out and pay the seller if the goods are sold on credit, and if for cash, he must pay him on the spot. By the law both of New York and of Maryland, the note given for the price of goods is merely security for the payment; and on surrender of the note an action for the price of the goods may be maintained. If, therefore, an action for goods sold would not be barred by a discharge in Maryland, because its performance was to be in New York, the security ought not to be destroyed thereby. This is what I understand Mr. Justice Grier to mean in the brief remarks above quoted, though he speaks in the popular way of the note being given in payment for the goods. There are, likewise, I believe, decisions that an ordinary loan is to be reimbursed where it is made, at least if no note or bill is given for it, though the cases are, perhaps, not reconcilable on this point.

This transaction was not a sale of goods nor a loan of money, but the transfer of a credit. The undertaking of Glyn was, that if Benson & Co. should not accept or should not pay in London, and due demand and protest were made there, he would pay in Boston, on due notice and demand here.

The interest and damages to be proved against Glyn's estate are to be assessed by the law of Massachusetts.

§ 1646. Waiver; interest recoverable.—In an action by the United States against A., upon a bond conditioned to comply with an agreement to pay a certain sum of money on or before the 1st of March at Amsterdam, and, in case the sum was not paid at the time and place mentioned, then to repay the United States the value of the sum to be paid, at the rate of exchange current in Philadelphia, at the time the demand of payment was made, together with damages at twenty per cent. in the same manner as if bills of exchange had been drawn for the said sum, and they had been returned protested for non-payment, and lawful interest for any delay of payment which may take place after the demand, and the sum was received by an agent of the United States on the 13th day of May instead of March, without any stipulation respecting that receipt upon the agreement with A., held, that this acceptance was a waiver of the claim of damages, but that the United States might recover interest on the amount due from the 1st of March to the 13th of May. United States v. Gurney, 4 Cr., 333.

§ 1647. Court may assess.—Bills of exchange were drawn in Rhode Island upon parties in London and went to protest. Held, damages recoverable, and that the court could assess them. Brown v. Van Braam, 3 Dal., 344.

§ 1648. Costs of protest.—The holder of a promissory note may recover the costs of protesting it in a suit against an indorser of it, who, when sued, makes default. Doughty v. Hildt, * 1 McL., 334.

§ 1649. Damages on a protested bill should include re-exchange. Russell v. Wiggin, 2 Story, 214 (§§ 154-157).

§ 1650. In Virginia.—In Virginia, in an action by indorsee against indorser on a foreign bill, the defendant is liable for damages at the rate fixed by the statute of Virginia, the contract of indorsement having been made there. Slocum v. Pomeroy, * 6 Cr., 224.

§ 1651. In New York.—The holder of a bill of exchange, when returned under protest, is entitled in New York not only to the amount of the bill, but to twenty per cent. damages besides, as compensation for his disappointment, although the action is brought on a protest for non-acceptance, and before notice to the drawer of a protest for non-payment. United States v. Barker, 2 Paine, 340 (§ 1011).

§ 1652. In Alabama.—The Alabama statute allows ten per cent. damages against an indorser upon the non-acceptance of the bill. Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet., 80 (§§ 1178-82).

§ 1654. How computed.—Exchange is to be computed at rates ruling at the maturity of the note, not at those ruling at the time of the trial. Price v. Teal, * 4 McL., 201.

§ 1655. Indorser cannot recover, when.—An indorser cannot recover of the drawer damages for the non-acceptance of a bill which the indorser has neither paid nor is liable for. Kingston v. Wilson, 4 Wash., 310.

§ 1656. Special indorsement; no damages allowed.— A special indorsement of a bill “for the use” of the indorser releases him from liability to pay damages for its non-payment, although the indorsee be in fact a holder for a valuable consideration. Brown v. Jackson, * 2 Wash., 24; S. C., 1 Wash., 512.

§ 1657. Damages; how assessed.— When notice was given defendant of the protest of his bill for non-acceptance and non-payment, American bills of exchange on England could be bought in specie fifteen per cent. below par. Held, that this fact might be shown in evidence, and that damages should have been assessed not on the par, but upon the specie of the bill. United States v. Barker, 2 Paine, 340 (§ 1011).

XIII. MEASURE OF RECOVERY.

SUMMARY — Breach of guaranty, §§ 1658, 1659.

§ 1658. The measure of damages in actions by indorsees against indorsers or guarantors of commercial paper is the amount paid by the indorsee to the indorser or guarantor, with interest. Head v. Green, § 1660.

§ 1659. On a special guaranty that a certain amount is due on a note, the measure of damages is that amount. Ibid.

[NOTES.— See §§ 1661-1673.]

HEAD v. GREEN.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 5 Bissell, 811-814. 1873.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— Action on the following guaranty: “I hereby guaranty that there is now due and unpaid on the within note the original sum of $500 and interest, except the $100 indorsed. But it is expressly understood that this guaranty is without liability of any kind on the undersigned, except as above, as to amount due. (Signed) Harley Green.” Verdict for plaintiff. Motion for a new trial.

§ 1660. Measure of damages on breach of guaranty.

Opinion by BLODGETT, J.

The only question now made is as to what is the true measure of damages. The well established rule in actions by indorsees against indorsers or guarantors of negotiable paper is, that the measure of damages is the amount paid by the assignee or indorsee to the guarantor or indorser, with interest. But this rule has been only applied, so far as my examination has gone, to cases where there was either an express or implied guaranty of payment or collectibility, and I have been unable to find from any research of my own, nor has the industry of counsel on either side furnished me with any adjudged case, or even the dictum of a court or text writer, as to what is the true measure of damages on the breach of a guaranty like this. On a guaranty of payment or collectibility, the holder knows that if he take the necessary steps to fix the liability of the guarantor, he can recover back at least the amount paid for the note, with interest; but in a guaranty like this, he has no such redress. Here the holder of the guaranty takes all the chances of the collectibility of the demand. There is no liability even by the guarantor in case the maker of the paper proves insolvent, but the holder must lose all he has paid unless he can collect from the maker. And it seems to me that the measure of his damages, in case of a breach of the contract as to the amount due, is what plaintiff has lost by that breach; which in this case should be the whole amount due on the note at the time suit is brought. And it appears to me that one weighty reason why this rule should be applied to a guaranty like this, is that the holder of notes or bills who attempts to negotiate them after due must be presumed to know (and he alone) whether there are any legal or equitable defenses to the paper he purposes to transfer to another. And if he assumes no risk in regard to the collectibility of the debt, he should at least be held to make good his express undertaking that the paper represents an honest demand for what purports to be due thereon. Can it be supposed that any person would buy a note with such a guaranty unless he understood that the guarantor was holden to make good the pledge he gives. And here it appears that the judgment would have been worth the full amount, if it had been obtained. Motion for new trial overruled, and judgment for plaintiff.

§ 1661. In general.—The production of negotiable paper by plaintiff suing upon it, with proof or admission of the genuineness of the signatures and of the indorsement, entitles him to recover from the parties the full amount of it with interest, unless a satisfactory defense is interposed. Waynesville Nat. Bank v. Irons, 8 Fed. R., 1 (§§ 1533-38).

§ 1662. Recovery on a note is limited to the principal sum demanded; but interest may be added if ad damnum is high enough to cover it. Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat., 431 (§§ 958-963).

§ 1663. If no averment as to interest is made in the declaration, only the debt and interest from maturity are recoverable. Chinn v. Hamilton, Hemp., 438.

§ 1664. Where the full amount of a note is due at time of verdict, but not when suit commenced, verdict for full amount is good. State Bank of Ohio v. Fox, 3 Blatch., 431.

§ 1665. By indorsers and indorsees.—Indorsees are entitled to recover full amount of the paper they hold, although they may hold a part of it as trustee for third parties. Ibid.

§ 1666. The indorsee of a note can recover only the amount actually paid for the note and not its face value, especially if he discounted it usuriously. In re Many,* 17 N. B. R., 514.

§ 1667. In an action by payee against acceptor, the plaintiff cannot recover the costs and damages recovered in a former suit against the payee as indorser on the same bill. King v. Phillips, Pet. C. C., 350.

§ 1668. A., of Illinois, made notes to B. of the same state. B. indorsed them to C., of Missouri. A. paid C. thirty per cent. of the value of the notes. B. having been adjudged bankrupt, C. filed a claim against his estate for the whole amount of the notes with interest and statutory damages under the Missouri statute. Held, that C. could recover only the unpaid balance on the notes, and that the Missouri statute, regulative of damages, had no application in Illinois. In re Pulsifer, 9 Biss., 487.

§ 1669. New promise.—The drawer agreed to pay his bill as soon as he should be able. Held, in an action on the new promise, that plaintiff could recover only the amount of the bill and interest from the time it was proved the defendant was able to pay it. Lonsdale v. Brown, 4 Wash., 149.

§ 1670. Specie value or legal currency.—Where a payment was to be made by A. to B., on a certain day, in the paper of the Miami Exporting Co., or its equivalent, and payment was not made on that day, held, that B. could recover only the specie value of the notes at the time they should have been paid, and could not recover the nominal amount of the notes in specie. Robinson v. Noble, 8 Pet., 181.

§ 1671. — note given during rebellion.—The sum in actual money which a promissory note given in Georgia during the rebellion represents is determined by the value in coin or legal currency of the United States at the time the note was made and at the place where it was made, of Confederate treasury notes, equal in nominal amount to the number of dollars specified. Stewart v. Salamon, 4 Otto, 434.

§ 1672. A. made a deposit in a bank in the bills of the bank, which bills were passing current at half their nominal value, and received a certificate of deposit in the following form: "A. this day deposited $7,730.81 to the credit of B., which is subject to B.'s order on presentation of this certificate." Held, that B. should recover, and for the face of the certificate, in gold or silver. 1st. Because the language of the certificate is expressive of a general deposit. 2d. Because the act incorporating the bank provided that the bills of the bank should be payable and redeemable in gold or silver. Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet., 318.

§ 1673. The existence of an agreement with a depositor that his bank shall pay his checks in the same kind of money deposited is a question of fact for the jury. Olshausen v. Lewis,* 1 Biss., 419.

XIV. CONFLICT OF LAWS.

§ 1674. In general.—The question: Is the holder of a negotiable note who has taken it as security for a pre-existing debt a holder for value, and so protected against any equities subsisting between the original parties to it? is a question of general commercial law, and, in deciding it, federal courts are not bound by state decisions. Wood v. Seitzinger, * 2 Fed. R., 843.

§ 1675. The question whether or not a certificate of deposit is a promissory note is a question of commercial, not of local law, and the decisions of federal, rather than state courts, should determine it. Austen v. Miller, 5 McL., 153.

§ 1676. Bills of exchange.—The law of Spain governs a transaction in Cuba involving the drawing of a bill of exchange. Wallace v. Agry, 4 Mason, 336 (§§ 773-776).

§ 1677. Bills were written and indorsed in blank in Boston and forwarded to the maker's agent in New York, who negotiated them, at the same time filling up the blank indorsement. Held, that interest and damages were to be computed according to the laws of Massachusetts. Ex parte Heidelberg, 15 N. B. R., 495; S. C., 23 Int. Rev. Rec., 73 (§§ 1639-45).

§ 1678. Where the drawers and indorsers resided in Mississippi, and the bill was drawn and indorsed there, their contracts and liabilities are governed by the laws of that state. Musson v. Lake, 4 How., 262 (§§ 746, 747).

§ 1679. A bill of exchange payable in Philadelphia is governed by the laws of Pennsylvania. Golden v. Prince, 3 Wash., 313.

§ 1680. In giving a bill upon a person in a foreign country the drawer is deemed to act with reference to the law of that country and to accept such conditions as it provides with reference to the presentment of the bill for acceptance and payment. The law of Norway allows a year in which to present a sight draft, and a presentation of an American draft within three months after it was drawn is reasonable and lawful. Pierce v. Indseth,* 16 Otto, 546.

§ 1681. Acceptance.—An acceptance is governed by the law of the place where it is made. Musson v. Lake, 4 How., 262 (§§ 746, 747).

§ 1682. A letter of credit executed in Boston by the agent of a London banking house, and with their authority, is a contract governed by the laws of Massachusetts. Russell v. Wiggin, 2 Story, 214 (§§ 154-157).

§ 1683. Promissory note.—A note payable in Ohio is an Ohio contract, and governed by the laws of that state. Gaylord v. Johnson, 5 McL., 443.

§ 1685. Promissory notes made in Maryland, but delivered in New York and given for goods sold in New York, are payable in and governed by the laws of New York and cannot be discharged by the insolvent laws of Maryland enacted and in force prior to the contracts. Cook v. Moffat, 5 How., 294.

§ 1686. Where a note is drawn, assigned and payable in Kentucky, it will be considered with reference to the laws of that state. United States Bank v. Tyler,* 4 Pet., 366.

§ 1687. A., of New York, made promissory notes for the accommodation of B., of New York. The notes were made payable at A.'s office, to the order of B. B. indorsed the notes and placed them in the hands of D., a note broker in New York, to be negotiated for account of B. C., of Connecticut, purchased the notes at ten per cent. discount and sent D. a check for the amount of the notes at ten per cent. discount. D. collected the check. Held, that the transaction was governed by the law of New York and not the law of Connecticut, and that the notes were void for usury. That the giving of accommodation paper creates no debt, unless and until the paper is negotiated. In re Dodge, 9 Ben., 480.

§ 1688. Where notes were issued in Vermont by a railway company pursuant to a vote of the stockholders and under the authority of a statute of Vermont, but were payable in Massachusetts, held, that the question of usury was to be decided by the laws of Vermont. Codman v. Vermont, etc., R. Co., 16 Blatch., 165.

§ 1689. A promissory note made in the District of Columbia, "negotiable at the Bank of Alexandria," is governed by the laws in force at Alexandria. Gilman v. King, 2 Cr. C. C., 48.

The indorsement being deemed made in New York, the law of that state should govern. Mott v. Wright, 4 Biss., 53.

§ 1691. A promissory note was executed and made payable in New York, but indorsed for the accommodation of the maker in Rhode Island and there negotiated. Held, that the rate of interest was governed by the laws of Rhode Island. Providence County Savings Bank v. Frost, * 13 N. B. R., 358.

§ 1692. Notes made and signed in Philadelphia, but delivered and discounted in New York, are governed by the laws of New York. In re Conrad, * 8 Phil., 147.

§ 1694. A promissory note signed by the maker in New York was transmitted by him to Rhode Island to be discounted. Held, that being so discounted, the contract was to be governed by the laws of Rhode Island on the question of usury. Providence Co. Savings Bank v. Frost, 14 Blatch., 233.

§ 1695. Indorsement.—Contract of indorsement is a distinct contract from the note, and is governed by the law of the place where it is made. Burrows v. Hannegan, * 1 McL., 315.

XV. EVIDENCE.

§ 1705. Witnesses; competency; interest.—A notary is a competent witness to prove presentment of note for payment, although liable for negligence in not presenting it at the proper time. Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How., 317 (§§ 993-1000).

§ 1706. The maker of a note is a competent witness to prove that it was made to be discounted at a bank for the purpose of taking up a note, with the defendant's indorsement upon it, about becoming due, and that it was discounted without the consent of the defendant, and that time was given to the maker without defendant's consent. White v. Burns, 5 Cr. C. C., 123.

§ 1707. In an action by indorsee against remote indorser, the maker of a note is competent to prove that after its execution, and after it had passed out of his possession, it had been altered in a material part, the maker having been released from liability for costs. Frazer v. Carpenter, 2 McL., 235.

§ 1708. Payee sued drawer on a bill indorsed by the payee to A. and by A. to B. Held, that A. was competent as a witness to prove he indorsed the bill to C. without consideration and merely to recover the money for plaintiff, and that A. had no interest in the suit. Lonsdale v. Brown, * 3 Wash., 404.

§ 1709. The drawer and subsequent indorsers are incompetent to prove facts which tend to discharge a prior indorser. Bank of Metropolis v. Jones, 8 Pet., 12.

§ 1710. Burden of proof.—In an action by indorsee against maker of a draft, held, that an acknowledgment to plaintiff's attorney by the indorser that he had indorsed such a draft (the draft not being shown to him) sufficiently proved the indorsement to throw upon the defendant the burden of proving that there was another draft drawn by defendant and indorsed by the same indorser. Hyer v. Smith, 3 Cr. C. C., 437.

§ 1711. Quære: In an action by indorsees against maker of a note, whether the onus of proving that receipts given by the payee to the maker for partial payments were given before or after the assignment lay upon the maker or upon the indorsers. Stuart v. Greenleaf, * 8 Day (Conn.), 311.

§ 1712. Where a protested bill is held for a long time without notice, the onus probandi is thrown upon the holder. He must prove everything; nothing is required from the drawer. Hopkirk v. Page, 3 Marsh., 20 (§§ 1018-26).

§ 1713. Presumptions.—An indorsement without date upon negotiable paper is presumed to have been made at the time the paper was executed and before it was negotiated. Michigan Bank v. Eldred, 9 Wall., 544 (§§ 250-255).

§ 1715. Drawee's possession of a bill is prima facie evidence that he has paid all who had any claims against him upon it. Lonsdale v. Brown,* 3 Wash., 404.

§ 1716. The possession of a bill of exchange by an acceptor for the accommodation of the drawers, after it has once been negotiated, is prima facie evidence of his right to sue. Hunter v. Kibbe,* 5 McL., 379.

§ 1717. Payment of a check by a bank is prima facie evidence that it has funds of the drawer; especially if the check be returned to the drawer. Bank of United States v. Wilson, 3 Cr. C. C., 218.

§ 1718. In an action on the last of a series of notes, the previous notes having been paid, it is not necessary, under a count for the original consideration, for the plaintiff to produce the previous notes. It is presumed they were surrendered when paid. Lyman v. United States Bank, 12 How., 225.

§ 1719. An agreement not to take advantage of the statute of limitations, and a promise to authorize counsel to docket a suit on the note, are not sufficient to authorize a presumption of actual notice. The Bank v. Corcoran,* 3 Cr. C. C., 46.

§ 1720. Parol evidence.—Parol evidence of any agreement or custom is inadmissible to alter or vary the contract of indorsement, whether it be in full or in blank. Bank of Alexandria v. Deneale,* 2 Cr. C. C., 488.

§ 1721. An allegation that a note was, by mistake, made payable to another besides the plaintiff must be sustained by proof. McMicken v. Webb,* 6 How., 292.

§ 1722. Parol evidence is not admissible to prove that at the time an indorser and the defendant indorsed the paper it was agreed that they were not to be held responsible. United States Bank v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51.

§ 1723. Parol evidence is admissible to prove whether a party who puts his name upon the back of a note is to be regarded as an indorser, as a surety or as a guarantor. Pierce v. Irvine,* 1 Minn., 369.

§ 1724. Parol evidence of an agreement contemporaneous with a promissory note and varying its terms or legal effect is not admissible. Brown v. Spofford, 5 Otto, 474 (§§ 391-396).

§ 1725. Declarations and admissions.—Declarations made by the holder of a promissory note, while he held it, are not competent evidence in a suit upon it, or in relation to it, by a subsequent holder, although the declarant may be in possession, as tenant with an agreement to purchase, of real estate which was deeded in trust to third parties as security for the note. The declarations of one in possession of land are competent only as against those claiming the land under him, and to show the character of the possession of the person making them and by what title he holds, but not to sustain or destroy the record title. Dodge v. Freedman's S. & T. Co., 3 Otto, 879 (§§ 221-224).

§ 1726. A drawer's admission of liability is not competent evidence in an action by holder against indorser. Allen v. King, 4 McL., 128 (§§ 1041-47).

§ 1727. Where a notary is an indorser, the declarations of his deputy are not admissible in evidence. Bank of Columbia v. Mackall,* 2 Cr. C. C., 631.

§ 1728. Protest and notice; what competent.—It is competent for a notary to testify that he made demand and gave notice on the third day of grace, although he is unable to state the days of the month or year, without reference to his books, etc. The Bank v. Abbott,* 3 Cr. C. C., 94.

§ 1729. If a notary does not recollect whether he made demand, he may refer to his book and testify that he made demand as therein stated. Thornton v. Stoddert,* 1 Cr. C. C., 534.

§ 1730. Where a notary testified that he did not then recollect, nor had he any minute in his book of the time when he gave notice to the indorser; but that his book contains a memorandum that notice was given the indorsers, as well as a memorandum of the demand, and further that it was his universal practice to give notice on the day on which he made the demand, which was on the day after the last day of grace, and that he believes he gave notice on that day, held, competent evidence for the consideration of the jury. Coyle v. Gozzler, 2 Cr. C. C., 625.

§ 1731. The books of a notary public, proved to have been regularly kept, are admissible after his death to prove demand and notice of non-payment of a promissory note. Nichols v. Webb, 8 Wheat., 326.

§ 1732. The indorsement of the clerk of a notary, on the protest (he being living), that due notice was given the indorser, is not sufficient to bind the indorser, nor can the usages of the office supply the defect. In the absence of the clerk his deposition is necessary to prove the fact of notice. Whitehead v. Jones, 2 McL., 28.

§ 1733. The testimony of a notary who protested a bill of exchange that he sent the drawers notice of the dishonor of the bill, and the fact that the bill was enumerated among the debts of the drawers on the schedule returned to the court during proceedings in bankruptcy against the drawers, was held, in a subsequent suit against the drawers, sufficient evidence of notice of protest. Hyde v. Stone, 20 How., 170.

§ 1734. Proof that a letter containing notice was, on the third day of grace, addressed to the indorser and mailed, is enough to charge him with notice. The letter itself need not be shown in evidence. Lindenberger v. Beall,* 6 Wheat., 104.

§ 1735. A deposition of the notary public was offered to prove a copy of the protest. It contained a certificate, referred to and marked as "Document A.," under the seal of the notary, and which purported "to be a true copy of the original protest, draft and memorandum of the manner in which the notices were served, on file and of record in his office." Held, that the copy of the protest was sufficient evidence of the protest without producing the original, that being the record of protest in the notary's books and in his possession, and that the copy of the protest was properly considered a part of the deposition. McAfee v. Doremus,* 5 How., 53.

§ 1736. A statute of Mississippi (H. & H. Digest, 609, § 38) made the official act of a notary, "certified and attested by him," evidence of protest, and it was the usage of notaries, when making protests, for the notary to make demand and give notice, and after doing so, to write out the facts in his memorandum book, or to preserve them otherwise; and from these facts to make up the record of such protest as required by the statute. Held, that the statute was enacted with reference to the usage; and that a paper setting forth the facts of demand at the bank, and the answer of the teller that the note would not be paid because no funds had been deposited for such purpose, and that a formal protest for non-payment had been made, and also the fact of forwarding the notices, and concluding thus: "Which facts constitute, as herein set forth, a full and true record of all that was done by me in the premises," signed, sealed and sworn to by the notary, is sufficient evidence of the protest, although it purports to be an original record of itself. It need not necessarily be a copy of the notary's record. Brandon v. Loftus,* 4 How., 137.

§ 1737. A notary's certificate of demand and protest is admissible evidence. Jones v. Heaton,* 1 McL., 317.

§ 1738. Courts take judicial notice of the seals of notaries public. So held in relation to the seal of a Norwegian notary, authenticating a certificate of protest of a bill of exchange, which was received in evidence without proof. Pierce v. Indeeth,* 16 Otto, 546.

§ 1739. In an action against the indorser of a promissory note, the deposition of a party, which tends to prove the entries made in the notarial book of a deceased notary public, as to demand, protest and notice of the note, is admissible in evidence. Whitney v. Hunt, 5 Cr. C., 120.

§ 1740. The notarial certificate of protest of foreign bills is in itself sufficient evidence of the dishonor of the bill unless the suit is brought in the country where the protest was made. In such case the notary himself should be produced if within the reach of process, and his certificate is not per se evidence. But the notarial certificate of protest is competent evidence of the dishonor of a bill drawn in Kentucky upon persons in Louisiana. Townesley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet., 170 (§§ 142-150); Jones v. Heaton,* 1 McL., 317.

§ 1741. Note or bill; money counts.—A note is admissible as evidence for plaintiff (indorsee) and against defendant (remote indorser), under the general money counts. Frazer v. Carpenter, 2 McL., 235; Brown v. Noyes, 2 Woodb. & M., 75. And the case is open to evidence disproving the face of the note. Id. In an action by payee against maker the note is admissible. Stone v. Lawrence, 4 Cr. C. C., 11. An indorser who has paid the note and sues the maker should produce the note. Morgan v. Rientzel,* 7 Cr., 273.

§ 1742. Under the money counts a bill is admissible in an action by the drawer against the acceptor, although the bill do not contain the words "value received"—such words not being essential in a negotiable instrument. Benjamin v. Tillman,* 2 McL., 213.

BOARD OF EXCHANGE.

§ 1. The incorporeal right to a seat in a board of exchange is property; and, it seems, would pass to the assignee in bankruptcy on the holder's becoming bankrupt. Hyde v. Woods, §§ 8, 4.

§ 2. And a provision in the constitution of the board, that in case of the insolvency of a member his seat shall be assigned to be sold, the proceeds of the sale to be applied first to the payment of creditors who are members of the board, is not contrary to public policy nor in violation of the provisions of the bankrupt act. Ibid.

HYDE v. WOODS.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of California.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board is a voluntary association for business purposes, organized in 1862, in that city. The membership is elective, with certain provisions for a right to sell and assign the seat, subject to an election of the purchasing member by the board. This is generally done, unless special reasons appear to the contrary; and the result is, that, as the number of members is limited, the right to a seat at the board has a moneyed value. When a member fails to perform his contracts, or becomes insolvent, he can no longer be a member of the board, until he resumes payment; but his seat may be sold for his benefit, or for that of his creditors, among the other members of the board. Art. 15 of the constitution of the board provides that, "in sales of seats for account of delinquent members, the proceeds shall be applied to the benefit of the members of this board exclusive of outside creditors, unless there shall be a balance after payment of the claims of members in full."

Thomas W. Fenn, who became a member of this board October 21, 1871, was declared a bankrupt October 1, 1872, and plaintiff in error was appointed his assignee. On the 24th day of August preceding, Fenn became a delinquent, by failing to fulfil his contracts with members of the board, and thereupon made and delivered to defendants in error an assignment of his seat in said board, with authority to sell the same to the best advantage, and apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of all debts due from him to the members of said board. They did sell it for $10,000; the purchaser was duly elected and installed, and the money paid to creditors, who were members of the board, including $2,973.30 to defendants. Upon these facts, found by the circuit court, sitting without a jury, the counsel for plaintiff asks a reversal of the judgment of that court in favor of defendants, on the ground that the assignment by Fenn to the defendants, and their receipt and disbursement of the $10,000, were preferences within the meaning of the bankrupt law, and that they are, therefore, liable to him as assignee for the amount received.

There can be no doubt that the incorporeal right which Fenn had to this seat when he became bankrupt was property, and the sum realized by the assignees from its sale proves that it was valuable property. Nor do we think there can be any reason to doubt that, if he had made no such assignment, it would have passed, subject to the rules of the stock board, to his assignee in bankruptcy, and that if there had been left in the hands of the defendants any balance after paying the debts due to the members of the board, that balance might have been recovered by the assignee.

§ 4. — and a provision in the constitution of the board, that on the insolvency of a member the proceeds of a sale of his seat shall be applied first to the payment of creditors who are members, is valid under the bankrupt law.

It is very ingeniously argued by counsel for the assignee that, being property of the bankrupt, he had no right to make the disposition of it which he did, by preferring his creditors who were members of the board to those who were not. The answer to this, so far as Fenn's assignment to defendants is concerned, is that the part of it which gives this direction to the proceeds of the sale was wholly unnecessary and nugatory; for if the article of the association which we have cited in full was effective, it controlled the disposition of those proceeds; if it is void, or for any other reason ineffectual, then it must be conceded that the assignment of Fenn was an unlawful preference within the meaning of the bankrupt law. The question turns solely upon the validity of that article of the association. There is no reason why the stock board should not make membership subject to the rule in question, unless it be that it is a violation of some statute or of some principle of public policy. It does not violate the provision of the bankrupt law against preference of creditors, for such a preference is only void when made within four months previous to the commencement of the bankrupt proceedings. Neither the bankrupt law nor any principle of morals is violated by this provision, so far as we can see. A seat in this board is not a matter of absolute purchase. Though we have said it is property, it is incumbered with conditions when purchased, without which it could not be obtained. It never was free from the conditions of article 15, neither when Fenn bought nor at any time before or since. That rule entered into and became an incident of the property when it was created, and remains a part of it into whose hands soever it may come. As the creators of this right — this property — took nothing from any man's creditors when they created it, no wrong was done to any creditor by the imposition of this condition.

The fundamental vice of plaintiffs' argument is to treat the case as though Fenn, owning this property absolutely as his own without restriction, had then fettered it, of his own accord, with the condition that it must always stand incumbered by a preferred lien to his fellow members. It is said that it is against the policy of the bankrupt law, against public policy, to permit a man to make in this or any other manner a standing or perpetual appropriation of his property to the prejudice of his general creditors; and it is to this point that the numerous authorities of counsel are cited. They all, however, relate to cases where a man has done this with property which was his own — property on which he himself imposed the direction or the incumbrance which impeded creditors. It is quite different where a man takes property by purchase or otherwise which is subject to that direction or disposition when he receives it. It is no act of his which imposes the burden. It was imposed by those who had a right to do it, and to make it an accompaniment of any title which they gave to it. The principle here contended for by counsel was well considered in the recent case of Nicholls, Assignee, v. Eaton, 91 U. S., 716. In that case the mother of the bankrupt, Eaton, had bequeathed to him by will the income of a fund, with a condition in the trust that on his bankruptcy or insolvency the legacy should cease and go to his wife or children, if he had any, and if not it should lapse into the general fund of the testator's estate, and be subject to other dispositions. The assignee of the bankrupt sued to recover the interest bequeathed to the bankrupt, on the ground that this condition was void as against public policy. But this court, on a full examination of the authorities, both in England and this country, held that the objection was not well taken; that the owner of property might make such a condition in the transfer of that which was his own, and in doing so violated no creditor's rights and no principle of public policy.

The case of Nicholson, Assignee, v. Gouch, 5 El. & Bl., 999, was in many respects very much like the present, the action having been brought to recover certain property which, under the rules of the exchange, of which the bankrupt was a member, had been received and paid to his fellow-members. This was asserted to be a preference void by the bankrupt law; and the rules of the exchange, under which it was done, were assailed on the same ground taken here. It is true that, in the decision of the queen's bench in bank, Lord Campbell, the chief justice, ruled against the plaintiffs on the ground that the money in question arose out of wagering contracts, which, as they could not have been enforced by the bankrupt, were, therefore, not subject to the claim of the assignee. But Crompton, J., held, also, that the money being received and distributed under the rules of the stock exchange, by reason of the bankrupt having become a member subject to said rules, this was a sufficient defense to the party who so received and distributed it.

§ 5. Right to seat not property; contra.—A membership in a board of trade, which confers no property right, but only the right to trade upon the board, and not otherwise a source of profit to the holder, and not transferable by sale to a stranger without the consent of the board, is not assets, and does not pass to the assignee in bankruptcy. In re Sutherland, 6 Biss., 526. But in In re Ketchum, 1 Fed. R., 840, it was held that a seat in the New York Stock Exchange, salable only on condition, and with the consent of a committee of the board, is property, and passes to the assignee in bankruptcy. So, also, in In re Warder, 10 Fed. R., 275, a seat in the New York Produce Exchange, held and transferable the same as in the two cases above, was held to pass to the assignee in bankruptcy. § 6. May exclude persons from rooms.—A board of trade which is a mere private corporation, composed of merchants dealing in the products of the country, and who, solely for their own convenience, provide a room where they meet to transact business, has a right to exclude all other persons from its rooms, or to admit only such as it chooses. Having no franchise which clothes it with any of the duties of a public corporation, it may exclude from its rooms reporters of telegraph companies who come there to obtain market reports to be transmitted to other parts of the country. Metropolitan Grain and Stock Exchange v. Chicago Board of Trade, 15 Fed. R., 847.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

Size of Page. 5x7 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches. The largest we can use for a super extra size octavo volume. They contain twice as many words as the usual state report pages.

Size of Type. Small pica and brevier leaded, with a smaller size for notes at bottom of page. These are the sizes usually used in State Reports.

Size of Volume. We cannot satisfactorily establish a regular number of pages for each volume, but must vary as the proper place for a division presents itself. The end of a letter is the most natural place to end a volume, and will be adopted whenever possible. Some of the long subjects (none of which ought to be divided) will require 600 to 1,000 pages; therefore we must make the size to suit the subjects.

Price. Volumes 1 and 2, $18.00; volumes 3 to 28 will be $7.00 each, and contain an average of over 900 pages each; many of them 1000 and some over 1200 pages. Volume 29 will be sold to subscribers at the sum necessary to complete the agreed price of $200 for the set.

No. of Volumes. This will be twenty-nine we believe from present indications—but in no event will the series, table of cases and index cost subscribers over $200.

The whole, equal to total of 312 original volumes.....312 "

A Table of Cases and Index will be given with each volume, but a complete Index and Table of Cases will be issued at the end of the series.

Time of Issue. This will not be faster than one volume every 4 to 6 weeks, unless a large majority of our subscribers request it, in which case the others will not be obliged to take them faster than our regular time. All the preliminary work of the whole series has now been done, and subjects enough for several of our volumes are ready. We can issue the whole series in one year if wished.

Terms of Payment. No books will be sent out on credit. Subscribers who wish to save express charges can remit in advance—otherwise the books will go by express, freight at cost of subscriber, and cost of returning the money paid by us. As each volume is ready, subscribers will be notified by mail.

Comparative Cost of Original Volumes over our Work.

U. S. Supreme Court Reports, all of the original edition, $450; if with the reprint of early volumes (now going through press), $150; if with the Curtis reprint, $180 to $150. The Circuit Reports cost $750 to $800, and the District Reports, with Attorney-General Opinions and Court of Claims $200. If to the above figures is added the cost of other cases included by us, it will be seen that we offer for $200, cases which cost, otherwise, $1,000 to $1,500.

Comparative Cost of other Reprints. When the large cost of editing our volumes is taken into account, they are the cheapest series ever offered to the profession. Our 80,000 pages will cost over $2.00 each for the brain labor.

Maritime Law—Patents and U. S. Bankrupt Law Cases. The cases on these subjects will be principally digested, but a sufficient number will be given in full under each head to illustrate the general principles of the subject. We adopt this plan with these three subjects, because to do otherwise would make nine or ten volumes, devoted to three subjects, seldom referred to by ninety-nine lawyers out of every hundred. Most of the cases turn on mere matters of fact and not law that can apply to other cases.

Cases on Insolvent laws, and those on U. S. Bankruptcy laws which discuss general principles, will be printed in full as freely as those on other subjects, but those that touch only on the procedure under the repealed statutes will be digested. Although the cases in the Bankruptcy Register have not been included in our whole series, yet they will be freely cited in our title of Bankruptcy.

The names of the final editors on each of these topics will be a guarantee that no valuable case will fail to appear in full.

They show that honest, conscientious and capable authorship, producing accurate, thorough and exhaustive work, is certain to be acknowledged and appreciated in the long run; particularly when presented with clear type, on good paper, in fine binding, and at an exceedingly low price considering the large sum (about $40,000), paid out for brain labor.

From the "Central Law Journal," (of St. Louis, Mo.), after examining Vol. 1.

[One of the largest circulated Law Journals in the West. As a matter of purchase, no amount of money could have bought the below review from this Journal. Its oft-repeated unfavorable criticism of poor law books is so well-known that great confidence is placed in its opinions.]

That the plan of this remarkable publication, the first instalment of which is before us, was conceived by one possessing talent of no mean order, is a fact which stands out so boldly, that not even the most obstinate opponent of progressive ideas in law-book publishing can deny it. In from twenty-five to thirty volumes, are to be gathered all the decisions of every Federal court, from the district court to the Supreme tribunal, in the shape in which they are the most serviceable to the practitioner. By the method adopted, he will not only have all the reports which he ever can need, but in addition, an element of no small value, a series of text-books written by the ablest hands.

Every case in the reports was first arranged under its appropriate title. These were distributed among various assistants, among them able law writers. Such as embodied nothing more than the point decided, and those merely following a prior decision, are reduced to a digested form, the remainder of the decisions being rejected as wasting unnecessary space and being of no service. These are placed at the foot of the series of cases upon the given subject, as notes.

All cases selected to be printed in full, also those to be digested, are then referred to an expert, and he passes upon the efficiency of the sub-editor's work. He corrects the errors, replaces cases digested, if necessary, or reduces cases in full to a digested form. He certifies the results of his supervision, and we thus have the guaranty of able critics for the efficiency of the work. When a case involves two or more points, and it is to be published in full under one head, the other points are digested out and sent to their appropriate topic, by which means they appear at length under one head and digested under another. Thus a case may be seen in full or digested three or four times. If there is not sufficient in these minor points to warrant printing in full, the digested point appears in the notes at the proper place. Cases entirely reduced to a digest are known as star cases. Such cases are those which are unimportant, and generally appear to be decided without argument.

At the beginning of each subject or subdivision of a large subject, a summary of the points decided therein is given with reference, and at the conclusion, the notes appear at length. There are abundant cross-references, and thus all difficulty in investigation is avoided. The subjects are arranged after the method of a digest, of the best quality, and, consequently, any title may be examined, and almost all the law there is upon the subject obtained.

There is one feature which is especially worthy of commendation. Every paragraph of every case is numbered to the end of the particular subject in hand, and at the beginning of each paragraph are what are called catch words, which indicates the doctrine laid down therein, and often contains the whole point. When the series are to be used as reports, all that is required in a reference to the table of cases, by which means the cases desired are easily discovered. This table of cases is a perfect model, there being subdivisions, containing the names of all vessels, banks, etc. Thus, if one desires to find a case in which a bank figures as one of the parties, he may refer to the special list of banks.

Every feature of the publication indicates a strong contrast between it and the original reports in this, that every means is adopted for facilitating the investigations of the practitioner; the reporters, on the other hand, seem to have an instinctive desire to place the materials for which he is searching as far beyond his reach as possible.

The work is being compiled by W. G. Myer, Esq., who has made quite a reputation by his digests and indexes. He has demonstrated by his first volume of this series that a work involving the tact required by this, could have fallen into the hands of no one more competent. This volume is printed in large, bold type, and is bound in the best manner. No publication will receive a more hearty welcome in our sanctum than this one, and we await with impatience the completion of this great undertaking.

If the whole work is accomplished with the same satisfaction which these two volumes have given, there certainly ought to be no doubt in the minds of the publishers, as to the success of the project. It is true that the bar is conservative and it requires time to impress the legal fraternity with the merit of progressive plans. This with the crying down which it is receiving, and will continue to receive, at the hands of those publishers with whose reports this series apparently competes, renders the adoption of the idea difficult, and will compel the publishers to make efforts of more than ordinary character. Still, we think that in the end, the profession will begin to perceive the merits of the work, and will conclude that it is a necessary incident to every well cared for library.

This volume completes the subject of Appeals and Writs of Error, which is divided into twenty-nine chapters, and treats fully of Arbitration and Awards, Assignment and Attorneys. At the end of this volume is the table of cases to volumes I and II, and the index to the same volumes, which is very well done by one who seems to be no novice in legal literary work.

Desiring to convince ourselves of the judiciousness with which cases have been reduced to a digested form, we have examined a number of them, and we are of the firm opinion that the whole meat, of every case digested, is contained in the digest. To be sure, we had already the assurance of distinguished authors to that effect, but all doubts in our mind have been dispelled by this personal scrutiny of a list of cases selected at random. This series can therefore be well substituted for the original reports, and they are certainly in a much more available form. We have no reason to alter the views previously expressed by us, and we are glad that we have one more volume in our sanctum as a support.

ECHOES FROM THE PRESS.

From the Boston Advertiser, (March 6, 1884.)

Whose law book critic is one of the best known, and most highly respected reviewers in this country.

In Mr. Myer's "Federal Decisions" we find a new method of reporting, but one no less comprehensive than the system to which we have been accustomed. Indeed, the title is a modest one, in view of the vast labor represented and of the advantage which it promises, both for the bench and the bar. It is intended to include all the decisions of the federal courts, both those which have been published in the regular reports and those which are to be found in the various periodicals and in the different state and territorial reports.

The important cases are to be published in full; and those decisions which simply affirm or follow some leading case, or which turn merely upon some particular state of facts, without enunciating any real principle of law, are to be only digested. Where, as often occurs, a later case reviews and affirms a series of previous cases upon the same subject matter, such later case is to be given in full, and the others digested. All the decisions are to be arranged logically, rather than chronologically or topically, according to the subjects considered; all the cases being assigned to the various heads of the law, and these heads being divided and subdivided suitably, for convenience of arrangement and for reference, in the same system that is adopted in digests.

At the head of each division is given a summary of the points of law embraced in that division, followed by the cases in full, divided into convenient paragraphs, each of which is preceded by a brief statement of the point embraced in it. At the end of these cases is a digest of the points applicable to the particular subdivision, taken both from those cases which are to appear in full under some other head or subdivision and from those which are not to be given in full in any part of the work. It is accordingly anticipated that the work, when completed, will give all that has been decided by the federal courts on each topic of the law, arranged logically and in order, and mainly stated in the very words of the court, though with the matter of over 800 volumes compressed into less than thirty.

The work is one of which the proper performance demands unwearied patience and the hardest and dreariest labor; but we doubt very much if it is not the kind of work which must, sooner or later, be applied to all of our reports, if they are to be brought into any manageable compass. Of American reports alone there are now more than 8,000 volumes; and the muster-roll, already formidable to those who expect no more than the ordinary length of life, is increasing by more than 100 volumes every year, to say nothing of the constantly swelling bulk of the English and colonial reports, all founded on the common law, and all available and dangerous to the lawyer and the student. The "American Decisions" and "American Reports" have been found serviceable devices, but their arrangement and object must, in practical convenience, yield to those adopted by Mr. Myer. His method combines the merits of a digest and of a volume of reports; we have the scope and treatment of the latter, with the methodical arrangement of the former.

Many lawyers will indeed object to the abridgment of any cases, and yet more strongly to the limitation of others to a mere digested reference; but a little reflection will at once show that some abridgment and some omission are indispensable, if the body of the reports is to be brought into any reasonable compass. After a principle has been affirmed in a dozen decisions, why should our books be encumbered with a hundred more repetitions, to be renewed whenever a persevering litigant or a shifty attorney chooses to call the principle in question? Is there nothing so certain that its affirmation is needless?

For our part, we are inclined rather to think that there has been in this volume too little condensation and too little omission; but the editors have, no doubt wisely, preferred to err rather by including too much than too little.

The real and vital test of the value of such a work as this is its accuracy, its thoroughness and its absolute copiousness. These points can be fully determined only by the test of daily use; but we have examined this first volume with no little care, and have been unable to find any blemishes under either of these heads. So far as we can see from the publishers' statement of the editorial labor, certainly every possible precaution has been taken against error or omission, each part of the work being passed through so many successive competent hands as, at any rate, to minimize the possibilities of mistakes.

The work is certainly constructed upon a plan which, though novel, is of manifest merit; it includes the series of decisions which, throughout this country, is confessedly more valuable than any other; and it includes the contents of volumes, many of which are now out of print, and a complete set of which could scarcely be obtained by any one.

It seems to us that Mr. Myer's work, when fully carried out, will be found to be an extraordinarily valuable contribution to the study of the law; and we very strongly suspect that he has found the basis upon which all our reports will in the future have to be reconstructed. He has well embodied and carried out the idea that was in the mind of Mr. Reed, when he said in his "American Law Studies" that we should expect in future series of reports "a great but accurate condensation of the opinions, and a much more concise statement of the facts, so that only the cases, the judgments, and the grounds of the latter, will be given. Such compression will benignly aid the student in mastering, and the practitioner and author in consulting and making use of, the reports; and it will be one of the ways by which a substitute for the multiplying volumes will be cheaply furnished to every law-office." But Mr. Myer has gone further in the way of improvement than Mr. Reed's anticipations extended; for he has added the great convenience of a logical and systematic arrangement by subjects to the merits enumerated by Mr. Reed; and this it is which seems to us to be the greatest advantage in his treatment. In this first volume, which covers titles under the letter A, half through "Appeals and Writs of Error," the work has been well and wisely done; only the right cases have been selected for abridgment and digesting; and the publishers have certainly a right to say that, upon each of the subjects here covered, the lawyer can learn more, in less time, of what has been decided by the United States courts than by using any other books which are yet available to the profession.

If, as we may well expect, the remaining volumes are executed with the same careful skill and thoroughness, the work will be one of the very highest value.

NOTICE!

We contemplated printing all the notices of Myer's Federal Decisions at length, as on the first two pages of "Echôes," but we find that to do so will soon make a large volume. From all sources come the same uniform and unlimited praise. Therefore, we have concluded to print only enough to fully satisfy inquirers of the merits of the series.

[From the Ohio Law Journal, March 15.]

* * * * *
A new departure is undertaken in the method of arrangement. The decisions are gathered under the subject upon which they treat, without regard to chronology. This innovation will receive universal indorsement as a great improvement upon the chronological arrangement plan. At the end of each series of cases is a digest of points applicable to the particular sub-division of the subject. The present volume which contains the subjects from "Accounts" to "Appeals and Writs of Error," shows great painstaking care and labor.

The work is a great undertaking, but the name of the publishers is a sufficient guaranty that it will be carried through to completion upon the plan of its inception. We predict for it great popularity.

[From the Boston Advertiser, March 15.]

The second volume of Myer's Federal Decisions includes the residue of the subjects under the letter A; the main topics treated of being Appeals and Writs of Error, Apprentices, Arbitration and Award, Assignment, and Attorneys. Under each of these heads, there is furnished to the reader all that has been decided by the United States Courts, in the same manner and with the same detail that we lately recapitulated in our notice of the first volume.

The good judgment with which the cases under these heads, which have not been fully reported, have been limited to a mere digest-reference is attested by the authority of such eminent writers as Messrs. M. M. Bigelow, James Schouler, and J. L. High.

The same high standard of diligence and exactness which we found in the first volume characterizes this continuation of the work; and we consider it a matter of congratulation that we may soon expect to have the labors of the Federal Courts made so convenient and easy of access.

[From the Maryland Law Record, March 15.]

* * * * *
We have received from the publishers Vol. I of this work.

* * * * *
The method of arrangement is a new one. The entire series of decisions, comprising all heads of law, are to be arranged alphabetically, according to the subject matter.

* * * * *
All important cases will be published in full, but cases which merely affirm or follow some leading case, or those which are based upon a particular state of facts, and do not announce any important principle of law, and in some instances those which turn upon a well settled principle of law, will not be published in full, but only digested, the extract to be sufficiently full for all practical purposes.

* * * * *
We believe that for reference and practical use the plan of arrangement is the best that has ever been adopted. It is as much superior in this respect to the original reports, as Appleton's Encyclopedia in its present form is to what it would be were the works of each of its contributors given in full and in chronological order. The plan is carried out with much ability and thoroughness.

* * * * *
Mr. Myer, whose ability is conceded, will be assisted in the final arrangement of important topics by such eminent law-writers, as Benj. Vaughan Abbott, John W. Daniel, J. L. High, Leonard A. Jones, Jas. Schouler and others.

* * * * *
The publishers offer to send specimen pages of the work on application, or for four cents in stamps to send a fifty page pamphlet giving the subject of Bailment in full. Parties interested in such a work will do well to write to them.

[From the Louisville Courier Journal, March 17, after examining Vol. I.]

* * * * *
No work ever attempted in this country will do so much to produce uniformity and harmony between the different States and between them and the Federal Courts. It will result in or rather produce in a measure a complete codification of American law, as far as is possible as long as our dual system of Government lasts.

* * * * *
All the cases referring to any particular subject, will be given in full in the treatise on that subject. At the end of a series of cases there will be a digest of points applicable to the particular sub-division of the subject, and at the end of the work there will be a final table of contents and a general index so arranged as to enable the reader to find the most obscure point.

* * * * *
Mr. Myer has succeeded in getting the very ablest law-writers in the country to assist him in this work by preparing the law on those subjects to which their studies have been specially directed, and upon which they have in many instances already published works.

* * * * *
If this vast and wonderful enterprise should be as happily executed as it has been ably and wisely conceived, it will prove to be an Encyclopedia of American law. It is beyond a doubt the greatest and most ambitious legal work ever attempted in this country.

* * * * *
It required a great mind to conceive it, and it will require great ability and industry to execute it. The reputation of Mr. Myer and of his able and learned assistants is a guarantee of success which every lawyer can safely trust. The undertaking is so vast and comprehensive, yet so happily planned, that when completed it will be to all American lawyers a library in itself, and destined to affect at once in the most perceptible way the decisions of the State courts.

It is impossible in this article to give the details of the entire plan of this great work; they cover every standpoint from which a case can be considered, and from which the subject decided in it can be discussed.

ECHOES FROM THE PRESS.

[From John W. Daniel, author of the best known book extant on "Negotiable Paper."]

The "Federal Decisions" now being published under the editorial supervision of the well-known author, Mr. W. G. Myer, appears to me, from an examination of Volumes I and II, and of the prospectus, to be an admirably planned work, and I doubt not that they will prove the most useful and convenient series of Reports of Federal Cases that have yet been offered to the profession in commendous form. The clear and comprehensive method of presenting the body of Federal Law will greatly aid the labors of research, and put the adjudications of all the Federal Courts within reach of practising lawyers at a comparatively low cost. I am satisfied that the work deserves success, and cordially recommend it.

[From the St. Louis Republican.]

It is a very important work to a law practitioner, and will constitute a most valuable law library in itself. The first volume of the work has been gladly welcomed and warmly commended by eminent jurists and the law journal editors, who approve of its arrangement and commend its fullness and accuracy.

[From the Cincinnati Gazette]

The arrangement will be by topics alphabetically arranged as in a digest, with suitable cross references. As the result, the working lawyer is promised at about one-sixth the cost of the original Reports, everything in them that can be of any value to him in his practice.

It is a new undertaking, evidently involving a great outlay in editorial and other expense, and is rather venturesome in both publishers and editors. It is largely due to the great cost of the original Reports and the great difficulty, almost impossibility, of obtaining a set of them at any price. No reports are so valuable to the lawyer as these of the Supreme Court, and none carry greater weight in the State courts.

The editor, Mr. Myer, is well and favorably known by his indexes of the Supreme Court and various State Reports. They are a guarantee of the wise execution of the present work. The list of editors engaged to assist him in the final arrangement of the work contains many names of well-known legal writers of high standing.

We have especially noticed the treatment of the subjects, "Actions" and "Agency." Careful examination has satisfied us of the great merits of the work. It is worthy of commendation to our lawyers, who should, we think, feel a sort of gratitude for it.

[From the Boston Journal.]

The Gilbert Book Company of St. Louis have undertaken the publication of a very important collection and reprint of Federal Decisions, whose value and convenience members of the legal profession will be quick to appreciate.

The intention of the editors is to publish all accessible Federal Decisions, either in full or in a digested form, whether found in the regular series of reports or scattered through the various periodicals and State reports, including the opinions of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, the most valuable opinions of the Territorial Courts, and the opinions of general importance of the Court of Claims and the Attorney-General.

The cases are classified under the general heads of the law, and these are divided for convenience of arrangement and reference. A great deal of time and labor has clearly been spent upon the editorial work, with the result of making a compendium which lawyers will find invaluable for reference and consultation.

The first two volumes cover topics under the letter A, and are supplied with thorough indexes of cases reported and cited and principles applied.

[From the New York Daily Register, March 23.]
A Law Journal.

The first two volumes of the new and very important series of reports cannot fail to produce a very favorable impression upon the members of the legal profession throughout the United States. Mr. Myer is well known as a careful compiler, and the list of those who are to assist him in arranging the various subjects comprises the names of those who are widely known as legal authors.

The arrangement is simple. Cases are assigned to the general heads of the law, and these are divided and subdivided, with head notes or table of contents at the head of each subject.

At the end of a series of cases is a digest of points applicable to the particular subdivision of the subject.

The publishers deserve praise for the excellent execution of the typography of the work.

From Hon. M. R. Waite, Chief Justice of U. S. Supreme Court.

On examining the first 400 pages of Volume I, he wrote.—"Thus far Mr. Myer appears to have done his work well, and that is good evidence of his fitness for the place in which he has been put. He has the right idea as to what such a book should be."

Later he writes, after using Vols. I and II, "I am more than ever satisfied with the value of the publication. The subject of Appeals and Writs of Error, I frequently consult, and always with satisfaction."

ECHOES FROM THE PRESS.

[From the Daily American, Nashville, Tenn., March 24.]

The publication has the approval of the law journals and ablest law book critics in the country. In the series it is intended to include all the decisions of the Federal Courts, both those which have been published in the regular reports and those which are to be found in the various periodicals, and in the different State and Territorial reports.

The real and vital test of the value of such a work as this is its accuracy, its thoroughness and its absolute copiousness. So far as we can see certainly every possible precaution has been taken against error or omission, each part of the work being passed through so many successive and competent hands as, at any rate, to minimize the possibilities of mistakes.

The work is certainly constructed upon a plan which, though novel, is of manifest merit.

If the remaining volumes are executed with the same careful skill and thoroughness, the work will be one of the very highest value.

[From the Washington Law Reporter.]

From an examination made of volume one, we are convinced that if the series is continued with the same care and ability, it will prove an almost invaluable addition to the law literature of the country.

The book is much more than a digest; the decisions upon various subjects are arranged so that they can be readily examined and the important leading cases are published in full.

The vast number of volumes of reports that are being issued each year—a great many of them containing scarcely a single opinion of value to the profession at large—must, in the future, compel a compilation similar to the work undertaken by Mr. Myer in this book.

[From the Legal Intelligencer, Philadelphia,
March 21.]

This projected work, of which the first volume is now presented, is an undertaking of considerable magnitude. The intention is to group under alphabetical heads all the Federal Decisions.

The plan is excellent—and its satisfactory execution depends on the ability and judgment of those to whom it is committed. Upon this point it is promised that this work, subject to the general supervision of Mr. Myer, is and will be intrusted to certain gentlemen whose names are given in the prospectus. They are of distinguished legal attainments and of unquestioned prominence of the Bench and in legal literature, whose names are familiar to the profession.

This projected work promises to be an important professional aid, the value of which is manifest.

[From the Albany (N. Y.) Times.]

The Gilbert Book Company of St. Louis have undertaken the publication of a very important collection and reprint of Federal Decisions, whose value and convenience members of the legal profession will be quick to appreciate.

With Mr. Myer are engaged in the editorship and the arrangement of the subjects, Messrs. Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Robert D. Benedict, Edmund H. Bennett, Melville M. Bigelow, Benjamin R. Curtis, G. W. McCrary, James Schouler, William F. Wharton and a number of other well-known lawyers.

The cases are classified under the general heads of the law, and these are divided for convenience of arrangement and reference. A great deal of time and labor has clearly been spent upon the editorial work, with the result of making a compendium which lawyers will find invaluable for reference and consultation. The contents of the one hundred and five volumes of Supreme Court Reports, the one hundred and forty-two volumes of Circuit and District Court Reports, and sixty-five other volumes of miscellaneous reports will be included in the work.

[From the Chicago Inter Ocean, March 22.]

The plan of the work is to combine all the essential merits of full reports, an alphabetically arranged digest, and a synoptical treatise directly from the hands of Federal judges, covering every department of Federal law completely and exhaustively before passing to any other. For this purpose the managing editor of the series, Wm. G. Myer, Esq., is doubtless the most competent person who could have been selected, having been admirably prepared for this work by his previous labors in preparing his well-known index to the United States Supreme Court Reports, and indexes to the State reports of Illinois, Iowa, Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee, his digest of Texas reports and local works on pleading and practice.

The editor makes it a rule first to digest every case, not by taking a scissors and cutting out from the opinion such portion of the Judge's language as seems to enunciate some valuable general principle of law, but by carefully compiling an accurate statement of the points on which the decision of the case turned, as on those only does the language of the court constitute an addition or accretion to the body of legal learning previously existing. For that alone is the decision valuable as a report. The general legal propositions uttered by the court in arriving at its conclusion on the contested point are used merely for illustration or as stepping stones in the process of argument, and are no part of the decision itself, and derive no new authority from their reiteration in this connection.

The mode in which the work has been done thus far has received the emphatic approval of our law journals.

The theory upon which the work is prosecuted is excellent. The work of abridging the law, or as least its evidences, as the materials accumulate it as inevitable and valuable a part of the evolution of society as any that can be performed.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS

WRITTEN BY

EMINENT AND WELL-KNOWN JURISTS.

[All these letters and many others, printed in full, will be sent by mail on application.]

Thus far Mr. Myer appears to have done his work well, and that is good evidence of his fitness for the place in which he has been put. He has the right idea as to what such a book should be.—M. R. Waite, Chief Justice of United States Supreme Court.

The plan seems to be executed with ability, and I cannot but think will become popular through its proved utility.—Stanley Mathews of the U. S. Supreme Court.

In Mr. Myer's Index of the U. S. Supreme Court reports we have a guaranty of good work in the proposed publication. That Index is the first book I turn to when I want to find anything in our reports.—Joseph P. Bradley, of the U. S. Supreme Court.

Permit me to say that I concur in what the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Bradley say of your editor. I have from the first used his "Index," both that of the Supreme Court and Tennessee Reports, and invariably use them to begin an investigation. I have a very high opinion of his qualifications for the work in which he is engaged, and think the profession can rely on him.—E. S. Hammond, Judge of U. S. District Court, Memphis, Tenn.

I take pleasure in saying that Mr. Myer is well fitted by learning, scholarship, industry and profound knowledge of the law, to prepare and take charge of such a work. Your work meets my unqualified approval.—H. S. Orton, Wis. Supreme Court.

The pages of the work now before me impress me with the belief that the editor has mastered his plan, has given his work scrupulous care, and has brought to his task keen powers of discrimination and analysis. The notes are well selected, concisely worded, and judiciously arranged. In every way the work seems a good one, and to be in capable and worthy hands.—Byron K. Elliot, Judge Supreme Court of Indiana.

All things considered, it seems to me that your work executed with such fidelity as to gain a reputation for reliability, will be more serviceable to the general practitioner than would be the original volumes, which you will arrange and condense.—James B. Black, Commissioner Sup. Court of Indiana.

The work submitted has been well done, and the reputation of Mr. Myer as an able and careful editor, gives promise that the series will be well and carefully edited and arranged.—G. M. Sabin, Judge United States District Court, Nevada.

There can be no doubt of the excellence of your plan. I have been much aided by Mr. Myer's Indexes, to which I frequently refer; and from what I have seen of his work, I believe him to be uncommonly capable and painstaking.—R. A. Bakewell, Associate Judge St. Louis Court of Appeals.

The index part of your plan is admirable, and in the hands of Mr. Myer, with whose work in this direction I am entirely familiar from constant use. I can say that the work cannot be done better.—J. D. Westcott, of Sup. Court of Florida.

I had an impression when I began the examination of your plan I should have several suggestions to make. But a further examination has shown that each one of them has been anticipated. If the work is carried out as promised by the specimen pages, it will certainly be a great thing accomplished for the profession. A better work even than the original publications.—Chas. Danforth, of Supreme Court, Maine.

The entire arrangement of the work is admirable. Where I discovered matters in which improvements might, as I supposed, be made, on fuller reflection I always found that the deficiency was imaginary—that the supposed want was provided for under the exhaustive plan for the execution of the work.—Rich'd S. Walker, of Texas, Presiding Judge of Commission of Appeals Court.

It embodies so many attractive features, that one cannot help wondering how it happens that no publisher has heretofore undertaken the same thing.—Edward Lewis, Presiding Justice of the St. Louis Court of Appeals.

The "new departure" is so good that 'tis strange it has not been adopted heretofore.—W. H. Seavers, Chief Justice Sup. Court of Iowa.

I have given the scheme some thought, and the more I reflect upon it, the higher is my opinion of its utility.—John B. F. Graves, Chief Justice Sup. Court of Michigan.

Your general idea is a good one.—T. M. Cooley, Associate Justice of Michigan Supreme Court; also author of several well known law books.

I have carefully examined the prospectus and advanced sheets of your proposed "Federal Decisions," and cordially approve of the plan in all its characteristics and leading features. You have surmounted the difficulties admirably.—Benj. Vaughan Abbott, Esq., Author.

I have taken the trouble to see the lawyers of this Bar, and had most of them to see your work on Bailment. All are very much pleased with it, none offering any objections, and most of them expressing a decidedly favorable opinion.—O. B. Freeman, Esq., Trenton, Tenn.

The more I have studied it, the more favorably I am impressed with the plan and execution of the work.—E. W. Pattison, of St. Louis, Author of the Missouri Digest.

So far from condemning the plan of condensing decisions in some cases to a digested form is concerned, if the work is done with the ability and fidelity evinced in the treatment of the subject of Bailment. I regard it as one of the excellencies of the work.—Samuel L. Tate, Probate Judge, Grand Haven, Mich.

I think the number of subscribers who will feel that the cutting out of the surplus matter has been a positive advantage, will be more than equal to the number who will feel that a sacrifice has been made for economy's sake; especially when the improved arrangement of subjects, methods of catching at once the particular thing wanted, etc., etc., are considered.—H. M. Wiltsie, Attorney for City of Chattanooga, Tenn.

PREFACE.

The aim in this work is to publish the decisions of the Federal Courts under a method of arrangement not hitherto attempted. The works on leading cases are quite numerous, but no attempt has been made to arrange alphabetically, according to the subject matter, an entire series of decisions, comprising all heads of the law. The plan here proposed has been developed by years of patient investigation and experiment, and has already met with the approval of judges and leading members of the bar in every state of the Union. The object is to present the federal decisions in such a shape that they may be easily consulted — to present under any given subject all the important cases in full appropriate to such subject, and a complete digest of points in cases assigned in full to other heads. By this means we are enabled to present in a complete and compact form every subject that has been litigated in the federal courts.

The intention is to publish all accessible federal decisions, either in full or in a digested form, whether found in the regular series of reports or scattered through the various periodicals and state reports, including the opinions of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, the most valuable opinions of the Territorial Courts, and the opinions of general importance of the Court of Claims and the Attorneys-General. The opinions of the Supreme Court are made the basis of the work, to be followed by those of the Circuit and District Courts, according to their value. All important cases will be published in full, (a) but cases which merely affirm or follow some leading case, or those which are based upon a particular state of facts and do not announce any important principle of law, and in some instance those which turn upon a well settled principle of law, will not be published in full, but only digested, the extract to be sufficiently full for all practical purposes. Where a series of cases, all covering the same ground and addressed to the same subject matter, are reviewed and affirmed in a later case, usually the last case will be given in full, and the others will be digested. (b) Whenever there is a well grounded doubt whether

(a) There are a few subjects, such as Slavery, Bankruptcy and Embargo Laws, under which, for obvious reasons, only a few cases, comparatively, will be printed in full. The old Embargo Laws and the questions connected with a state of slavery are obsolete, and, consequently, the cases on those subjects will be digested. The Bankrupt Laws are repealed, but as new laws are likely to be enacted from time to time, a sufficient number of cases will be printed in full to illustrate the general principles of the subject. There are other subjects, such as Maritime Law, Patents, Practice, Revenue, Prize of War, etc., from which a great many cases will be rejected, owing to the fact that there are a great number that are merely fact cases, or are confined to a statement of the same general principle. The remark here made is true of the subject of Appeals and Writs of Error, published in this volume, and will apply also to Courts.

(b) For an illustration of this point see Crowell v. Randell, p. 696, where MR. JUSTICE STORY reviews and reaffirms a long line of decisions touching the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act. It thus frequently happens that a line of decisions, all addressed to the same point, are rounded out and the question set a digest of a case will be sufficient, the case will be given in full. It is not intended, however, to publish in full the opinions of the Court of Claims, nor those found in the state reports and law periodicals, except those that are of more than ordinary value.

The opinions given in full under any subject are those which are devoted, either wholly or principally, to that particular subject. Many of the decisions comprise other points of law not appropriate to the general subject, but usually each decision is confined to a single, distinct subject matter by which it may be classified, the other points arising incidentally. It may be a surprise to many that a series of decisions can be thus classified; but an examination of the cases shows that if a decision is on the merits it is usually confined to one general head of the law, the points arising incidentally being such as relate to matters of practice; or if the case is decided on a point of practice or procedure, the question on the merits, as a general rule, is not considered. This fact makes it possible to classify the cases easily and accurately. (c)

The arrangement is very simple, and can be understood by a very little attention to details:—

(1) The cases are assigned to the various general heads of the law, and these are divided and subdivided, for convenience of arrangement and reference, with head-notes or table of contents at the head of each subject, the same as an ordinary digest. (d)

(2) For the sake of condensation, by avoiding the extensive duplicating of the various points, the cases are assigned to as few general heads as possible. (e)

(3) At the head of each division of a subject will be found a digest or summary of the points of law in the cases assigned to such division. This SUMMARY is confined exclusively to the statement of the points of law applicable to the particular division under which the case is published, other points of law in the case, if any, being transferred to other subjects, or to other subdivisions of the same subject. (f) at rest by a full and exhaustive decision. This latter decision is given the preference, because it purports to give all the reasons for the rule announced, and is manifestly intended to be final. A case is not always rejected, however, because another case covering the same ground is given in full. See, for example, page 698 et seq., where a number of cases are given in full to show what is necessary to bring a case from a state court within the terms of section 25 of the judiciary act.

(c) See page 18, Wiggins v. Burkham. The question litigated in this case has reference solely to an account rendered. Other points arise incidentally, and will be found digested in the complete work under their appropriate heads. The cases are very rare in which it is difficult to determine to what head an opinion ought to be assigned.

(d) See the head-notes to Actions and Agency on pages 29 and 132.

(e) See, for example, the subjects of Actions and Agency. Under the former head will be found cases on cause of action, forms of actions, the various common law actions, the general principles of actions in rem, etc.; while the latter head comprises cases on the general doctrine of Agency, Powers of Attorney and Factors and Brokers. This plan is carried out in the subject of Appeals and Writs of Error, and will be followed in such subjects as Carriers, Constitution and Laws, Courts, Practice, Pleading, etc.

(f) See, for example, section 748 on page 672. The references at the end of the section show that the case is published in full under some other subdivision of the subject. On turning to the case (§§ 1175-1179), we find it published under the head Rights Claimed under an Act of Congress, and the points in the case appropriate to that head are digested and placed in the SUMMARY; while the point in the case on the breach of a marshal's bond will be found in the complete work under Bonds. See, also, § 24, page 407; § 48, page 408; § 51, page 409.

PREFACE.

(4) Next in order are the cases in full, arranged, generally, according to the order of the sections of the SUMMARY. Where the court states the facts of the case, it is so indicated by the use of the words STATEMENT OF FACTS at the beginning of the opinion. Where it is necessary to state the facts apart from the opinion, the statement is made as brief as possible, and is confined to the facts necessary to enable the reader to understand the points decided. (g) The cases are also divided into convenient paragraphs, with a brief statement at the beginning of each paragraph of the point of law discussed or decided. Reference is here had to the italic sections scattered through the opinion. These take the place of the syllabus usually placed at the head of the opinion, and, besides bringing out every point of law actually decided, in some instances call attention to a review of authorities, as well as various points of law which would ordinarily be classed as dicta. (h)

(5) At the end of a series of cases is a digest of points applicable to the particular subdivision of the subject. This digest matter is obtained from four sources: 1st. Cases assigned originally to the general head, but digested and thrown out in the final arrangement, not to appear in full in any part of the work. (i) 2d. Points taken from cases which will appear in full under some other division of the same subject. (j) 3d. Points taken from cases which are assigned to some other general head. (k) 4th. A digest of cases from state reports, law periodicals, and the opinions of the Court of Claims and the Attorneys-General. (l)

Cases that will not appear in full in any part of the work are denoted by a star following the name of the case, thus, DOE v. ROE.^{*} The tables of cases and indexes will also contain a similar designation of rejected cases, so that in consulting either the reader will readily see whether he is referred to a case in full or only a digest.

The italic matter at the head of the SUMMARY takes the place of the side-heads, or catch-words, usually prefixed to the sections, and is intended as an index to the contents of the SUMMARY. At the end of each section of the SUMMARY the name of the case of which the section is a digest is given, followed by the numbers of the sections into which the case is divided, so that after the reader has read the section of the SUMMARY, and found that it is what he wants, he can at once turn to the case in full.

(g) See the case on page 18, where the court states the facts; on page 32 a brief statement is prefixed to the opinion, while in some cases the statement of facts is found in the body of the opinion, as on page 661.

(h) The case of Williamson v. Ringgold, on page 83, will fairly illustrate the plan. There is really but one point in the case, which is stated in the SUMMARY, while the review of authorities and valuable points made by the court by way of argument are indicated in the italic sections.

(i) See the star case in section 17, page 21; also the foot-notes on pages 452 and 479.

(j) See sections 80, 81, 88, 748 and 749, and the references to the cases in full.

(k) This will be illustrated by any of the cases to which no star is annexed in sections 10 to 19, on page 21. These cases are assigned to other heads, and may or may not appear in full under those heads. If any of them are only digested when they are reached in their order, the fact will be indicated by a star, and the table of cases will also show that they are not published in full.

(l) These cases will be denoted by a star following the name of the case. There are also divisions of a subject under which there are no cases in full, as, e. g., on pages 27, 81, 128 and 132. There are no cases in full appropriate to those subheads.

PREFACE.

The head-notes, or table of contents, at the beginning of a subject, followed by the numbers of the sections of each division and subdivision, the section numbers at the top of the page, the running title, giving the general title on the left-hand page and a subdivision of the subject on the right, and the numerous cross-references at the end of the sections, etc., are intended to facilitate the examination of the subject. The final table of contents and the general index to be published at the end of the series will be arranged so as to enable the reader to find the most obscure points. A table of cases and index will also accompany each volume.

The great merit of the work, therefore, consists in this: (1) The value of the cases. (2) The important cases are all printed in full. (3) The SUMMARY at the head of the cases and the digest matter following form a complete digest of a subject, as full and as conveniently arranged for consultation as an ordinary digest.

In the preparation of the digest matter following the cases in volumes I and II, I have been assisted by CHARLES N. BROWN, Esq., of Madison, Wisconsin.

MYER'S FEDERAL DECISIONS.

The below list gives the number of volumes, and the contents of each, (except the minor topics.) substantially as they will appear. Full descriptive circulars sent on application.

Vols 1 & 2. They include the subjects of ACCOUNTS; ACTIONS; APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR; ARBITRATION; ASSIGNMENT; ATTORNEYS. The two subjects of AGENCY AND APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR are, we think, of more value than any treatise on either subject, both on account of their comprehensiveness and the method of treatment. We feel so certain that every attorney who examines these two volumes will be induced to subscribe for the whole series that we are willing to send them out on approval on receipt of $13.00. Money to be refunded on return of the books.
